

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

AMENDMENTS TO RULES

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS OF VIRGINIA ¹

XIII. TIME OF ARGUMENTS.

In the argument of causes one hour and fifteen minutes will be allowed each side, and no more, without special leave of the court. The time thus allowed may be apportioned between the counsel on the same side, at their discretion; provided always, that a fair opening of the case shall be made by the party having the opening and closing arguments, in which he shall cite all the authorities intended to be relied on by him.

April 5, 1917, amended June 4, 1921.

HOBBY v. FREEMAN. (No. 259.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 29, 1922.)

Landlord and tenant §62(4)—Tenant in possession after expiration of term cannot dispute landlord's title.

In summary proceeding under C. S. § 2385, to eject a tenant holding over, defendant cannot dispute plaintiff's title either by setting up an adverse claim or by evidence that the property rightfully belonged to a third person, without first surrendering possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Bond, Judge.

Summary proceeding in ejectment by S. M. Hobby against Mrs. Pattie D. B. Freeman. Judgment for plaintiff; and defendant appeals. No error.

Pattie D. B. Freeman, in pro. per.

J. L. Emanuel and E. P. Maynard, both of Raleigh, for appellee.

STACY, J. This was a summary proceeding in ejectment, commenced in the court of a justice of the peace, and tried de novo on appeal to the superior court of Wake county. From the judgment of the latter court the case comes to us for review.

The tenancy and the expiration of the term are both admitted (C. S. § 2385); but defendant refuses to vacate the premises upon the ground that, although having taken possession under a lease, she has now acquired an outstanding claim to the property superior to the plaintiff's right and superior to her original landlord's title. It has been the uniform holding with us that, where the relation of landlord and tenant exists, and the latter takes possession of the demised premises under a lease from the former, the tenant will not be permitted to dispute the title of the landlord, either by setting up an adverse claim to the property or by undertaking to show that it rightfully belongs to a third person, during the continuance of such tenancy. Clapp v. Coble, 21 N. C. 177. Before the defendant here could avail herself of this position, it would be necessary for her, first and as a condition precedent, to surrender the possession which she had thus acquired under the lease. The reasons in support of the wisdom of such a policy are fully set out by Hoke, J., in Lawrence v. Eller, 169 N. C. 211, 85 S. E. 291, L. R. A. 1916E, 696, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 546, where the question is discussed at some length with citation of numerous authorities.

We may add, however, that this principle does not go to the extent of denying to the tenant the right to dispute the derivative title of one claiming under the landlord. Hargrove v. Cox, 180 N. C. 360, 104 S. E. 757, and cases there cited; 16 R. C. L. 670. But this is not our case, and there is no exception calling in question the original jurisdiction of the justice of the peace. Hausser v. Morrison, 146 N. C. 248, 59 S. E. 693; McLaurin v. McIntyre, 167 N. C. 350, 83 S. E. 627.

Upon the instant record, we have found no error, and the judgment of the superior court must be upheld.

No error.

CITY OF GOLDSBORO v. HOLMES et ux. (No. 101.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error §82(3)—Order reversing clerk's judgment of voluntary nonsuit not appealable as final judgment.

An order of the judge reversing a judgment of voluntary nonsuit signed by the clerk was interlocutory, and not final, and would not support an appeal.

2. Appeal and error §105—Refusal to dismiss action or proceeding not appealable.

No appeal lies from a refusal to dismiss an action or proceeding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Cranmer, Judge.

Proceeding by the City of Goldsboro against Thomas H. Holmes and wife. A judgment of voluntary nonsuit signed by the clerk was reversed by the judge, and plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

On November 17, 1919, the plaintiff made an order for the extension of Ash street, and thereafter instituted a proceeding for the condemnation of the defendant's property. On November 28, 1920, the clerk made an order condemning a strip of the defendant's land 50 by 420 feet, and appointed three commissioners to appraise the land and the benefits. On January 24, 1921, the commissioners made report assessing the defendant's damages at $35,000, and finding no special benefits. To this report no exceptions were filed. On March 7, 1921, without notice to defendant, the clerk, at the instance of the plaintiff, signed a judgment of nonsuit; and a few days afterward, upon learning of this judgment, the defendant made a motion before the clerk to set it aside. The motion was denied, and upon appeal his honor reversed the judgment signed by the clerk. From his honor's judgment, the plaintiff appealed. The plaintiff has not paid the damages assessed nor taken possession of the land.

D. C. Humphrey, E. M. Land, and Dickinson & Freeman, all of Goldsboro, for appellant.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for appellees.

ADAMS, J. [1, 2] The record presents an interesting and important question, but we are precluded from giving it consideration at this time. His honor's order was interlocutory, not final. The trial should determine all matters at issue, so that a final judgment may be rendered. An appeal that is fragmentary will not be entertained. In addition we have repeatedly held that no appeal lies from a refusal to dismiss an action or proceeding. Capps v. Railroad, 182 N. C. 758, 108 S. E. 300; Farr v. Lumber Co., 182 N. C. 725, 109 S. E. 833; Cement Co. v. Phillips, 182 N. C. 438, 109 S. E. 257. The appeal therefore must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

STANDARD OIL CO. v. BANKS et al. (No. 185.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

I. Appeal and error §1004(1)—Findings of fact by jury not disturbed on appeal.

In a suit on account where the only dispute was the amount thereof, held, that the finding of the jury was conclusive and would not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Partnership §55 — Finding of partnership between defendants sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding that defendants were partners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by the Standard Oil Company against M. Banks and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. No error.

Civil action to recover balance due on open account for oils and gasoline sold and delivered to the defendants during the year 1920.

F. C. Brinson, of Bayboro, for appellants.
Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] This action is brought to recover the balance due on an open account for oils and gasoline sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants during the year 1920. The question of indebtedness was not denied; the amount, only, was in dispute. Plaintiff sued for $910.65, contending that such was the correct amount of its claim. M. Banks, one of the defendants, admitted an indebtedness of $395.49, but denied that any larger sum was due. Upon the issue thus joined, the jury answered in favor of the plaintiff. This was purely a question of fact and has been settled by the verdict.

[2] There was also an issue as to whether J. N. Potter was a partner and interested with his codefendant in the firm of M. Banks & Co. Plaintiff's local agent testified:

"I got a statement from the company saying that M. Banks & Co. owed them a large account. I saw Mr. Banks and also Mr. Potter, and Mr. Potter said, 'Great Lord, why didn't you let me know before it got so large!'"

There was also evidence tending to show that Potter owned the garage—though it was contended that he and Banks bore to each other the relation of landlord and tenant only—and that he stated to plaintiff's agent he would get after Banks about the account; and further he is quoted as having said:

"We will have to straighten it up, and I wish you had let me know about it before it got so large."

From this evidence, we think the jury was fully justified in finding with the plaintiff on the second issue. The defendant Potter did not testify.

The whole controversy narrowed itself to questions of facts, and we have found no error in the trial.

No error.

Ex parte McCade. (No. 258.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 29, 1922.)

Habeas corpus ¶113(1)—Except when relating to custody of children, a habeas corpus judgment is reviewable only on certiorari.

Except in cases concerning the care and custody of children, no appeal lies from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings; but the same must be reviewed, if at all, on writ of certiorari.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Bond, Judge.

Application by Blanche McCade for writ of habeas corpus to secure release from imprisonment, and, from a judgment denying her prayer and remanding her to custody, the petitioner excepts and appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Charles U. Harris, of Raleigh, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. It appears that the petitioner, Blanche McCade, being imprisoned in the common jail of Wake county under a sentence in a criminal action, sued out the writ of habeas corpus, alleging the invalidity of the judgment against her for causes specified. His honor, on inspection of the record, and other evidence offered, being of opinion that petitioner was under a lawful sentence, entered judgment in denial of the prayer of the petitioner and that she be remanded to jail.

It is the law of this state that, except in cases concerning the care and custody of children, no appeal lies from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings; but the same must be reviewed, if at all, on writ of certiorari, duly applied for and resting in the sound discretion of the court. In re Lee Croom, 175 N. C. 455, 95 S. E. 903, citing Ice Co. v. R. R., 125 N. C. 17, 34 S. E. 100; and in re Holley, 154 N. C. 163, 69 S. E. 872.

In deference to these and other like decisions, we must hold that the appeal of the petitioner be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

DEES v. LEE. (No. 189.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Trial ¶295(10)—In action involving purchaser's right to rescind contract, instructions stating contentions of parties held not prejudicial to purchaser.

In vendor's action for breach of contract to purchase land, and to recover amount of check given vendor on execution of contract on which defendant stopped payment, and in which defendant claimed that he agreed to purchase the land only on the condition that he would be able to collect certain notes, and that on discovery that the notes could not be collected he promptly informed the vendor thereof and rescinded the contract, instructions, stating the contentions of the parties, when considered as a whole, held not erroneous as constituting an expression of opinion of the court.

2. Trial ¶273—Objections to statement of contentions must be made during charge or at its conclusion.

Objections to statement of contentions must be made at some appropriate time during the charge or at its conclusion, so that the trial court may be given an opportunity to correct any error in the respect indicated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pamlico County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Julius G. Dees against R. H. Lee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract to buy land and to recover amount of check given by defendant to plaintiff on execution of contract, on which the defendant had stopped payment, and in which the defendant claimed that he agreed to buy the land on the condition that he would be able to collect certain notes due him, and that upon discovery that he would not be able to collect the notes, he promptly notified plaintiff thereof and rescinded the contract.

"Gentlemen of the jury, this is an action brought by Mr. Dees against R. H. Lee on a contract for the sale of land. The plaintiff alleges that the evidence shows that on the 6th day of November, 1920, he sold the defendant 56 acres of land for $200 per acre, and that the contract was closed on that day; that he was to pay one-fourth cash, but when they went to execute the papers Mr. Lee did not have the one-fourth cash, and after some conversation and negotiation he agreed to give him a check for $400 and to have the deed from Dees to him and the mortgage from Lee to him (Dees) and the notes all deposited in the Bank of Pamlico until about the 1st of January; and contends it was an absolute sale without any conditions whatever, except what was set out in the paper writing signed by Mr. Lee; and contends that Mr. Lee asked him to hold that check a day or two, and that he held it until the following week, this being on Saturday; that the trade was made, and the following week he deposited the check in the bank for collection, and the next week the bank returned it to him unpaid; that is, returned it to Dees, saying that the defendant stopped the payment of it. He contends that defendant thereby broke the contract for the purchase of this land, and contends that he never agreed subsequent to that time to rescind the contract and to take up the papers. He contends that defendant thereby broke the contract for the purchase of this land. He contends that the price agreed upon was $200 per acre, and that when defendant broke his contract by refusing to pay the $400 check the land had gone down and had depreciated at least $25 per acre, 12½ per cent. from the value of it at the time of the contract, and contends he is willing to have you answer the first issue 'Yes,' and contends that he has been at all times ready, able, and willing to comply with his contract, and asks you to answer the third, 'Yes,' and the fourth 'Yes,' and contends that he is entitled to the difference between what the land was worth at the date of the contract and what it was worth on the day the defendant broke his contract.

Now these are the contentions of the plaintiff: He contends that you should, on all of this evidence, answer the first issue, 'Yes,' that there was a contract; that you should answer the second, 'No'; that you should answer the third, 'Yes,' and the fourth, 'Yes,' and contends that you should answer the fifth issue, '$1,400.' He says that is the difference between the contract price and the value of the land at the date of the breach. Now, the defendant contends this paper writing does not set out the price of the land; that it does not say that the land was to be worth $200 per acre; that it just deals with the cash payment of the check and the placing of the mortgage and notes in escrow. He contends that the written contract does not contain the entire contract. He contends it was understood and agreed at the time of the contract that the price of the land was to be $200 per acre, and that the contract was not completed unless Grantham, who had bought his home place, would pay the amount due the 1st of January, and contends that on Thursday before the contract was made the agent of the plaintiff, Mr. Rawls, informed him that Grantham was ready and would pay the amount, and that the contract was predicated on that, and that this check for four hundred dollars was given only as evidence of good faith to carry out the contract. He contends that Grantham has never paid the $4,000, and has not paid it up to this time, and by reason of that failure the contract was not carried out on his part, and that he countermanded payment of this check when he found out that Grantham would not pay him. I do not remember the date he says this check was to be paid, but he contends that if you should find there was a contract as contended for by the plaintiff, and not as contended for by him, you should answer the second issue in his favor. He contends that after the payment of the check had been countermanded he saw Mr. Dees, and Mr. Dees said he had an opportunity to sell the land and that they would rescind the contract. He contends further that, if you should find all the other issues against him, between the time of making the contract and the breaching the land had not depreciated." (Exception No. 1.)

Here the court reads issue.

"If you find from the evidence and by the greater weight of the evidence that this is the contract and all of the contract made on that occasion, and that there was nothing said about Grantham, you would answer that issue, 'Yes,' but if you find that was only a part of the contract and that contract was conditioned upon Grantham's paying $4,000 the 1st of January, you would answer that, 'No.' If you answer that, 'No,' you will not answer the other, but if you answer that, 'Yes,' you will answer the next issue, which is as follows."

Here the court read the next issue and charged as follows:

"The burden is on the defendant to satisfy you by the evidence and the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff agreed with the defendant that the contract might be rescinded, and, if you find that they did so agree, you would answer that 'Yes'; otherwise you would answer it, 'No.'"

Here the court read the third issue, and charged as follows:

"He contends that he has been, and is willing to perform it now, and, if you find from the evidence that he has been ready, able, and willing at all times, you will answer that issue, 'Yes.' If you do not so find, it would be your duty to answer that, 'No.'"

Here the court read the fourth issue and charged as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that the defendant made the contract alleged in the complaint and was not rescinded by him and the plaintiff, and you find that he broke his contract by failing to give this check, then it would be your duty to answer the fourth issue, 'Yes,' that the defendant wrongfully broke his contract, but if you find that he did, you would answer it 'No.' Now, if you answer these issues in favor of the plaintiff, you would answer the last. If you find the contract has been broken, the plaintiff is entitled to recover at least nominal damages. If you find that the defendant breached this contract, the plaintiff would be entitled to nominal damages and whatever damage you find from the evidence he has sustained. Now the burden is upon the plaintiff as to that. He says he has sustained damages to the amount of $1,400. The defendant contends no difference in the value of the land between the date of the contract and the date of the breach. The defendant contends that there was no difference. (Exception No. 2.)

"Now the rule of damage is the value of the land at the date of the contract and the value of it at the date of breach of the contract. (Exception No. 3.)

"Now the difference is what the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, if you find that he is entitled to recover. Now the evidence was the contract price of $200 per acre, and the plaintiff contends that the land had depreciated up to the time of the breach of the contract 12½ per cent., which would make $1,400 in the value of the land between the time of the contract and the time of the breach. (Exception No. 4.)

"Take the issues, gentlemen, and answer them as you may find the facts to be."

Upon denial of liability and issues joined, the jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Did the plaintiff and defendant contract, as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.

"(2) If so, did plaintiff and defendant rescind said contract? A. No.

"(3) If so, has plaintiff been at all times ready, able, and willing to perform the contract on his part? A. Yes.

"(4) Did defendant wrongfully breach the contract, as alleged in the complaint? A. Yes.
 "(5) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? A. $400.00."

Judgment on the verdict in favor of plaintiff, from which the defendant appealed.

Z. V. Rawls, of Bayboro, for appellant.

D. L. Ward, of Newbern, and F. O. Brinson, of Bayboro, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1, 2] Three of the four exceptions, appearing on the record, are directed to portions of his honor's charge in which he undertakes to state the contentions of the parties. Defendant says the contentions of the plaintiff were stated in such a manner as to amount to an expression of opinion from the court. We have examined the charge with a view of determining whether the defendant could have been prejudiced in any degree by the method or form in which the contentions were given, but we have found nothing upon which to base any criticism. The charge as a whole seems to have been fair, impartial, and free from error. Furthermore, these exceptions come within the well-settled rule that objections to the statement of contentions must be made at some appropriate time during the charge, or at its conclusion, so that the trial court may be given an opportunity to correct any error in the respect indicated. State v. Hall, 181 N. C. 527, 106 S. E. 483; McMahan v. Spruce Co., 180 N. C. 636, 105 S. E. 439, and cases there cited.

The other exceptions are without special merit, and must be overruled. We have discovered no sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict and judgment.

No error.

(183 N. C. 226)

In re MCKAY'S WILL. (No. 93.)

1. Evidence ⇨ 251(2)—Evidence of statement of executor concerning testamentary capacity of testatrix held inadmissible.

In a will contest, the admission in evidence of a statement made by the executor prior to the beginning of his executorship, and who was not called as a witness, concerning the testamentary capacity of the testatrix, was error, since it was not binding as an admission against interest as to those claiming under the will; the interest of the executor being of a different character than that of the legatees.

2. Evidence ⇨ 106(1)—Evidence of character of parties cannot be considered as substantive evidence.

In a will contest, an instruction that evidence of the good character of the witnesses should be considered as substantive evidence was error, since evidence of the character of parties and witnesses is admissible only as affecting their credibility, and not substantive proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Cranmer, Judge.

In the matter of the last will and testament of Susan McKay. From a judgment for the caveators, the propounders appeal. New trial.

Issue of devisavit vel non raised by a caveat to the will of Susan McKay. Alleged mental incapacity and undue influence are the grounds upon which the caveat is based. The jury returned the following verdict:

Is the paper writing propounded, and every part and clause thereof, the last will and testament of Susan E. McKay? Answer: No.

Judgment on the verdict from which the propounders appealed.

Hoyle & Hoyle, of Sanford, and Gavin & Jackson, for appellants.

Baggett & Mordecai, of Lillington, and A. A. F. Seawell, of Sanford, for appellees.

STACY, J. There are two fatal errors, appearing on the record, which entitle the propounders to a new trial or to a venire de novo.

[1] John Yarborough, one of the caveators, was allowed to testify, over objection, to an alleged conversation which he had had with M. M. Draughan in regard to the mental capacity of the testatrix. This conversation is alleged to have taken place during the lifetime of the deceased and was offered as an admission or declaration against interest; the said Draughan later having qualified as executor of the will, though not named as a beneficiary therein. Up to this time the executor, who was one of the propounders, had not gone upon the witness stand; and, in fact, he did not testify at all. We think the evidence was incompetent and that its reception was hurtful and prejudicial.

As a general rule, statements or admissions of an executor, or administrator, are not competent or admissible as against the heirs or devisees. Davis v. Gallagher, 124 N. Y. 487, 26 N. E. 1045; Marshall v. Adams, 11 Ill. 37. Especially would this rule be applicable when the alleged declarations, as here, were made prior to the beginning of the executorship. The executor could not then, in a representative capacity, have been engaged in the performance of a duty, pertaining to the estate, so as to make his declarations pertinent and admissible as constituting a part of the res gestae. Church v. Howard, 79 N. Y. 415. As against the beneficiaries under the will, this testimony would fall in the category of hearsay evidence. Furthermore, admissions are received on the principle that they are statements against the interest of the party making them; but, in the instant case, statements made by Draughan, during the lifetime of the testatrix, could not be binding as against those claiming under the will. Jones v. Jones, 21 N. H. 219; Jones on Evidence, vol. 2, § 253. True, the personal representative may propound and defend the will in common with others including the legatees; but, in law, his interest is of a different character from theirs. The mere fact that several persons may have a common interest, as contradistinguished from a joint interest, in a given subject-matter, does not ipso facto render their admissions competent against each other. This is the modern rule, and it is approved by a number of decisions in this and other jurisdictions. Daugherty v. Taylor, 140 N. C. 446, 53 S. E. 296; Belding v. Archer, 131 N. C. 287, 42 S. E. 800; Dean v. Ross, 105 Cal. 227, 38 Pac. 912; Eakle v. Clarke, 30 Md. 322; Hyman v. Wheeler (C. C.) 29 Fed. 347.

"There has been, gentlemen of the jury, evidence tending to show the good character of witnesses who have testified, and if I recall correctly, as to the caveators, some of them at least, and I instruct you that this is substantive evidence and will be so regarded by you in your consideration and deliberation."

Propounders excepted.

This charge was erroneous. Ordinarily, in civil actions, evidence of the character of parties and witnesses is admissible only as affecting the credibility of their testimony. Lumber Co. v. Atkinson, 162 N. C. 301, 78 S. E. 212, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 733, and cases there cited. Such evidence may be corroborative or impeaching in its effect; but as a general rule, it is not to be considered by the jury as substantive proof. The rule may be otherwise in actions for libel and slander, seduction, and the like, where the character of one or more of the parties or principals is directly involved; but this is not one of those cases. For exceptions to the general rule, see Norris v. Stewart, 105 N. C. 455, 10 S. E. 912, 18 Am. St. Rep. 917, and cases there cited.

In all criminal prosecutions, certainly those involving moral turpitude, the defendant may elect to put his character in issue, and thus produce evidence of his good reputation and standing in the community (State v. Hice, 117 N. C. 782, 23 S. E. 357); but, if this be not done, the state cannot offer evidence of his bad character unless and until he has been examined as a witness in his own behalf, and even then—the defendant not electing to put his character in issue—the impeaching testimony is permitted to affect only his credibility as a witness and not the question of his guilt or innocence (Marcom v. Adams, 122 N. C. 222, 29 S. E. 333; State v. Traylor, 121 N. C. 674, 28 S. E. 493). Of course, in proper instances, in criminal cases, where the defendant chooses to put his character in issue, the pertinent evidence, pro and con, then becomes substantive proof and may be considered by the jury as such. State v. Morse, 171 N. C. 777, 87 S. E. 946; State v. Cloninger, 149 N. C. 567, 63 S. E. 154.

For the errors, as indicated, there must be another trial; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

(183 N. C. 743)

STATE v. FREEMAN. (No. 241.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

Criminal law § 1169(1)—Admission of irrelevant evidence held prejudicial.

Though there was some evidence for the jury to consider on the question of defendant's guilt of theft of tobacco, admission without explanation of an unindorsed canceled check, payable to another, or bearer, with the drawing or possession of which defendant was in no way shown to have been connected, and which was therefore irrelevant evidence, will be held prejudicial, as it might have been used by the state, and considered by the jury, to account for the shown fact that on a certain day defendant had money, while the night before he was impecunious.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Devin, Judge.

Hugh Freeman was convicted of larceny and receiving stolen property, and appeals. New trial.

The defendant was indicted for the larceny of 238 pounds of leaf tobacco, the property of E. R. Grissom. There was a count for receiving the tobacco knowing it to have been stolen. The following is the material part of the state's testimony:

F. G. Avent testified: That he was in Raleigh on the 3d day of November, 1921, at the union warehouse. Had carried a load of tobacco there for sale; that he got there the night before. That he lived at his father-in-law's, John Allen, in the "Hurricane." That he, John Allen, and Jesse Jackson drove in a wagon by Grissom's home and went to Raleigh by the Falls of Neuse road. That this was not the nearest road to Raleigh.

That some one asked him to help him pack a pile of tobacco in baskets in a warehouse, and that he helped a man to straighten out a pile of tobacco. That it was placed in baskets in four grades; some of it was lugs or sorry tobacco. The man told him he might have the sticks, as he was not going to plant any the next season. He lived in Warren county, and does not know who the man was, but he thinks it was the defendant. That defendant and his uncle, Mr. Allen, came to his house, and asked him if he could recognize the defendant as the man who got him to help him pack the tobacco in Raleigh. He told them he thought he could.

E. A. Grissom testified: That he lived on Ike Winston's land, and cultivated a crop of tobacco, and had a lot of 238 pounds ready for market on the night of the 2d of November. Somebody entered his pack house and carried it off. That there were three tracks that led from the pack house to the woods, where a horse had trampled the ground. That he traced the tobacco by scraps until within 30 feet of the woods. That he went to Raleigh on Friday and found one pile of his tobacco and recognized it, but did not claim it. That he also recognized the sticks, six of them he found at Avent's. Young testified that he was in a garage on Friday evening when defendant came in and paid a small bill, about $3.25, and said he did not mind paying garage bills if he could make money as easy as he made that last night. Defendant had other money besides that he paid the bill with.

W. C. Young testified that he saw defendant in Raleigh on Friday at the tobacco warehouse about 12 o'clock.

John Young testified that he saw a man asleep early in the morning November 3, in a pile of tobacco, whom he took for defendant.

Latta Harris testified that he ran a garage at Youngsville, and on Thursday evening, the 3d of November, he repaired an auto for defendant, and he pawned his pistol as security, and Friday evening he did more work for him, and he paid him all, about $7, Friday evening.

Jesse Jackson testified that he went in a wagon with Avent and Allen to Raleigh Thursday night; that they passed the woods near Grissom's and went the Falls road to Raleigh.

A. D. Dickerson testified: That E. A. Grissom, the prosecutor, married his daughter. That about seven hours after Grissom missed his tobacco, the witness went down to the woods where the tracks led from the pack house, and in the woods he found a brown piece of paper, on which was written in pencil the words "Hue Freeman" and "Miss Ever Hackody," "Creekmore," "1921." To the introduction of this paper defendant objected, objection overruled, and defendant excepted.

Exception No. 1:

"The state introduced a canceled check for $123, payable to H. B. Allen or bearer, with no indorsement on the back. To the introduction of this paper writing defendant objected. Objection overruled, and defendant excepted."

Exception No. 2: Defendant demurred to the evidence, and himself offered no evidence. There was a verdict of guilty. Defendant moved to set aside the verdict as being against the weight and contrary to the evidence. Motion denied, and defendant excepted.

Assignments of error:

(1) To the introduction of the paper writing with the names "Hue Freeman" and "Miss Ever Hackody," "Creekmore," "1921," on it, because there was nothing connecting defendant with said paper writing; no proof that it is in the defendant's handwriting, or that it was ever in defendant's possession.

(2) To the introduction of canceled check payable to H. B. Allen or bearer, because there was no evidence to connect defendant with it, or that he ever owned it or received the proceeds of it.

(3) The failure of the court to set aside the verdict because the evidence was not sufficient to convict the defendant.

The jury convicted the defendant, and from the judgment he appealed.

N. Y. Gulley, of Wake Forest, and B. T. Holden and W. M. Person, both of Louisville, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. There is one exception by the defendant which we think is well taken. The state introduced in evidence a canceled check for $123, payable to H. B. Allen, or bearer, which was not indorsed. The defendant's objection to this paper as evidence was overruled, and he duly excepted. We are unable to conceive in what way or for what purpose this evidence was competent or relevant. There is nothing on the check showing that it had any connection with the case. It was not drawn by the defendant, so far as appears, and his name is not on it. Why it was allowed to be considered by the jury we were not informed. It was wholly irrelevant to the controversy. But it was contended by the state that, if it was wholly irrelevant, the effect would be, in law, that it was harmless, and not therefore ground for reversal. But we are not sure of this conclusion. Having been admitted by the court over the defendant's objection, it was capable of being used by the state as some evidence of the defendant's guilt, in connection with the other evidence, and was no doubt so used. It was argued before us that it was so used and very effectively. This is not in the record, but we are at liberty to infer that, as the court held it to be relevant and competent evidence of guilt, the state made use of it, as such, to further a conviction. It does not appear to us that it was harmless or did not prejudice the defendant. While there is nothing to connect the defendant with the drawing of the check, or the possession of it at any time, it was no doubt used for the purpose of showing that, as he had money on Thursday, when he had none on the day before, he must have received the money in some way by means of the check, but this is not a warrantable inference. There is no evidence that the check was found in defendant's possession and taken from him. There is nothing more in the proof than the bare check itself, without the least explanatory evidence, and it should have been excluded by the court as prejudicial to the defendant. It cannot be said that irrelevant evidence, though generally so, is always harmless. We have held otherwise. State v. Jones, 93 N. C. 611; State v. Mikle, 81 N. C. 552. It may sometimes, even though rarely, be very prejudicial to the party against whom it is admitted, as it was held to be in State v. Jones, supra. Considering the nature of the other evidence in this case, that relating to the check, though technically irrelevant, might have been used to account for defendant's having money at one time when the night before he was impecunious, and we have no doubt it was so used by the state and considered by the jury.

There was evidence upon which the jury could have convicted the defendant, apart from the check, but they should have been confined to the competent and relevant proof in considering the case. He was the man who was seen at the tobacco warehouse the day after the theft was committed, and was recognized as the man who had the tobacco there and asked the witness F. G. Avent to help him to straighten it out and pack it, and gave him the sticks, as he was not going to plant tobacco the next season. The evidence was sufficient to identify the defendant as the one who had the tobacco at the warehouse. State v. Carmon, 145 N. C. 481, 59 S. E. 657; State v. Lytle, 117 N. C. 803, 23 S. E. 476; State v. Costner, 127 N. C. 506, 37 S. E. 326, 80 Am. St. Rep. 809; State v. Lane, 166 N. C. 333, 81 S. E. 620. But the evidence as to identity is stronger here than it was in those cases. There was evidence as to the identity of the tobacco found in the warehouse with that which was stolen.

While we hold that there was some evidence for the jury to consider upon the question of defendant's guilt, that in regard to the check was incompetent, and should not have been admitted, and was sufficiently prejudicial to entitle the defendant to another trial.

The other exceptions may not be again presented.

New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). I concur in the statement in the opinion of the court that "there was evidence, upon which the jury could have convicted the defendant, apart from the check." This also clearly appears upon the summing up of the evidence as set out by Mr. Justice WALKER. The evidence in regard to the check may have had slight probative force, and the jury may have thought that it would add none. But the evidence was not incompetent, but merely irrelevant. It could have had no prejudicial effect.

The defendant was not entitled to a new trial for the mere admission of irrelevant testimony. The admission of merely irrelevant testimony cannot be held for error unless it is shown to be prejudicial. Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Arnold, 35 N. C. 189; often cited since; Bynum, J., in State v. Gallor, 71 N. C. 92, 17 Am. Rep. 3; Smith, C. J., in Com'rs v. Lash, 89 N. C. 165, as in Gaylord v. Respass, 92 N. C. 557, and in Jones v. Call, 93 N. C. 170; Deming v. Gainey, 95 N. C. 532; and there are numerous other cases to this well-settled principle.

It cannot be shown that this evidence was prejudicial; for, if it does not tend to show the guilt of the defendant, it proves nothing, and is harmless. It is not enough that the defendant should assert that the evidence, if irrelevant, was hurtful, but that must be pointed out, and this has not been done.

PETERSON et al. v. TIDEWATER POWER CO. (No. 287.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 29, 1922.)

1. Gas \S 20(2)—Evidence as to manner of connecting gas pipes held competent in action for burning building.

In an action against a gas company for damages for the burning of a cottage to which defendant supplied gas, the fire starting shortly after the connections had been made, evidence as to how the work of connecting the pipes and testing them was done held competent in support of plaintiff's contention that the fire originated through the negligence of defendant's employees.

2. Evidence \S 113(19)—Tax lists held inadmissible as to value of property destroyed by fire.

In an action for the destruction by fire of plaintiff's cottage, due to the alleged negligence of the employees of defendant gas company in connecting the gas pipes, it was not error to exclude tax lists as evidence of the value of the property destroyed; another owning the property when the lists were made up.

3. Evidence ¶113(19)—Tax lists held competent to show estimate of value of property destroyed.

In an action for destruction of a cottage by fire, tax lists would be competent to show any estimate of the value of the property made by plaintiffs.

4. Evidence ¶501(7)—Opinion evidence as to the value of cottage destroyed by fire held competent.

In an action for the destruction of plaintiff's cottage by fire, alleged to be due to the negligence of the servants of the gas company in connecting gas pipes, an estimate of a witness, based on reconstruction cost, as to the value of the property destroyed, was properly considered on question of amount of loss, where identity in construction of the cottage destroyed and of new cottage on the same site was first established.

5. Appeal and error ¶1048(5)—Where question not answered, error, if any, harmless.

Where a witness is asked a question, but fails to answer it, and there is no showing what the answer would have been, the error, if any, is harmless.

6. Gas ¶20(2)—Rules of insurance company as to insurance held irrelevant as to destruction of property by fire.

In an action for the destruction by fire of a summer cottage through the alleged negligence of the employees of a gas company supplying the cottage with gas, the rules of insurance companies relative to placing insurance on beach property held irrelevant and incompetent.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Connor, Judge.

Action by Emily T. Peterson and others against the Tidewater Power Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. No error.

This was a civil action, brought by the plaintiff to recover damages of the defendant for the alleged negligent burning by the defendant of the feme plaintiff's cottage and furniture at Wrightsville Beach. The action was tried before his honor, Judge Connor, and a jury, at the October term, 1921, of the superior court of New Hanover county, which trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

At the trial the defendant admitted the plaintiff's ownership in fee simple of the lands and premises described in the complaint, but required the plaintiffs to put in the deed, which showed the purchase price of the property alleged to have been destroyed through the negligence of the defendant.

The defendant admitted in the pleadings: That it was a corporation engaged in the business of supplying the town of Wrightsville Beach and persons along its system with electricity for lights, power, and gas for lighting, heating, cooking, and other purposes, charging its usual rates for gas and electricity. That upon the tract of land described in the complaint was a summer residence or cottage, which was not occupied during the winter months, but occupied only during the summer months, and that the plaintiff had household and kitchen furniture for living purposes in said cottage, and was preparing to move down and occupy said cottage for the summer season, expecting to begin such occupancy on the 3d day of June, 1920.

That it was the custom of the company to cut off its supply of electricity and gas to cottages in the early fall by disconnecting, in some manner, the supply of gas and electricity from such cottages at the main pipe and wires feeding said cottages, and that before gas and electricity were turned into the cottage they required the owner, or person expecting to occupy such cottage, to make application to the defendant for connecting up and turning on the gas and electricity, and required the keys to the cottage to be surrendered to the defendant so that they might enter the same and inspect the meters and connect with the supply of electricity and gas, which had been disconnected the previous fall.

That on the 31st day of May, 1920, application was made for gas service for the plaintiffs' cottage, and the keys to the same were turned over to the defendant, to enable it, or its agents, or servants, to enter such cottage and connect up the gas fixtures so that the plaintiffs could use and consume gas according to their needs for cooking and heating purposes, and that the plaintiffs paid the defendant its charges for such service. That it was the custom of the defendant, immediately after making the necessary connections, to turn on the flow of gas and light the same, in order to ascertain whether or not its patrons would be able to receive the expected service. That in disconnecting the gas in the fall the defendant's custom was to disconnect the metal or iron pipe which conducted the gas through the meter at some point inside the building, near where the pipe entered the meter, and this was the method used in the plaintiffs' cottage.

That on the 1st day of June, 1920, between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock a. m., before the plaintiffs had moved into said cottage, the defendant's servants, or employees, entered said cottage to connect up, test out, and put in proper condition the gas fixtures for use by the plaintiff, and that in a very short time after the defendant's employees had left the cottage fire was discovered in the kitchen or rear part of the cottage, at and around where the defendant's employees had been working and connecting the gas, and that gas from the defendant's pipe was pouring out into said cottage a burning flame, and the plaintiffs' cottage and furnishings were completely destroyed and consumed by the said fire.

The foregoing facts are substantially admitted in the pleadings, the only denials of the defendant being that as to negligence and the value of the property destroyed by the fire; the defendant stating, in the ninth paragraph of its answer, that it was probably more than an hour after defendant's employees left the house before the fire was discovered.

The evidence tended to show, in addition: That when Mr. Peterson moved out of the cottage the previous fall all matches and combustible materials had been removed from the cottage. That Mr. Peterson, about a week previous to the fire, and before he surrendered the keys to the defendant company, for the purpose of connecting up the gas and electricity, visited the cottage and left the same securely locked and fastened, and that there was no fire in the cottage. That the defendant's employees, during the morning about 12 o'clock, entered the cottage with the keys to install the meter and connect the gas in the kitchen, and this they did, and, after doing so, lighted the gas to test it out. There is no evidence that any other person from that time until the fire was discovered was in, at, or around the plaintiffs' cottage. That Mrs. Peterson left Lumina on the 1:15 car, and went to visit Mrs. Colucci, who was occupying the cottage next to Peterson's, and after she had been on the porch for a few minutes she heard a noise in the Peterson cottage, which sounded like that made when she turned on the gas in her gas range and put the match to it, when it does not catch, making a "sizzling noise," and she called the attention of Mrs. Colucci to the same. A few minutes thereafter she saw fire coming out of the weatherboarding, where a few minutes before she had seen smoke coming from the cottage. She tried the doors and found them locked, and could not get in. The kitchen door was then forced open, and flames were found burning around the gas meter. The noise which she heard when she first called Mrs. Colucci's attention to it was like that of gas coming out of a pipe.

John Cowan testified that when the door was broken open, all he could see was an arm of flame coming out with a hissing sound.

Mrs. Jacobs testified that the meter was near the gas stove, and a long flame was coming out, making a "sizzling sound," and that she heard the noise before the cottage was broken into.

The cottage and its contents were totally destroyed by the fire.

Rountree & Carr, of Wilmington, for appellant.

WALKER, J. We are of the opinion that the testimony of the witnesses tended to show that before the defendant's servants entered the cottage for the purpose of connecting the house fixtures with the main outside, so as to furnish a supply of gas for domestic uses, Mr. Peterson, one of the plaintiffs and owners of the cottage, had gone into it, and upon leaving the cottage he securely locked and fastened the same, and there was no fire in there. It further appears by the testimony that there was nothing in the house that would cause a fire, until the defendant's employees entered it to do the work the defendant had ordered them to do. Soon after the workmen had finished—or supposed they had—fire broke out and consumed the cottage. No one, so far as appears, entered the building from the time the workmen left it until the fire was first discovered, by neighbors, coming through the weatherboarding and the roof. A door of the kitchen, where defendant's servants had been working an hour or two before, at the gas meter, was broken open, and flames "were coming out of the gas pipe of the meter in the kitchen," with a hissing sound. The kitchen was so full of smoke that another witness could not tell where the flame was coming from. The fire was in that part of the house, or kitchen, where the work had been done an hour or so before. How long it was after the workmen left the building and the first appearance of the fire was not definitely fixed, but it was not so long as to exclude altogether the reasonable inference, which the jury could draw, that the cause of the fire, and the only probable cause, under the circumstances, was some negligent act committed by the workmen in connecting the pipes. McRainey v. Railroad, 168 N. C. 570, 84 S. E. 851. There was some evidence that they used matches in making tests to discover if there was any escaping gas, and the jury, under the evidence, would be warranted in finding that the fire was started by the careless handling of the matches.

[1] It was competent and proper for the jury to consider the testimony of Hufham and Burt Kite, and other testimony of a similar kind, as to how the work of connecting the pipes, and especially the testing of them, was done, as affording some evidence in support of plaintiffs' allegation and contention that the fire originated in the house from some cause attributable to the manner in which the work was done by defendant's employees, or to their negligent conduct.

We are fully aware of the rule stated in Byrd v. Express Co., 139 N. C. 273, 51 S. E. 851, that the proof of negligence causing damage must be of such a nature as to reasonably warrant an inference of the fact required to be established, and must be more than merely conjectural, but we do not think that the evidence in this case falls within the class which we there excluded as insufficient to be considered by the jury, as there is some testimony here which reasonably tends to prove the act of negligence. There is evidence from which the jury could reasonably infer that all other causes for the fire had been eliminated, leaving none but those attributable to defendant's want of care, or that of its employees, which is the same thing.

Our last observation is an adequate answer to the position taken by the defendant that there is no proof of the origin of the fire or any which tends reasonably to show that it is imputable to the defendant's negligence, or that of its servants engaged, at the time, in doing the work of connecting the pipes in the house for it, and the cases cited by the defendant in its brief to sustain its position are not applicable to the facts of this case, while the principle of law stated in them is admitted to be correct.

[2, 3] There was no error in the ruling of the court by which the tax lists, as evidence of the true value of the property, were excluded. Williams owned the property when the lists were made up, and not the plaintiffs. It would be competent to show any estimate of its value made by the plaintiffs, but that was not what was proposed to be done. It was therefore hearsay (res inter alios acta) and incompetent. Ridley v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 37, 32 S. E. 379; Railroad Co. v. Land Co., 137 N. C. 330, 49 S. E. 350, 68 L. R. A. 333; Hamilton v. Railroad Co., 150 N. C. 193, 63 S. E. 730; Powell v. Railroad Co., 178 N. C. 243, at page 249, 100 S. E. 424. What is said in the case last cited (178 N. C. at page 249, 100 S. E. at page 427) is pertinent:

"The court excluded the circumstance that where the official board of valuation had assessed property at a higher rating after the alleged injury, the then owner, ancestor in title of the present plaintiff, appeared before them and endeavored to have same reduced. So far as the action of the board of assessors was concerned, it has been generally ruled irrelevant on the question of valuation. Hamilton v. Railroad, 150 N. C. 193. And as to the action of plaintiff's predecessor in title, his action as indicated tended to favor his own position on the issue, and its exclusion could in no sense be held to have prejudiced defendant's case."

This fits our case exactly.

[4, 5] The estimate of the witness Peterson as to the value of the property destroyed was permitted to be considered by the jury, not for the purpose of showing that the old cottage and the new cottage built on the same site were of the same value, but, a substantial identity in the construction of the two having been first shown, it was allowed to go to the jury merely as a circumstance to be considered by them in finding the amount of loss, or damage; and, admitted, as it was, with this restriction, we think it was competent. The learned judge carefully guarded his ruling by requiring that the two buildings must have been substantially alike, in order for them to consider the value of the one as a circumstance bearing upon the value of the other, and not as being of the same value. This evidence was allowed to be considered by the jury, we suppose, upon the authority of Belding v. Archer, 131 N. C. 287, 42 S. E. 800, and Powell v. Railroad Co., 178 N. C. at pages 248, 249, 100 S. E. 424, citing R. C. L. pp. 175, 176. Such evidence, when confined within its proper limits, should not be objectionable, as said in the last-cited case. But the witness did not answer the question, nor are we informed what his answer would have been if he had been permitted to answer the same. It was therefore harmless, as we have so often held.

[6] We do not see how the rules of the insurance companies relative to placing insurance on beach property was at all relevant or competent.

The other exceptions are without any merit, and, upon the whole case, after a careful review of it, we find no ground for disturbing the judgment of the court below.

No error.

ALLEN v. SMITH et al. (No. 257.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Wills \S 638—Death of devisee before happening of contingency held to cause devise of contingent life estate to lapse.

Where a devise was to the testator's wife for life and then to his son for his life, the death of the son, before the death of the testator caused the devise of the contingent life estate to him to lapse.

2. Wills \S 637—Failure of intermediate devise of life estate to take effect held to cause vesting of title in fee in children of testator.

Where a testator devised land to his wife for her life and to his son for his life, with remainder in fee to his children and their heirs, surviving after the death of his son, the death of the son during testator's life caused the life estate devised to him to fail, and the remainder vested in the children of the testator in fee.

3. Wills — 616(1)—Devise held to convey life estate without right of disposal.

A devise, "I give all my estate, both personal and real, and wherever situated, to my wife for and during her natural life to do with as she pleases and have the income therefrom," did not give the widow a right to convey or dispose of the estate."

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Devin, Judge.

Action by W. G. Allen against Rachel S. Smith and others. From a judgment finding that defendants were able to convey to plaintiff good title to certain land, and requiring plaintiff to accept a deed and to pay the purchase price of the land, plaintiff accepts and appeals. Affirmed.

This is a controversy as to the ownership of and title to the tract of land containing 242.5 acres in Swift Creek township, Wake county, which is particularly described in the record. The ability of the defendants to convey a good and perfect title to the plaintiff in compliance with their contract depends upon the true construction of Bryant Smith's will, hereinafter set forth; Arthur E. Smith, the son of Bryant Smith, named therein, being dead, and the widow of said Bryant Smith being still alive. The defendants are the children of the testator and their husbands or wives, as the case may be.

By agreement of the parties, the case was submitted to the court (Judge Devin presiding) to find the facts and declare the law thereon and enter judgment accordingly. The facts were found by the court, and the following judgment entered, which contains a recital of the facts thus found:

"The above-entitled action duly and regularly coming on to be heard, and being heard, and it appearing to the court that all the defendants above mentioned have been either served with summons or have accepted service of summons, and have all been duly and properly made parties to this action and are in court, and that all of the parties, plaintiff and defendants, have waived a trial by jury and consented that the court shall find the facts and determine the law concerning the matters in controversy, and that the same may be done by the undersigned judge, either in term or out of term, and either within or out of Wake county, and the court having heard the evidence offered by the parties, hereupon the court doth find and adjudge as follows, to wit:

"(1) That the defendants executed the option to the plaintiff, dated December 6, 1921, copy of which is attached to the answer.

"(2) That Rachel S. Smith is the widow of Bryant Smith, deceased, and D. C. Smith, C. E. Smith, Evie Morgan, Bessie Jordan, and Mollie F. Morris, are the children of said Bryant Smith, deceased, and that the said Bryant Smith left a last will and testament in the words and form set forth in paragraph 4 of the complaint, as follows:

"Raleigh, N. C., April 23, 1907.

"This is my last will and testament:

"I give all my estate both and real, and where ever situated to my wife for and during her natural life to with as she pleases and have the income therefrom.

"At the death of my wife if my son Arthur E. Smith should survive his mother—I give all my estate both real and personal to him during his life, and at his death then to be equally divided among my children who then may be living—if any of my children should be dead, their heirs to inherit their share.

"I want all my just debts paid and my body to have a decent burial.

"I nominate and appoint my son, David C. Smith and T. A. Smith executors hereto without bond.

"Bryant X Smith."

"(3) That the said Bryant Smith died seized and possessed of the land described in paragraph 3 of the complaint, and being the land described in the said option hereinbefore referred to.

"(4) That the said Bryant Smith left him surviving his widow, the said Rachel Smith, and five children, to wit, D. C. Smith, C. E. Smith, Evie Morgan, Bessie Jordan, and Mollie F. Morris.

"(5) That Arthur E. Smith, the son of Bryant Smith, mentioned in the will of the said Bryant Smith, predeceased his said father.

"(6) That the defendants, D. C. Smith, C. E. Smith, Evie Morgan, Bessie Jordan, and Mollie F. Morris, are now seized of an indefeasible estate in fee simple in the said land, subject only to the life estate of their mother, the said Rachel S. Smith, therein.

"(7) That the defendants are able to convey to the plaintiff a good title to the said land, and have offered to the plaintiff a valid deed conveying to him a good, sure, and indefeasible title to the said land in fee simple.

"(8) That the plaintiff be and he is hereby required to accept said deed and pay to the defendants the purchase price of said land mentioned in said option, to wit, the sum of $6,300, with interest thereon from the — day of —, 1921.

"(9) That the defendants recover of the plaintiff and his surety, Daniel Allen, their costs in this action to be taxed by the clerk of the court.

W. A. Devin, Judge."

To the foregoing judgment, the plaintiff accepted and appealed.

Templeton & Templeton, of Raleigh, for appellant.

R. N. Simms, of Raleigh, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] As Arthur E. Smith's life interest was contingent upon his surviving his mother it never has, and never can, vest in him as he failed to survive his mother. He also died before his father and by reason of that fact the devise to him lapsed. This is conceded by the plaintiff. The contingency upon which the estate in the land was limited to the children can never happen, as it has become impossible by Arthur's death in the lifetime of his mother and even of his father. Either one of two results must follow, the estate was thereby vested absolutely in the testator's children under the will, or they took it by inheritance from their father, and in either case they can convey a good title. The intermediate devise for life to Arthur, the son, having failed to take effect, either by lapse or by his death, in the lifetime of his mother, or before the happening of the contingency upon which it was limited, that is, his survival of his mother, it is the same as if it had never existed, and was no obstacle to the complete vesting of the remainder in the children in fee. It matters not, as we have before said, how the remainder, after the death of the widow, Mrs. Rachel Smith, vests in them, whether under the will of their father or by inheritance from him, for in either view they have the vested estate, subject only to their mother's life interest. We cannot adopt the plaintiff's contention that the contingency which would have affected the children's interest if Arthur had lived and survived his mother, should be transferred by construction of the terms of the devise to her life estate so that only those children who outlive her will take, as they only could take had Arthur continued to live and survived his mother. At the time of Arthur's death, all the children were living, and are still living. Arthur's estate never took effect, as he did not survive his mother, and because of this contingency annexed to it, namely, that he should survive her in order for the life estate to vest in him, it never can take effect, or vest in him.

This view has the advantage of executing the intention of the testator as manifestly declared in his will; his object being that his wife should have the first life estate, and, if Arthur survived her, he was to have the second life estate, with remainder at his death to the testator's children who then may be living. A limitation somewhat similar to the one contained in this will, will be found in 2 Underhill on Wills (Ed. of 1900) p. 731, § 557, and note 2. The testator evidently intended to provide for a life estate in the land to Arthur, if he outlived his mother, and, if he did not, that his children should then have the remainder in fee at the death of their mother, which would be a vested one.

[3] There is nothing in the contention that, by the terms of the will and especially by the expression, "I give all my estate both [personal] and real, and where ever situated to my wife for and during her natural life to [do] with as she pleases and have the income therefrom," the widow has the right to convey or dispose of any part of the estate; her interest being restricted to an estate during her life. Herring v. Williams, 158 N. C. 1, 73 S. E. 218. In the passage quoted above the testator referred to her life estate and to no greater interest, as being in her, or intended to be vested in her, nor to her right to dispose of any such interest in the land.

As to the interest originally acquired by Arthur E. Smith being contingent in its nature, see Starnes v. Hill, 112 N. C. 1, 16 S. E. 1011, 22 L. R. A. 598, and Richardson v. Richardson, 152 N. C. 705, 68 S. E. 217.

We agree with the court below that a deed, properly executed by the defendants, and sufficient in form and legal effect to convey the interests of the parties to it, will, when properly proved and registered, pass to the plaintiff a good and indefeasible title to the land in question.

There was no error in the judgment upon the findings of fact.

Affirmed.

HERNDON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. (No. 10773.)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 13, 1921.)

1. Continuance ⇐31—Motion because defendant not prepared to meet issue held addressed to court's discretion.

In a passenger's action for the loss of her trunk and contents, a motion for a continuance after introduction of testimony, because defendant was not prepared to meet testimony raising the issue of an intrastate transaction, was within the discretion of the presiding judge, and its refusal was not an abuse of discretion.

2. Carriers ⇐405(1) — Journey decided on after reaching destination of interstate trip held intrastate, and not controlled by interstate limitation as to loss of baggage.

Where an interstate passenger, after reaching her destination, decided because of the failure of a friend to meet her to go to another place within the state, and rechecked her trunk without physical delivery, such journey was intrastate, and not controlled by the interstate limitation of liability as to loss of baggage.

3. Carriers ⇐408(6)—Where evidence supporting recovery was uncontradicted, verdict properly directed.

In a passenger's action for the loss of her trunk and contents, where her evidence showed that the journey was an intrastate one, and defendant offered no evidence on that point, a verdict was properly directed.

Appeal from Richland County Court; M. S. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. E. Herndon against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barnett & McDonald, of Columbia, for appellant.

Graydon & Graydon, of Columbia, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. Action for $556.21, the value of a trunk and contents belonging to the plaintiff, and alleged to have been lost in transit.

The main point of contention is in reference to the character of the shipment, interstate, or intrastate, and the applicability of the limitation of $100 recovery in case of loss of baggage. The facts are as follows:

The plaintiff, then unmarried, but engaged to a young man in the army at Camp Jackson, lived at Bristol, Va. It had been arranged between them that she should meet him at Spartanburg, where they would be married. She accordingly left Bristol, Va., on January 22, 1921, buying a ticket and having her trunk checked from Bristol, Va., to Johnson City, Tenn. At the latter point she bought a ticket and had her baggage rechecked to Spartanburg. She arrived at Spartanburg via the Carolina, Clinchfield & Ohio Railroad at 6:20 p. m., and, not meeting her fiancé there, as was expected, she decided to go on to Columbia. Accordingly she bought a ticket from Spartanburg to Columbia over the defendant's line, and had her trunk checked to Columbia. The trunk was in good order when it was rechecked at Spartanburg, according to plaintiff's testimony, as she says she saw it there at that time. The trunk was not delivered to her physically when she surrendered the other check and had it rechecked to Columbia. She left Spartanburg at 7:20 p. m., remaining there only one hour. On arrival at Columbia a trunk bearing the corresponding check was offered to her, but, not being her trunk, it was refused. Subsequently her trunk was located at Sumter, having been entered and robbed of her entire outfit.

Upon the trial, after the plaintiff and her husband had testified, defendant's counsel, apprehending that the plaintiff's testimony was directed to establishing an intrastate and not an interstate transaction, and not being prepared to meet this issue, moved for a continuance, which was refused. The defendant offered in evidence the baggage tariff limiting recovery to $100, and at the close of the testimony moved that the court direct a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $100. This was refused, the presiding judge holding that the transaction was an intrastate one, and not controlled by the interstate limitation. He directed the jury to find for the plaintiff the value of the lost property. The jury returned a verdict for $550. Defendant appeals, and raises these questions: (1) Error in refusing the motion for a continuance; (2) error in not granting the motion for a directed verdict; (3) error in not leaving the issue of interstate or intrastate character of the transaction to the jury.

[1] 1. As to the motion for continuance: This was a matter within the discretion of the presiding judge, which does not appear to have been abused.

[2] 2. As to the character of the transaction, interstate or intrastate: If the testimony of the plaintiff be true, the journey originally interstate, from Bristol, Va., to Spartanburg, S. C., terminated upon her arrival in Spartanburg. She had the right there to present the check and receive her trunk. Instead of doing this, she decided to make another journey, separate and distinct from her original journey, for it was superinduced by an incident which happened after the original journey had terminated, namely, the failure of her fiancé to meet her in Spartanburg. If she had called for her trunk, received it at Spartanburg, left it on the platform until she bought a ticket to Columbia, and then called for a check to Columbia, we do not apprehend that there would be any dispute of the proposition that she had undertaken a new journey, an intrastate one; she did what was equivalent to this when she bought a new ticket and had her baggage rechecked to Columbia. Upon the facts, therefore, testified to by the plaintiff the presiding judge was right in holding that the journey was intrastate.

[3] 3. The third question is embarrassing—the right of the presiding judge to assume that the plaintiff's testimony was true. Upon principle, it would seem that that was an issue to be determined by the jury, and not by the judge, and that the absence of conflicting testimony should not affect the question. It is entirely possible that the jury may have concluded that, in view of the vital importance to a full recovery of damages that the character of the journey as an interstate one should be established, some doubt was cast upon the truth and reasonableness, under the circumstances, of the plaintiff's narrative, and declined to accept it as true; a right which the jury unquestionably had. But until the court is prepared to overrule the cases of Uzzell v. Horn, 71 S. C. 426, 51 S. E. 253, Bank v. Inman Mills, 74 S. C. 76, 53 S. E. 951, and Slaughter Co. v. Lumber Co., 79 S. C. 338, 60 S. E. 705, they are binding authority, holding that, where the defendant offers no evidence, and the evidence of the plaintiff points all one way, the judge may direct a verdict.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

JOHNSTON-CREWS CO. v. FOLK et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 27, 1922.)

1. Judgment \Leftarrow 715(3)—Decree in creditor's suit declaring a deed valid held not res adjudicata in a subsequent creditor's action.

A decree, holding a deed valid in a creditor's action to have it declared fraudulent and void, was not res adjudicata in a subsequent creditor's action to have it set aside under the recording act, wherein the validity of the deed as between grantor and grantee was conceded, as such matter was not, and could not have been, involved in the former action.

2. Judgment \Leftarrow 713(1)—Essential elements of res adjudicata.

The essential elements of res adjudicata are identity of the parties, identity of the subject-matter, and an adjudication in the former suit of the precise question sought to be raised in the second suit.

3. Judgment \Leftarrow 713(2)—Where former adjudication is conclusive of issues that might have been raised.

If identity of parties and identity of causes of action have been established, the former adjudication is conclusive, not only of the precise issues raised and determined, but of such as might have been raised affecting the main issue, but if the identity of the parties has been established, but the identity of the causes of action has not, any issue appearing to have been actually adjudicated in the former suit is conclusive upon the parties in the subsequent action.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Bill by the Johnston-Crews Company against Richie B. Folk and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The decree of Judge De Vore was as follows:

This matter comes before me on report of the referee herein. This is an action to declare invalid a deed from J. G. Folk to Richie B. Folk, née Chovin, as it affects the rights of plaintiff and other creditors in like situation and circumstance. The deed in question is dated December 24, 1912, and was recorded January 20, 1914. It purported to convey a one-third interest in 1,000 acres of land in Hampton county, S. C. The value of the land is between $10 and $30 per acre. On the executions on the various judgments proved, returns nulla bona have been made by the sheriff. The following claims have been proved: Johnston-Crews Company, judgment dated February 21, 1917, $591.67; Southern Fertilizer & Chemical Company, judgment dated June 25, 1917, $572.10; L. C. Peebles Clothing Company, judgment dated February 21, 1917, $110.25; Crumley-Sharp Hardware Company, judgment dated February 21, 1917, $83.67; W. L. Douglas Hat Company, judgment dated February 21, 1917, $133.75; International Shoe Company, judgment dated February 13, 1917, $300; H. S. Meinhard & Co., $513.44—all of which accrued during 1913.

In addition to the foregoing quite a number of creditors holding claims which were made between the date of the deed and the recording thereof were filed with the attorney for plaintiff and the referee.

There seems to be very little dispute regarding the facts of the case. J. G. Folk operated a store at Brunson during 1913, and made numerous accounts. So far as the records in the office of the clerk of court went, there was nothing to disclose the transaction of the deed in question. There is some testimony that credit was advanced him on faith of his ostensible ownership of one-third of a 1,000-acre plantation. He conveyed this in 1912, and the deed was not recorded by his wife, the grantee, until 1914. J. G. Folk testified that he was "broke" when he went in business. He was insolvent as the record shows. No apparent dispute has arisen between the parties or in argument as to the facts. Hence, in so far as this case is concerned, the prayer of the plaintiff must be granted.

The defendants, some of whom have been recently substituted for J. G. Folk, now deceased, mainly rely, and certainly in argument of counsel before me, relied upon the plea of res adjudicata set up in the answer. There was a suit brought by H. S. Meinhard & Co. for itself and others against J. G. Folk and his wife prior to the bringing of this suit by Johnston-Crews Company for itself and others against the same defendants. The Meinhard suit was an action to set aside the deed for fraud as the complaint discloses. The final order in that suit is short, and is as follows:

"The above-entitled case came up before me upon exceptions to the report of the special referee herein and after hearing argument, I find that there was not sufficient testimony to warrant me in setting aside the deed in question for fraud, the complaint stating but the one cause of action for fraud. The complaint was not drawn to set aside the deed under the recording act."

It will be observed that in the Meinhard suit it was adjudicated that the complaint there stated but the one cause of action for fraud, and that the court there specifically stated that the complaint was not drawn to set aside the deed under the recording act. If all other essentials in the establishment of the plea of res adjudicata were present, this court is of the opinion that judgment in the Meinhard case would prevent the successful interposition of the plea in the instant case. A reading of the two complaints clearly discloses that different causes of action are stated therein; the one being for fraud, the other for the recording act.

Therefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the title deed executed by J. G. Folk to Richie B. Chovin, dated December 24, 1912, and recorded January 20, 1914, in Book 22-D, at page 76, in the office of the clerk of court for Hampton county, S. C., be, and same is hereby, declared invalid, and is set aside as to those unpaid creditors hereinabove mentioned and those creditors whose accounts with J. G. Folk were created between the date of the said deed, to wit, December 24, 1912, and the date of the record thereof, to wit, January 20, 1914, and to those to whom J. G. Folk became indebted between said dates.

There are quite a number of creditors whose claims were filed with plaintiff's attorney at the commencement of this action, and also filed with the referee. In order that such creditors may participate in the benefit of this decree, it is ordered that E. M. Peeples be appointed special referee to herein determine the validity and dates of the said claims, and, if no appeal be taken from the decision of said referee, then such claims may be allowed to participate in the benefit of this decree.

It is further ordered that M. F. Thomas be, and he is hereby, appointed special master for the specific purpose of offering for sale and selling the property mentioned and described in the said deed and hereinafter described. It is ordered that the said M. F. Thomas, as special master, be, and he is hereby, required to offer for sale or sell the said property in front of the courthouse at Hampton, S. C., on some convenient sales day hereafter to the highest bidder for cash during the legal hours of sale, said sale to be made after three weeks advertisement of the time, place, and condition of said sale in the Hampton County Guardian, a newspaper, and by posting a copy of such advertisement on the courthouse door of Hampton, S. C.; that upon such sale the said special master shall make, execute, and deliver to the purchaser a good and sufficient title deed to the one-third interest of J. G. Folk, or his estate in and to all that piece, parcel, or tract of land in Hampton county, S. C., containing 1,000 acres, more or less, bounded on the north by lands of Gifford and Beach Branch Church, on the east by Greenleaf, Parnell and others, on the south by the estate of Franklin Johnson, and on the west by lands of Mears and estate of Lawton; that out of the proceeds of such sale the said special master shall first pay the costs and expenses of this action, and then pay to the creditors participating in the benefits of this decree as hereinabove set forth the amount of their respective claims, and, if there be any remaining funds in his hands as such special master, that such be held for disbursement subject to the further orders of this court.

Further ordered that either party shall have leave to apply at the foot of this order for such further orders as may be desired, provided such applicant shall give at least five days' notice to the adverse party of the grounds for such further order.

Let copies of this order be served upon counsel for the defendants forthwith.

W. B. De Loach, of Camden, for appellants.

George Warren, of Hampton, for respondent.

COTHRAN, J. A creditors' bill, seeking to have the court declare invalid, so far as their claims are concerned, a certain deed executed by the debtor to a young woman (afterwards his wife), not recorded within the statutory period, and to subject the interest of the debtor to the payment of said claims.

The following facts appeared: In the year 1912, J. G. Folk, the debtor, was a farmer near Brunson, S. C. He testified that the grantee of the deed, Miss Richie B. Chovin, had been a member of his family since she was 8 years old; that he lost his wife in 1912, and the young woman, who was then about 18 years old and in school in Charleston, was induced to return to his home and assume the cares of his household, upon his promise to convey to her his one-third interest in a tract of land which belonged to his deceased wife, containing about 1,000 acres and valued at $10 to $30 per acre; that she did return, and on December 24, 1912, he executed and delivered the deed in compliance with his agreement; that he married the young woman in 1914. This deed though executed in 1912, was not put upon record until January 20, 1914. In the meantime, in August, 1913, Folk embarked in the mercantile business, and during the year of 1913, contracted debts to wholesale merchants and others to the aggregate amount of about $2,500. Early in the year 1917 these claims were put in judgment, and nulla bona returns were entered upon the executions. At some time prior to February 13, 1918, exactly when does not appear in the record, an action was instituted by Meinhard & Bro., creditors of J. G. Folk—a creditors' bill, against him and his wife—for the purpose of having said deed declared fraudulent and void, under the statute of Elizabeth. This action was terminated in favor of the defendants by the following decree of Judge Spain:

"The above-entitled case came up before me upon exceptions to the report of the special referee herein, and, after hearing argument, I find that there was not sufficient testimony to warrant me in setting aside the deed in question for fraud; the complaint stating but one cause of action for fraud. The complaint was not drawn to set aside the deed under the recording act."

This decree was dated February 13, 1918. On February 20, 1918, a week thereafter, the plaintiff, Johnson-Crews Company, instituted this action for the purpose above stated.

The defendants insist that, the plaintiff having come into the Meinhard suit as a creditor, the decree in that case is res adjudicata, so far as the present cause of action is concerned. Judge De Vore in a decree, which will be reported, held against the contention of the defendants, and granted full relief as prayed for by the plaintiff. The debtor died after the present suit was instituted, and it has been continued against his heirs at law and administratrix, who have appealed from the decree of Judge De Vore. The decree of the circuit judge was right, and should be sustained.

The adjudication sought by the plaintiff to be established in the action at bar is that in 1912, J. G. Folk executed a valid deed conveying his interest in the land to Miss Richie B. Chovan (afterwards his wife); that this deed was not recorded until 1914; that in the meantime Folk contracted debts, being apparently the owner of the land; that while Folk's title fully passed by the deed to his grantee, the latter holds the title subject to the claims of subsequent creditors.

The adjudication sought by the plaintiffs to be established in the former action was that in 1912 J. G. Folk executed an invalid deed, attempting to convey his interest in the land to Miss Richie B. Chovin; that this deed was executed with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and was void; that the title of Folk never passed out of him; and that the land as the property of Folk was subject to the claims of his creditors. This adjudication was denied to the plaintiffs; the court on the contrary holding that the conveyance was not fraudulent, but was a valid transfer of Folk's title to his grantee, reserving expressly the question raised by the plaintiff in the action at bar.

[1] Tested by the principles of the doctrine of res adjudicata, we do not see how it is possible to decide that the second action, involving a diametrically opposite theory, is concluded by the adjudication established in the former action. The first action viciously attacks and denies the validity of the deed; the second, concedes its validity, as between grantor and grantee, and seeks to enforce the rights of subsequent creditors against the holder of the legal title under that deed, a matter which was not and could not have been involved in the former action.

[2] The following have been declared to be the essential elements of res adjudicata: (1) Identity of the parties; (2) identity of the subject-matter; (3) an adjudication in the former suit of the precise question sought to be raised in the second suit. Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35.

1. It may be assumed that the identity of the parties has been established. The former action, that of Meinhard & Bro. was a creditors' bill, in which Johnston-Crews Company intervened and participated by proof of their claim. The action at bar is a creditors' bill instituted by Johnston-Crews Company.

2. As to the identity of the subject-matter, or, as variously expressed the claims, demands, or causes of action: The causes of action in the two suits are essentially different. Entirely different allegations are made, requiring as different evidence. In the one, the validity of the deed is attacked as fraudulent and void; in the other it is conceded to be valid. In the one, the plaintiff could have succeeded only by proving that the deed was executed with the intention on the part of both grantor and grantee, of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of the grantor. In the other the plaintiff can succeed by conceding what was in issue in the former suit, the validity of the deed, and by proving that the plaintiff was a bona fide creditor of the grantor, induced to extend credit to him upon the faith of his ownership of the land, the title to which apparently was in him, unaffected by the deed previously executed, but not recorded until after the debts were contracted.

The point cannot be better illustrated than by the case of Whaley v. Stevens, 21 S. C. 221. In that case the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for obstructing his right of way, and obtained a verdict. Upon appeal (24 S. C. 479) this court held that, the plaintiff having alleged in his complaint that he was entitled to a right of way in gross, and not a right of way appendant or appurtenant to his land, and there being confessedly no evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way in gross, he could not recover, even though he may have proved that he was entitled to a right of way appendant or appurtenant to his land described in the complaint; and that, as there were essential and marked distinctions between the two kinds of rights, the violation of these rights present different and distinct causes of action, which would have to be asserted and established by different and distinct allegations and proofs, the plaintiff's application for leave to amend could not be granted under the provisions of the Code. Judgment was therefore rendered, dismissing the complaint. Thereafter the plaintiff brought a second suit, alleging that he was entitled to a right of way appendant or appurtenant and not in gross, as he alleged in the former action. The defendant pleaded that the first suit was an adjudication of the plaintiff's rights, and barred him, as res adjudicata, from maintaining the second. The plea was sustained by the circuit judge. Upon appeal this court (Justice McIver rendering the opinion of the court) held as follows:

"It is very manifest that the allegations in the complaints filed in the two actions were essentially different, and, as we think, it is equally manifest that the issues presented in the two actions were entirely different. It is true that the general object in both of the actions was the same; that is, to obtain damages for the same obstruction of what appears from the evidence to be substantially the same road, and an order of injunction to restrain defendant from continuing said obstruction. But to obtain the relief sought by the plaintiff, he was bound to establish the affirmative of two issues: First, whether he was entitled to a right of way, as alleged in his complaint; second, whether defendant had obstructed said way. Now, conceding that the second issue was the same in both of the cases, the first issue was certainly not. For, as this court held in the former case, the sole issue presented was whether the plaintiff is entitled to a right of way in gross over the land of defendant, while the issue presented in the present action is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a right of way appurtenant or appurtenant to his plantation known as 'Caneslatch.' As was held in the former case: 'These two rights differ substantially, not in form merely, but in their nature and results. The violation of these, rights present different and distinct causes of action, which would have to be asserted and established by different and distinct allegations and proofs'—and it was for this reason that leave to amend was refused. It follows, therefore, that it has already been adjudged that the causes of action in the two cases are not the same, and certainly a judgment obtained on one cause of action cannot be pleaded as res adjudicata to an action upon another cause of action; for in such a case one of the identities, 'identity in the cause of action,' necessary to a successful maintenance of such a plea, would be lacking, and hence the plea could not be sustained. Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C. 578.

"It seems to be supposed that the cause of action in both of the cases was the defendant's obstruction of the road, and, therefore, that it was the same in both cases. But this was only one of the elements going to make up the plaintiff's cause of action. As is said in Pomeroy on Remedies, section 519, pages 554, 555: 'Every action is based upon some primary right held by the plaintiff, and upon a duty resting upon the defendant corresponding to such right. By means of a wrongful act or omission of the defendant, this primary right and this duty are invaded and broken, and there immediately arises from the breach a new remedial right of the plaintiff, and a new remedial duty of the defendant. Finally, such remedial right and duty are consummated and satisfied by the remedy, which is obtained through means of the action, and which is its object. Now, it is very plain that, using the words according to their natural import and according to their technical legal import, the "cause of action" is what gives rise to the remedial right, or the right of remedy, which is evidently the same as the term, "right of action" frequently used by judges and text-writers. This remedial right, or right of action, does not arise from the wrongful act or omission of the defendant, the delict, alone, nor from the plaintiff's primary right, and the defendant's corresponding primary duty alone, but from these two elements taken together. The "cause of action," therefore, must always consist of two factors: (1) The plaintiff's primary right and the defendant's corresponding primary duty, whatever be the subject to which they relate—person, character, property, or contract; and (2) the delict, or wrongful act of omission of the defendant, by which the primary right and duty have been violated,' etc.

"From this, it follows that the wrongful act of the defendant (if, indeed, it was wrongful), in obstructing the road in question, did not constitute the cause of action in either case, but would be only one of the elements of such cause in both cases, and could only in combination with the other necessary element, the plaintiff's primary right, constitute a cause of action; and as the nature of the plaintiff's right, as alleged in the first case, was essentially different from that alleged in the present action, it would seem to follow that the causes of action in the two cases could not be the same."

This case fully answers the suggestion that might possibly be made, that as the effort of the plaintiffs in each case was to subject the land to the payment of their debts, the causes of action were identical.

[3] 3. As to the third element as stated above: In the case of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35, the element is stated in rather tabloid form thus: "The precise point must have been ruled." This requires some amplification. If the identity of the parties and the identity of the causes of action have been established, the former adjudication is conclusive, not only of the precise issues raised and determined, but of such as might have been raised affecting the main issue. If the identity of the parties has been established, but the identity of the causes of action has not, any issue appearing upon the record or by extrinsic evidence to have been adjudicated in the former suit is conclusive upon the parties in a subsequent action. If the identity of the parties has been established, but the identity of the causes of action has not, the former judgment is conclusive only as to those issues actually determined; that is, the rule of conclusiveness as to matters which might have been litigated has no application. The last proposition is the only one of the three, applicable to the case at bar, and it only will be re-enforced by authorities.

"But the weight of authority is that, where the second action, although between the same parties, is on a different cause of action, the judgment is not conclusive on all matters which might have been litigated in the former action, but only as to such points or questions as were actually in issue and adjudicated therein." 23 Cyc. 1297, citing many cases from Supreme Court of United States and other jurisdictions; 15 R. C. L. 973.

"If the second action is upon the same claim or demand as that in which the judgment pleaded was rendered, the judgment is an absolute bar not only of what was decided, but of what might have been decided. If the second action was upon a different claim or demand, then the judgment is an estoppel 'only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered.' " Bates v. Bodie, 245 U. S. 520, 38 Sup. Ct. 182, 62 L. Ed. 444, L. R. A. 1918C, 555; V-O Co. v. Kirven, 215 U. S. 252, 30 Sup. Ct. 78, 54 L. Ed. 179; Troxwell v. Railroad Co., 227 U. S. 434, 33 Sup. Ct. 274, 57 L. Ed. 586; Radford v. Myers, 231 U. S. 725, 34 Sup. Ct. 249, 58 L. Ed. 454; Hart v. R. Co., 244 U. S. 294, 37 Sup. Ct. 506, 61 L. Ed. 1148.

"The language, therefore, which is so often used that a judgment estops not only as to every ground of recovery or defense actually presented in the action, but also as to every ground which might have been presented, is strictly accurate, when applied to the demand or claim in controversy. * * * But where the second action between the same parties is upon a different claim or demand, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, upon the determination of which the finding or verdict was rendered. * * * On principle, a point not in litigation in one action cannot be received as conclusively settled in any subsequent action upon a different cause, because it might have been determined in the first action." Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. Ed. 195.

In a subsequent suit between the same parties on the same claim, a judgment in the former suit is conclusive as to every matter that might have been determined; but, where the second suit is upon a different claim, the former judgment is conclusive only as to those issues actually determined. Linn Jew v. U. S., 196 Fed. 736, 116 O. C. A. 364; Grider v. Groff, 202 Fed. 685, 121 O. C. A. 95; Savage v. Central Co., 59 Colo. 66, 148 Pac. 254; Scott v. Scott, 83 Conn. 634, 78 Atl. 314, Ann. Cas. 965; Blackford v. Wilder, 28 App. D. C. 535, certiorari denied 205 U. S. 541, 27 Sup. Ct. 788, 51 L. Ed. 922; Prall v. Prall, 58 Fla. 496, 50 South. 867, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 577; State v. Center Creek Mining Co., 262 Mo. 490, 171 S. W. 356; Tudor v. Kennett, 87 Vt. 99, 88 Atl. 520; Elk Graden v. Thayer Co. (D. C.) 206 Fed. 212; Campbell v. Martin, 89 Vt. 214, 95 Atl. 494; Hudson v. Land Co., 71 W. Va. 402, 76 S. E. 797; Campbell v. Hammer, 78 Or. 612, 153 Pac. 475; Campbell v. Mims, 161 Ky. 530, 170 S. W. 1176; Reinke v. Wilkins, 172 Wis. 515, 179 N. W. 751.

"Bar of judgment in another suit for same cause of action between same parties, or those in privity, extends, not only to that which was litigated in earlier suit, but also that which might have been; but, if second suit is on different cause of action, bar of earlier judgment is limited to that which was actually determined." Eastman v. Vermont Co., 236 Mass. 138, 128 N. E. 177.

"Where the second suit is upon a different cause of action, but between the same parties as the first, the judgment in the first action operates as an estoppel as to every issue actually litigated in the first action, but is not conclusive as to matters which might have been, but were not litigated." Pierce v. Bank, (O. C. A.) 268 Fed. 487.

"Where the second action is upon a different claim but between the same parties, the judgment in the prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted upon the determination of which the findings or verdict was rendered." In re Walsh Est., 80 N. J. Eq. 565, 74 Atl. 563.

"The rule that a judgment not only estops as to the matters actually litigated, but also as to those that might be litigated, applies to actions based on the same claim or demand." McKimmon, Currie & Co. v. Caulk, 170 N. C. 54, 86 S. E. 809.

Judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the cause and the parties held to estop the parties and their privies as to all issuable matters contained in the pleadings, and which were material, and were, in fact, determined, but not as to matters which might have been litigated or causes of action which plaintiff might have joined. Whitaker v. Garren, 167 N. C. 658, 83 S. E. 759.

"The rule that a judgment is conclusive, not only of the question actually determined, but of all matters which might have been decided in the suit, refers only to matters properly belonging to the subject of the controversy and within the scope of the issues." Fourche Co. v. Walker, 96 Ark. 540, 132 S. W. 451.

"A judgment in a prior action operates as an estoppel only as to those matters in issue or points controverted, on the determination of which a finding or verdict was rendered." Schilstra v. Van Den Heuvel, 82 N. J. Eq. 155, 90 Atl. 1056.

"A judgment is conclusive by way of estoppel only as to facts without the existence and proof or admission of which it could not have been rendered." Sbarbero v. Miller, 72 N. J. Eq. 248, 65 Atl. 472.

For a prior judgment to be an estoppel on an issue in a subsequent suit, it must appear from the record that the determination of such issue was necessary to the judgment, or it must be shown by extrinsic evidence that such issue was actually litigated. Anderson v. Butterick, 132 Minn. 30, 155 N. W. 1045.

"While a judgment is conclusive upon matters raised by the pleadings or which might have been properly adjudicated thereunder, it is not conclusive as to causes of action which plaintiff might have joined, but which were not, in fact, joined or included in the pleadings." Ludwick v. Penny, 158 N. C. 104, 73 S. E. 228.

In Water Co. v. City, 160 Fed. 41, 90 C. C. A. 547, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 219, the plaintiff sued on an express contract for light supplied the city, and judgment was rendered in favor of the city. He then brought a second suit based upon a quantum meruit. The defendant pleaded the first adjudication in bar, but the court held that the causes of action were different, and overruled the plea. They say:

"The fact that a party through mistake attempts to exercise a right to which he is not entitled or has made choice of a supposed remedy which never existed, and pursued it until the court adjudged that it never existed, does not preclude him from afterwards pursuing a remedy for relief, to which in law and good conscience he is entitled."

A judgment creditor, who has filed in a suit brought to have conveyances made by his debtor shortly prior to making a general assignment, declared fraudulent and void, may thereafter maintain a bill to have the conveyances adjudged part of the general assignment. Elgin Co. v. Meyer (C. C.) 29 Fed. 225.

In the case last cited, a debtor being insolvent executed certain conveyances in payment of certain debts; the plaintiff brought an action to have them declared fraudulent and void and to subject the property to the payment of its judgment; the issues were found in favor of the defendant. Thereafter the plaintiff brought a second action, alleging that the conveyances, though made in payment and satisfaction of conceded indebtedness, should be treated as merely a part of the general assignment, under the rule by which all conveyances made at the same or nearly the same time by an insolvent of all of his property are adjudged parts of one general assignment. The plea of res adjudicata was interposed, but was overruled, in a decree by Circuit Judge Brewer, afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court, upon the ground that a plaintiff who mistakes his remedy is not merely estopped from thereafter asserting his real rights and pursuing his real remedy. There is no decided case in this state that states a doctrine contrary to this.

In Maxwell v. Connor, 1 Hill, Eq. 14, the defendant in an action at law upon a note to which he was surety failed to set up the defense that he had been discharged by an unwarranted extension of time to the principal debtor, and judgment went against him. It was properly held that in a subsequent action in equity, involving his liability on the same note, he was estopped by the former adjudication.

In Trimmer v. Thomson, 19 S. C. 247, the defendants were sued as executors upon a note of their testator; they pleaded plene administravit; judgment generally went against them. The second suit was against them individually, upon the same note; they attempted to establish the defense formerly interposed. The court held that they were estopped by the former adjudication, which necessarily adjudged the issue of plene administravit. The court reaffirms the case of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 42, then but recently decided, and quote from that case as follows:

"This court has lately, in the case of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 42, attempted to define the doctrine of res adjudicata as follows: 'It seems to be now settled that, though the proceeding is in another jurisdiction, the judgment will be conclusive provided the court had jurisdiction and the judgment was directly on the point. * * * It is claimed, however, as a sequence of this rule, that the defense of res adjudicata extends to every question which could have been made, whether it was considered or not. There are cases which seem to go to that extent, but we think the decided preponderance of authority sustains the more reasonable doctrine, "That a judgment is not, technically, conclusive of any matter, if the matter is not such that it had, of necessity, to be determined before the judgment could have been given; that it was not merely collateral nor to be inferred by argument from the judgment.'" 6 Wait, Ac. & Def. 785, citing Hunter v. Davis. 10 Ga. 413, and other cases. Or, in the language of Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States: "The rule is, that when a former judgment is relied on it must appear from the record that the point in controversy was necessarily decided in the former suit, or be made to appear by extrinsic proof that it was in fact decided." "

A very similar question arose in Willis v. Tozer, 44 S. C. 1,¹ where the Trimmer Case was cited with approval, the court declaring:

"A judgment is conclusive between the parties to it, not only as to those matters which were actually decided, but also all such as were necessarily involved in its rendition."

In Drug Co. v. Bromonia Co., 81 S. C. 518, 62 S. E. 840, 128 Am. St. Rep. 929, the defendant in a former action had recovered judgment against the drug company upon an account. In that action fraud was not an issue. The drug company paid the judgment, and brought the second action against the Bromonia Company for damages on account of fraudulent misrepresentations in the sale of the goods. The court of course held that the former judgment, giving effect to the contract of sale, was conclusive evidence that it was free from fraud or illegality although such issue was not raised in the action; that the validity of the contract was necessarily implied in the adjudication; and that it was a bar to the second action. As the circuit judge announced in that case:

"The parties to the action are the same; the court is the same; the subject-matter, Bromonia, and the advertisement of it, is the same. The exact issue in the first case was: Did the Greenwood Drug Company owe the Bromonia Company for a lot of medicine, and for money paid out in the advertisement of the medicine? That, too, is the issue in the second case. It was decided in the first case, and that ends the controversy."

In Cannon v. Cox, 98 S. C. 185, 82 S. E. 399, the defendant has distrained upon the plaintiff's property; the plaintiff sued out claim and delivery proceedings and recovered judgment; he then brought an action for damages alleging an unreasonable and excessive distress; the defendant contended that the plaintiff could have presented in the claim and delivery proceedings her demand for damages, and, not having done so, the question is res judicata; a contention that appears to me to possess considerable force; but the court held upon the authority of Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 40, Kirven v. V-C. Co., 77 S. C. 493, 58 S. E. 424, Id., 215 U. S. 252, 30 Sup. Ct. 73, 54 L. Ed. 179, and Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. Ed. 195, that the defense of res adjudicata could not prevail. This case is cited in the leading opinion as authority for holding that the defense should prevail. It occurs to me that it sustains the opposite conclusion.

In Woodmen v. Means, 87 S. C. 127, 69 S. E. 85, the court held:

"As the questions sought to be made in this case by the present plaintiff against the defendant, Mollie Fincher Means, were necessarily involved in the decision in the former action brought by Mollie Fincher Means against the present plaintiff, the said former action is res judicata of the same questions now presented."

In Davis v. Murphy, 2 Rich. 560, 45 Am. Dec. 749, the principle of res adjudicata is limited to "that which was directly in issue" in the former suit.

In Bradley v. McBride, Rich. Eq. Cas. 202, the plaintiff brought an action to set aside a sheriff's deed conveying the property to the defendant, upon the ground of fraud. The defendant had previously brought an action against the plaintiff in trespass to try title and recover the land. In the later case the defendant set up the former adjudication as a bar, but it was denied by the court upon the ground that the issue of fraud was not involved in the first action. This case is cited with approval in Hart v. Bates, 17 S. C. 35, but it strikes me as of doubtful accuracy.

In Willoughby v. R. Co., 52 S. C. 166, 29 S. E. 629, the point decided was that where an issue was distinctly adjudicated in an action, it became res adjudicata in a subsequent action between the parties whether the subsequent action was upon the same or upon a different cause of action.

In Rhoad v. Patrick, 37 S. C. 517, 16 S. E. 536, the court held that a point not adjudicated in a former suit, although raised there, was not res adjudicata, citing the Hart and Roberts Cases.

"A test of the identity of the cause of action is, Would the evidence adequate to recovery in the second have been sufficient to support the first?" Sarson v. Maccia, 90 N. J. Eq. 483, 108 Atl. 109.

In Ex parte Roberts, 19 S. C. 150, the plea was sustained upon the ground that the matter in dispute was necessarily involved and adjudicated in the former proceeding; and to the same effect is Steen v. Mark, 32 S. C. 298, 11 S. E. 93; Dunsford v. Brown, 23 S. C. 328, and Newell v. Neal, 50 S. C. 68, 27 S. E. 560.

Another reason for overruling the plea in this case is that it was practically reversed by the decree of Judge Spain in the former suit. Hunter v. Hunter, 63 S. C. 78, 41 S. E. 33, 90 Am. St. Rep. 663.

"The recognized principle that, where a general judgment is rendered, all matters that might have been interposed as a defense are considered as adjudicata between the parties, is not applicable when a decree specifically expresses the issues determined, and upon which the relief is granted, in which case only such issues are res judicata." R. Co. v. R. R. Co. (D. C.) 205 Fed. 800.

Tested by another rule adopted by this court the plea of res adjudicata must fail. In Fraser v. Charleston, 19 S. C. 399, the court says:

"It does not appear clearly that proof was offered, and the point in question actually decided by the court; but that was not indispensable, provided the precise matter was involved in the issue, so that it had of necessity to be decided before the judgment could have been given." Ruff v. Doty, 28 S. C. 173, 1 S. E. 707, 4 Am. St. Rep. 709.

The question of the rights of creditors under the recording act, involved in the present action, was not before the court in the Meinhard Case. A decision of it was not at all involved in the issue of a fraudulent deed. In fact, an adjudication of the validity of the deed was entirely consistent with the establishment of the rights of the subsequent creditors. It was not necessary to adjudicate that they had no rights in order to sustain the deed. Consequently that question did not have "to be decided before the judgment [sustaining the deed] could have been given." In the Ruff v. Doty Case the court says, referring to Fraser v. Charleston and Hart v. Bates:

"These two cases, considered together, decide, briefly, that a matter not necessarily involved and not raised in a previous case, is not res adjudicata, but if necessarily involved and raised, or not, it is concluded, and especially so, if the party denying the adjudication knew of the matter and could have interposed it at the previous trial, either in support of a claim or as a defense."

In Anderson v. Cave, 49 S. C. 505, 27 S. E. 478, the court declares:

"Conceding, then, for the purposes of this case, that the court of probate had full jurisdiction in the proceeding before it, and that the question of the plaintiff's claim was there presented, or could have been presented, its adjudication was not necessary to enable that court to render judgment, and hence such judgment is not conclusive. (Citing authorities). From these authorities, it follows that, even if the proceeding in the court of probate be given full force and effect as a proceeding for partition, it was not necessary that the claim of the plaintiff should have been there adjudged; and, as there is not the slightest evidence that it was, in fact, adjudged, such proceeding cannot support the plea of res adjudicata."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

FRASER, J., concurs.

GARY, C. J. I concur in the result, for the reason that his honor, Judge Spain, ruled that the complaint in the first case was not drawn to set aside the deed, under the recording act.

BRISENDINE v. BRISENDINE. (No. 2492.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 637—Writ not dismissed when bill of exceptions tendered 20 days after judgment, but for providential reasons not certified until later.

There was no effort to assign error in the bill of exceptions on any judgment other than one rendered November 5, 1920, awarding the wife temporary alimony and counsel fees in the proceeding under Civil Code 1910, \S 2986. The judge certified that the bill of exceptions was tendered to him on November 25, 1920, and for providential reasons not certified until January 28, 1921. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss the writ of error is without merit.

2. Divorce \S 219, 255—Temporary alimony terminated by decree against wife; decree against wife in divorce does not bar statutory proceeding for alimony.

A wife sued for divorce on the ground of cruel treatment, and in the petition prayed for an allowance of counsel fees, and for permanent and temporary alimony for herself and minor daughter. On a hearing counsel fees and temporary alimony were allowed pending the action. On the trial of the suit for divorce there was a verdict that the wife was not entitled to a divorce, and a decree was entered in accordance with the verdict. Subsequently, and while no suit for divorce was pending, the wife instituted a proceeding under Civil Code 1910, \S 2986, for permanent and temporary alimony for herself, and an allowance for counsel fees, alleging that she and her husband were living in a bona fide state of separation caused by his cruel treatment towards her; the acts of cruelty alleged being the same as those set forth in her petition as grounds for divorce. On a preliminary hearing she was allowed temporary alimony and counsel fees. Held: (a) The award of temporary alimony to the wife for herself and minor daughter pending her suit for divorce terminated with the conclusion of that action against her. Bishop v. Bishop, 124 Ga. 293, 52 S. E. 743; Mason v. Mason, 151 Ga. 468, 107 S. E. 331. (b) The verdict and decree against the wife in the suit for divorce was no bar to the allowance of alimony to her in the statutory proceeding. King v. King, 151 Ga. 361, 106 S. E. 906.

3. Husband and wife \S 283(2), 295—Alimony not allowable where wife deserts husband; abuse of discretion to allow alimony and counsel fees where wife abandoned husband without cause.

Alimony will not be allowed to a wife who abandons her husband without just cause. Fuller v. Fuller, 108 Ga. 256, 33 S. E. 865.

(a) This is a proceeding under Civil Code 1910, \S 2986, for the allowance of alimony and counsel fees, where the husband and wife are living in a bona fide state of separation. On the hearing the testimony of the wife clearly showed that she voluntarily abandoned her husband without just cause. It was therefore an abuse of discretion to allow her alimony and counsel fees. Davis v. Davis, 145 Ga. 56, 88 S. E. 566.

SKELLIE v. SKELLIE. (No. 2684.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Divorce \S 27(1), 148—"Cruel treatment" defined; charge should not omit willfulness or fail to charge that it must reasonably justify apprehension of danger.

Cruel treatment within the meaning of the Civil Code 1910, \S 2946, relating to discretionary grounds for divorce, is the willful infliction of pain, bodily or mental, upon the complaining party, such as reasonably justified the apprehension of danger to life, limb, or health. And in charging upon this subject the court should not omit reference to the element of willfulness in the offense against the complaining party, nor fail to instruct the jury that it must be such as reasonably justifies the apprehension of the injuries referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cruelty.]

2. New trial \S 41(3)—Charge favorable to complaining party not sufficient cause.

A charge, though erroneous, if favorable to the complaining party, is not cause for the grant of a new trial.

3. Trial \S 193(2)—Charge that there was a great deal of feeling between the parties held the expression of an opinion.

The charge of the court, stating to the jury that there was a great deal of feeling on the part of the parties in this case, was in violation of the inhibition contained in section 4863 of the Civil Code 1910, relating to the expression of opinion by the judge on the facts of a case.

4. Appeal and error \S 302(3)—Exception to exclusion of testimony on particular point, without showing what it would have been, insufficient.

An exception to the ruling of the court in refusing to permit the defendant in the court below to testify as to the conduct of the other party, which does not indicate, except by a reference to the pleadings and other parts of the record, what would have been his testimony, is not sufficient to raise a question for decision here.

5. Appeal and error \S 730(2)—Assignment of error not showing what charges were requested held incomplete.

The ground containing an assignment of error upon the refusal of written requests in charge is incomplete, and fails to show what requests were submitted to the court.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. Trial \S 234(4)—Instruction stating several contentions and telling jury to find for plaintiff if they believed her contention held erroneous.

In a divorce suit, an instruction that plaintiff contended that her husband's conduct was such that she feared serious injury to her life and her body, and that she had actually suffered injury to her health and body, and that she did not bring it on herself, and that if the jury believed "that contention" plaintiff would be entitled to a divorce, was erroneous, as it embraced several distinct contentions and did not require all to be established or point out which of the contentions would authorize a verdict.

7. Divorce \S 11 — Instruction that it was against public policy to divorce one party and not the other unauthorized.

In a divorce suit, an instruction that as a matter of public policy it was not wise to divorce one party and leave the other party undivorced was unauthorized; there being no statute declaring that such is public policy.

8. Divorce \S 184(12)—Instruction that it was not wise to divorce one party and not the other not hurtful to defendant who was asking a divorce.

Where each party asked a divorce in his or her own favor, an instruction that as a matter of public policy it was not wise to divorce one party and leave the other undivorced was not hurtful to defendant who was asking for a divorce.

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; Malcolm D. Jones, Judge.

Action by R. C. Skellie against W. A. Skellie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. N. Holtzclaw, of Perry, for plaintiff in error.

Hatcher & Smith, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BECK, P. J. Rochelle C. Skellie brought an action for divorce against William A. Skellie, alleging cruel treatment as a ground therefor, and showing that this cruel treatment consisted of actual violence and blows dealt by defendant toward and upon the plaintiff shortly after the separation of the parties and before an action for divorce was instituted; silent, morose, and sullen conduct on the part of the defendant for a period of 12 years prior to the separation; absenting himself from home during the serious illness of two of their children; and other acts alleged to be cruel treatment. It was also averred that willful acts and threatened acts of violence on the part of defendant caused petitioner great suffering in mind and body; so that she feared, and still fears, for her life and health. The respondent answered the suit, and prayed that a divorce be denied the plaintiff but be granted to himself. Upon the trial of the case the jury rendered a verdict granting a divorce to the wife, and removing the disabilities of the husband. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

"Mrs. Skellie in this case contends that the conduct of her husband has been such as that she fears serious injury to her life and to her body by reason of that conduct, and not only that she fears injury to her health and to her body, but that she has actually suffered injury, before the commencement of this divorce suit, to her health and to her body by reason of the defendant's conduct; and that she did not bring that on herself. If you believe that contention of the plaintiff, then she would be entitled to a divorce at your hands. If you do not believe it, then she would not be entitled to a divorce."

It will be noticed from the statement of the contentions of the wife appearing in this part of the charge that there were three distinct contentions, and the court charged the jury that, "If you believe that contention of the plaintiff, then she would be entitled to a divorce." This charge was error. The court did not point out which of these contentions, if supported by evidence, would authorize a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. He did not state that, if all these contentions were shown by a preponderance of the evidence to be true, the jury would be authorized to find for the wife, but used the expression, if they believed "that contention of the plaintiff," she would be entitled to a divorce. The jury might have believed that the expression "that contention" referred to either of the three contentions. Besides, the charge was not a correct statement of the law, in that it did not require the jury to find from the evidence, before they would be authorized to find in favor of the libellant, that the conduct of the husband was such as to reasonably justify an apprehension of danger to her life, limb, or health. "Cruel treatment" within the meaning of the section of the Code upon which this case is based (Civil Code, § 2946) is the willful infliction of pain, bodily or mental, upon the complaining party, such as reasonably justifies the apprehension of danger to life or limb or health. Stoner v. Stoner, 134 Ga. 368, 67 S. E. 1030. In the case of Ring v. Ring, 118 Ga. 183, 44 S. E. 861, 62 L. R. A. 878, Justice Candler, in a full discussion of the prior decisions of this court, defined the expression "cruel treatment," and gave substantially the definition later employed in the case of Stoner v. Stoner, supra, and disapproved the ruling upon this subject in the case of Myrick v. Myrick, 67 Ga. 771. And not only is the charge defective in the respects pointed out, but it failed to make willfulness of conduct upon the part of the husband, which the wife sought to make a ground of divorce, an essential element of the offense against her, so as to render it a ground for finding in favor of the wife. In the case of Miller v. Miller, 139 Ga. 282, 77 S. E. 21, it was said:

"'Cruel treatment' within the meaning of Civil Code, § 2946, which provides that such treatment shall be ground for divorce, is the willful infliction of pain, bodily or mental, upon the complaining party, such as reasonably justifies an apprehension of damage to life, limb or health."

[2, 7, 8] 2. Exception is also taken to the following charge of the court:

"I will state to you that, as a matter of public policy, it is, as a rule, not wise to divorce one party to a marriage contract and leave the other party undivorced. That it is simply a matter of public wisdom; and, as a matter of public policy, wisdom dictates that if one is divorced the other should be divorced also."

This charge was excepted to on the ground that there is no such public policy as stated by the court to be found in our statutes or elsewhere. We do not think the court was authorized to state that such a public policy exists. There is no statute on our books authorizing us to hold that such is our public policy. But the charge could not be hurtful to the defendant, who was asking for a divorce, and is not ground for a new trial.

[3] 3. The court also charged the jury, in part, that—

"There seems to be a great deal of feeling in this case by both these young people, but both will feel differently about it a hundred years from to-day; and you have been selected to try this case for the reason that you are withdrawn entirely from that feeling, and it is your duty in this case to take all the evidence and pass on it impassionately without any regard for the one party or the other party, and simply ascertain the truth, and then let your verdict speak the result of that investigation."

The amount of feeling involved in the case cannot be regarded as entirely immaterial; for the existence of feeling might have shown the proper light in which the conduct of both the husband and wife should be regarded—might have aggravated or mitigated the acts of the husband complained of by the wife—and it was a question entirely for the jury to decide, were the acts of the husband and the wife, about which there is crimination and recrimination in the pleadings and evidence, the result of willful cruelty, or grew out of the impulse of the moment, and to that extent was material, and the court in expressing an opinion upon that fact committed an error which required the grant of a new trial. Civil Code, § 4863.

[4] 4. Complaint in the motion that the court erred in refusing to permit movant to testify as to the conduct of the plaintiff, Mrs. Skellie, towards designated individuals, "though said conduct was set out in movant's plea, and was the real cause of movant's being dismissed from plaintiff's home," is without merit, where it does not appear from the ground itself what movant would have testified in regard to these matters, and raises no question for decision.

[5] The assignment of error upon the refusal by the court of a written request to charge does not sufficiently show what request was made. There is the following statement in the motion, which constitutes the entire ground numbered 4: "Because the court refused to give in charge the following requests made in writing." Nothing follows that statement. There is an unnumbered ground of the motion preceding this, and it begins with the following language: "Now comes * * * and amends his motion for a new trial, as follows." To this succeed in order three distinct paragraphs numbered 1, 2, 3, stating legal propositions, and it is possible that the fourth ground related to this unnumbered ground; but we cannot assume that that is true, in the present shape of the record, and therefore do not pass upon whether it was error to refuse the request to charge.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WHELCHER v. WATERS. (No. 2418.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Vendor and purchaser \S 16(1, 4)—Offer must be accepted unconditionally and without variance; parties must assent to the same thing in the same sense; vendee's acceptance of offer held unequivocal and unconditional.

"The offer of a seller must be accepted by the purchaser unequivocally, unconditionally, and without variance of any sort. There must be mutual assent of the parties, and they must assent to the same thing in the same sense." Robinson v. Weller, 81 Ga. 704, 8 S. E. 447; Gray v. Lynn, 139 Ga. 294, 77 S. E. 156. Letters between contracting parties for sale and purchase of land were as follows: Letter from vendor to vendee, dated July 30, 1919: "My brother Randolph has written me in regard to your buying my place, where you now live. This is all the property I have there, * * * which is about seven acres, according to the division of my father's old home place. * * * I will take $3,300 cash or $3,500 on time. * * * Let me know as soon as you can whether you will take the place or not." Letter from vendee to vendor, dated August 5, 1919: "I accept your offer $3,300 for the old Longstreet home, and inclose you herewith my certified check for $25 to close the trade, and ask that you have the deeds made [to?] the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank here, and upon receipt of same the [bank] will mail you a check for the $3,300." Letter from vendor to vendee, dated August 26, 1919: "Your letter inclosing check for $25 was received. * * * As you did not give very clear instructions, I could not have deed drawn up until receiving them, as I could not understand whether the deed was to be made out to you as Mary A. Waters, and mailed to the bank, or to the [bank] in trust for you; so have my brother to draw up same and forward for signing." Held: (1) The letter of the vendee was an unequivocal and unconditional acceptance of the cash offer contained in the first letter of the vendor. The request that the vendor have the deeds made, etc., is not to be construed as in any sense qualifying the acceptance of the offer, and was not so construed by the vendor, as indicated in reply to the letter of acceptance. The letters were sufficient, within the meaning of the law quoted at the beginning of this note, to show mutual assent of the parties, and to form a valid contract in writing for sale and purchase of a definite tract of land.

2. Specific performance \S 114(3)—Description of land in petition held sufficient.

In a suit for specific performance by the vendee against the vendor, the petition as amended described the property definitely, and alleged that the property so described contained "10 acres, more or less," and was known as "the Longstreet * * * home place," and that it was "the only land then owned" by the vendor in that county. The petition further alleged that after the contract and before suit the defendant refused to make a deed to the land. Held: (a) The petition as amended sufficiently described the land embraced in the contract, and alleged a cause of action for specific performance. (b) Amendments to the petition were largely in response to special demurrers; and if some allegations of the various amendments which were objected to upon demurrer were not strictly appropriate or necessary, they were not of such character as that their allowance would require a reversal.

3. Demurrers properly overruled.

The judge did not err in overruling the various demurrers to the petition as amended.

4. Specific performance \S 97(1) — Tender generally necessary, but offer in pleading sufficient, if vendor has proclaimed that he will not accept tender.

As a general rule, a vendee of land, before bringing his action for specific performance, should tender to the vendor the amount agreed to be paid by him before the execution of the conveyance; but tender by the vendee before suit is excused, if the vendor by declaration or conduct proclaims that, if a tender should be made, its acceptance would be refused. In the latter instance it is sufficient to offer in the pleadings to pay the amount due, or which may be found to be due by the decree of court. Miller v. Watson, 139 Ga. 29(2), 76 S. E. 685; Burkhalter v. Roach, 142 Ga. 344(2), 82 S. E. 1059.

5. Specific performance \S 120—Evidence that vendee had dissuaded third persons from buying at higher price held not admissible.

A ground of the motion for new trial complains as follows: In response to a notice duly served, the plaintiff produced an original letter from the vendor to the vendee, which the defendant offered in evidence. The court allowed to be read to the jury so much of it as stated: "I will have to call the sale off, and am inclosing check for $25 which you inclosed me," but refused to admit the entire letter, which complained of the price that was being paid, and of the withdrawal of other bidders on the ground that they did not wish to bid against a widow, etc., and reoffering the property at a higher price, which two other persons had expressed a willingness to give. Another ground of the motion for new trial complains of the ruling of the court refusing to allow the counsel for the defendant to ask the plaintiff, on cross-examination, "Did you try to dissuade them from buying it?" and "Didn't you know that Mr. Phelix Jackson was trying to buy the place at the time you traded for it?" Counsel stated that he expected the witness to answer the first question that "she did approach" certain persons, and in answer to the second question "that he expected to prove by the witness that Mr. Phelix Jackson wanted to buy the place and was willing to pay $4,000 for it, and that she either approached him personally or had others approach him, * * * and told him that she was a widow woman and asked him not to bid on the place." No question of public sale or fiduciary relation was involved. Held, that there is no merit in these grounds of the motion for new trial.

6. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1171(4)—Verdict for plaintiff, requiring her to pay amount tendered, which did not include interest, held not to require reversal.

The original petition alleged a tender of $3,275 as a balance of the purchase price, having theretofore paid $25. Without striking such allegation as to tender, another tender was alleged by amendment of $3,485.25 being the principal and interest from the date of said contract at 7%." The jury returned a verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, and that she pay three thousand, two hundred and seventy-five dollars ($3,275.00), and that defendant make deed." Held, the jury being authorized to find that the delay in making the deed was the fault of the defendant, the discrepancy between the amount tendered and contract price as stated in the verdict will not require a reversal.

7. New trial \Leftrightarrow 70—Properly refused, when evidence sufficient.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

PAULK v. SOUTH GEORGIA BLDG. & INV. CO. et al. (No. 2495.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 883—Trial \Leftrightarrow 2—Distress and dispossessory proceedings should not be tried together; parties consenting cannot except to trial together.

The issues formed by counter affidavits filed, respectively, to a distress warrant and to a proceeding to dispossess tenants holding over, are separate cases, and should not be tried together; but if parties consent that this be done, they cannot except thereto. Mitchell v. White, 74 Ga. 327(1).

2. Trial \Leftrightarrow 331—Verdict in distress and dispossess cases tried together held not vague and uncertain.

A verdict rendered on the trial of these consolidated issues, finding for the plaintiff a given sum, was not so vague, indefinite, and uncertain as to render the judgments entered therein void. A verdict must be given a reasonable intentment, and is not to be avoided unless from necessity. Civ. Code 1910, § 5927. The verdict for the plaintiff in a given sum must be construed to mean that the plaintiff was entitled to that sum as rent, and that the tenants were holding over beyond their term.

3. Principal and surety \Leftrightarrow 145(1)—Sureties on distress and dispossess bonds held bound by principals' agreement for consolidation.

The respective sureties on the bonds given in these proceedings were bound by the agreement of their principals for the consolidation of these cases, and by the judgments rendered on the verdict in the consolidated cause, in the absence of collusion or fraud. Price v. Carlton, 121 Ga. 12, 48 S. E. 721.

4. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1033(9) — Landlord and tenant \Leftrightarrow 310(1)—Liability of surety in dispossess proceeding held not increased by consolidation with distress proceeding; landlord entitled to judgment for amount of penalty; surety cannot complain that judgment rendered for less than appellee entitled to.

The liability of a surety on the bond in the dispossessory warrant proceeding was not increased by the consolidation of these issues, nor by the verdict and judgment rendered therein. On the verdict finding against the tenants the landlord was entitled to have judgment against the tenants and the surety on their bond for the amount of the penalty recovered. Civil Code 1910, § 5389; Latham v. Perryman, 77 Ga. 579; Bennett v. Farkas, 126 Ga. 228, 54 S. E. 942; Jones v. Blackwelder, 143 Ga. 402, 85 S. E. 122. The liability of the surety was decreased, it seems, by the judgment rendered in this case, as the judgment was rendered against him for single rent only, and not double rent. Of this the plaintiff cannot complain.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; O. T. Gower, Judge.

Suit for injunction by J. B. D. Paulk against the South Georgia Building & Investment Company and others. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The South Georgia Building & Investment Company sued out a distress warrant against J. R. and Dorothy Wilcox, for the rent of the Lee-Grant Hotel building. The Wilcoxes filed their affidavit, denying that the rent distrained for was due, and gave bond for the eventual condemnation money, with G. W. McLean, H. D. Vaughn, J. C. Peavy, and Will S. Halle as sureties. Thereafter the Georgia Building & Investment Company sued out a warrant against these tenants to dispossess them, on the ground that they were holding over beyond the term for which said hotel was rented by them. The tenants filed a counter affidavit, denying that their term had expired; and gave bond as required by law, upon which Paulk became surety.

At the January term, 1920, of Ben Hill superior court these two cases, by consent of the plaintiff and the defendants, were consolidated and tried as one cause. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the principal sum of $2,700 and $78.75 interest, total $2,778.75. On said verdict two judgments were rendered, one for the sum of $2,778.75 against J. R. and Dorothy Wilcox as principals, and Paulk as surety, in the dispossessory warrant proceeding; and the other judgment for the same sum was rendered against J. R. and Dorothy Wilcox as principals and the above-named sureties on their bond for the eventual condemnation money in the distress warrant case. The execution, which was issued on the judgment in the dispossessory warrant proceeding, was levied on the property of Paulk as surety. Thereupon he filed his petition in this case against the plaintiff and the sheriff, to enjoin the sale of his property under said levy, on the ground that the verdict and the judgments thereon were void, and that the execution issued upon the judgment against himself as surety and his principal is likewise void, on the grounds: (a) That the verdict was too vague, indefinite, and uncertain to form any basis upon which a legal judgment could be rendered; (b) because his liability had been increased by a consolidation of said cases; and (c) because the consolidation of the cases was illegal, and he was not bound by the verdict and judgment rendered in said consolidated cause.

The defendants demurred to the petition, on the grounds: First, that it set forth no cause of action; second, because there was no equity in the petition; and, third, because the defendant had a full and adequate remedy at law. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition. This is the error assigned.

1. Corporations §407(5) — General manager held without authority to employ counsel for employees charged with larceny.

The general manager of a mercantile and farming corporation is without authority, by virtue of his office alone, to employ counsel to represent employees thereof who are charged with larceny of property, alleged to be that of third persons, but claimed by such corporation as its own, in the absence of express authority from the corporation, or ratification by the corporation of his act in so employing counsel, or by a previous course of dealing known to the corporation, from which such authority might be inferred; and this is true although prior to the indictments against these employees a third person who claimed one of the hogs alleged to be stolen had prosecuted a possessory warrant for the same against the corporation, and although the property alleged to be stolen by the employees was claimed by the corporation, and found upon its premises where the employees were working.

2. Attorney and client §137—General counsel for corporation held not entitled as of right to retaining fee in addition to compensation for specific services.

Where an attorney at law is employed by a corporation as its general counsel for one year, the position having no fixed salary attached, but the attorney is to be paid a separate fee for every specific legal service rendered the corporation, and there is no agreement between the attorney and the corporation as to any retaining fee, such attorney is not entitled, as a matter of right, at the end of his year's employment, to a retaining fee in addition to the fees paid him for specific services rendered his client during the period of his employment.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Corporations §405—General manager may do any act usual and necessary in ordinary course of corporation's business.

Unless specially restricted, the authority and power of a corporation's general manager are coextensive with its powers, and he may do any act on its behalf which is usual and necessary in the ordinary course of its business.

4. Attorney and client §137—"Retainer" defined.

A "retainer" is the act of the client in employing his attorney or counsel, and also denotes the fee which the client pays when he retains the attorney to act for him, and thereby prevents him from acting for his adversary.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by J. R. Thomas against the Pickens Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

Gibbs & Turner, of Jesup, and Wilson & Bennett, of Waycross, for plaintiff in error.

J. H. Thomas, J. W. Walker, and Jas. R. Thomas, all of Jesup, for defendant in error.

HINES, J. [1] 1. The Court of Appeals propounds this question:

"The Pickens Company is a private corporation chartered under the laws of this state, and engaged in merchandising and farming. Certain of the employees of the company were prosecuted and indicted by third persons for hog stealing. These employees were defended in the courts by an attorney at law, and he subsequently presented a bill for his services to the Pickens Company, which refused to pay it, and the attorney brought suit against the company. Upon the trial of this suit the evidence authorized a finding of the following facts: The hogs which the employees were charged with stealing were claimed by the Pickens Company, and were found upon the company's premises where the indicted employees were working; prior to these indictments a third person, who claimed one of these hogs, prosecuted a possessory warrant for the hog against the Pickens Company; the attorney was employed to defend these employees by the general manager of the Pickens Company, who was also a director thereof, and who told the attorney at the time of his employment that the Pickens Company would pay his fees. It was not, however, shown upon the trial that the corporation itself, through its board of directors, had employed the attorney to defend these employees, or that the general manager had authority under the charter of the corporation or its by-laws to employ him, or that the action of the general manager in employing him had ever been ratified by the board of directors of the corporation, or that under the charter of the corporation or its by-laws such an employment was within the powers of the corporation. Under these facts, would a verdict finding the defendant liable be contrary to law?"

[3] Unless specially restricted, the authority and power of a general manager of a corporation are coextensive with the powers of the corporation itself; and he has authority to do any act on its behalf which is usual and necessary in the ordinary course of the company's business. Georgia Military Academy v. Estill, 77 Ga. 409; Raleigh & Gaston R. Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700, 704, 705, 50 S. E. 1008. If a person imposes upon another the duties and responsibilities involving the management and control of a business, such person will be presumed to have authority to represent his employer in any matter within the scope of the business; and this rule applies peculiarly to corporations which act only through their officers and agents. Southwestern R. v. Mitchell, 69 Ga. 114; Fulton Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Greenleaf, 108 Ga. 876, 29 S. E. 932; Raleigh & Gaston R. Co. v. Pullman Co., supra.

So the question arises, Does the employment of counsel by the general manager of a mercantile and farming corporation, to represent certain of its employees who were charged with stealing hogs, claimed by the corporation, and found on its premises where these employees were working, fall within the scope of the business? It was not shown that the corporation, through its board of directors, had employed the attorney to defend these employees, or that the general manager had authority under its charter or by-laws to employ the attorney for this purpose, or that his employment of the attorney had been ratified by the corporation. The employment of counsel to represent its employees for infractions of the criminal laws of the state does not come within the scope of the business of a mercantile and farming corporation. This principle is not varied by the fact that the employees are indicted on the charge of stealing hogs claimed by the corporation, nor by the fact that a third person, who claimed one of these hogs, had prosecuted a possessory warrant for its recovery against the corporation. It would be stretching the authority of a general manager to the snapping point to hold that, by virtue of his employment as general manager alone, he could employ counsel, at the expense of his corporation, to represent its employees when charged with the commission of crimes.

The case at bar is different from those cases which hold that a general manager of a railroad has authority to bind the corporation by contracts for medical and other services to an injured employee, passenger, or other person hurt on its road by any agency of the company. Louisville, etc., Ry. Co. v. McVay, 98 Ind. 391, 398, 49 Am. Rep. 770. In such cases the persons injured, and for whom medical services were procured, were hurt by agencies of the companies, and such companies were interested in their welfare, as they might be liable in damages for the injuries inflicted.

Under the facts recited in this question, a verdict finding the defendant liable would be contrary to law.

[2] 2. The Court of Appeals propounds this question:

"Where an attorney at law is employed by a corporation as its general counsel for one year, the position having no fixed salary attached, but the attorney to be paid a separate fee for every specific legal service rendered the corporation, and there being no agreement between the attorney and the corporation as to any retaining fee, is the attorney entitled, as a matter of right, at the end of his year's employment, to a retaining fee in addition to the fees paid him for his specific services?"

[4] A retainer is the act of the client in employing his attorney or counsel. The word is also used to denote the fee which the client pays his attorney when he retains him to act for him, and thereby prevents him from acting for his adversary. Union Surety & Guaranty Co. v. Tenney, 200 Ill. 349, 65 N. E. 688; Bouvier's Law Dict. "Retainer"; Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 19 Pac. 698; Saulsbury v. American Vulcanized Fibre Co., 5 Boyce (Del.) 182, 91 Atl. 536; In re Solicitor, 22 Ont. L. E. 30, 19 Ann. Cas. 488.

A retaining fee is a preliminary fee given to an attorney or counsel to insure and secure his future services, and induce him to act for the client. Agnew v. Walden, 84 Ala. 504, 4 South. 672; Union Surety & Guaranty

Co. v. Tenney, 200 Ill. 349, 85 N. E. 688; Blair v. Columbian Fireproofing Co., 191 Mass. 336, 77 N. E. 762.

In cases of express contracts for the payment of retaining fees there can be no trouble. In this country express contracts between attorney and client as to compensation are generally recognized, and a contract to pay a retaining fee, though the contemplated services are not rendered, is valid and enforceable. See note, 1 Ann. Cas. 299; Agnew v. Walden, 84 Ala. 504, 4 South. 672; Union Surety & Guaranty Co. v. Tenney, 200 Ill. 349, 85 N. E. 688. The decisions are in conflict upon the question whether an agreement to pay a retaining fee is implied. Windett v. Union Mutual Life Ins. Co., 144 U. S. 581, 12 Sup. Ct. 751, 36 L. Ed. 551; Yates v. Shepardson, 27 Wis. 238; In matter of Schaller, 10 Daly (N. Y.) 57; Dumont v. Smith, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 319; Buckles v. Northeast Kan. Tel. Co., 79 Kan. 84, 99 Pac. 813.

A distinction has been made between the implied right of an attorney to recover a retaining fee where he has not been called upon to render the contemplated services and his right to such a fee in addition to the value of the contemplated services which are rendered. In the latter case it has been held that there is no implied contract to pay a retaining fee. The scope of the right to charge retainers is to remunerate counsel for being deprived, on account of being retained by one party, of the opportunity of rendering services for and receiving pay from the other, and not to swell the amount of the bill which accrues for services rendered in pursuance of the employment. In most jurisdictions it is held that the agreement to pay a reasonable retaining fee is implied in the retainer. Aldrich v. Brown, 103 Mass. 527; Perry v. Lord, 111 Mass. 504; Eggleston v. Boardman, 37 Mich. 14; Roche v. Baldwin, 143 Cal. 186, 76 Pac. 956; Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 410, 19 Pac. 698. It has been said:

"The right to a retaining fee follows every retainer. When an attorney is engaged to prosecute or defend in an action, his entire services in that action are engaged for his client, and he cannot perform services for the adverse party. * * * All his skill and ability for that case are at the command of his client. A retainer of an attorney at law is presumably worth something to the client, and presumably a loss to the attorney, and whether the attorney is ever called upon to perform any service, or not, in that case, he may when the case is terminated recover for whatever the evidence shows the retainer was worth." Blackman v. Webb, 88 Kan. 668, 17 Pac. 464.

So a general retainer of an attorney to represent a corporation would entitle the attorney to a retaining fee if he was never called upon to render any services. The retaining of an attorney under such circumstances is presumably worth something to the client, and presumably a loss to the attorney, and the attorney would be entitled to recover the value of such retainer in the event he was not called upon to render any service.

We think, however, that, when an attorney is generally retained and is employed by the client in all his cases, and is paid in full for services rendered in such cases, he gets all that he is entitled to under such general retainer, and should not be permitted to recover, in addition to the sums so paid for such services, an additional amount as a retaining fee.

But, however that may be, when an attorney is employed by a corporation as its general counsel for one year, without a fixed salary, but the attorney is to be paid a separate fee for each specific service rendered the corporation, and there is no agreement between the attorney and client as to the payment of a retaining fee, such attorney is not entitled, as a matter of right, at the end of his year's employment, to a retaining fee in addition to the fees paid him for his specific services rendered the corporation. The agreement by which the attorney is to be paid a separate fee for every specific legal service rendered the corporation excludes any implied agreement to pay him in addition to a retaining fee.

We answer this question in the negative.

3. The second question being answered in the negative, we are not requested to answer the third question propounded by the Court of Appeals.

All the Justices concur, except BECK, P. J., and ATKINSON, J., who dissent on the ground that the defense of the employee is so related to the property rights and protection of the property of the corporation that it would be authorized to employ an attorney for defending the employee under the circumstances stated, and, if the corporation had such authority, the general manager also had it.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Records \S 9(10)—Grounds for moving to recommit examiner's report in registration proceedings specified.

By section 20 of the Land Registration Act (Acts 1917, p. 108) it is provided that any of the parties to the proceeding may, within 20 days after the examiner's report is filed, file exceptions of law or of fact to the general findings of the examiner, and the judge may re-refer or recommit the record to the examiner "in like manner as auditor's reports may be recommitted in any equity cause." Within 20 days after the filing of the examiner's report, any party at interest may move to recommit the report for indefiniteness, lack of fullness, failure to properly separate and classify his findings of law and of fact, or other like causes. Powell's Land Reg. § 96.

2. Records \S 9(10)—Exceptions to auditor's report in equity applicable to land registration proceeding.

"While the Land Registration Act is not an equitable, but purely a statutory, proceeding, it in express terms makes the procedure as to exceptions to an auditor's report provided in equity applicable to exceptions provided by the act to an examiner's report." Bird v. South Georgia Industrial Co., 150 Ga. 420, 421, 104 S. E. 232, 233.

3. Reference \S 100(4)—Exceptions to report should set forth, refer to, or attach necessary evidence.

"The neglect of a party excepting to an auditor's report on matters of fact, or on matters of law dependent for their decision upon the evidence, to set forth, in connection with each exception of law or fact, the evidence necessary to be considered in passing thereon, or to point out the same by appropriate reference, or to attach as exhibits to his exceptions those portions of the evidence relied on to support the exceptions, is a sufficient reason, in an equity case, for refusing to approve the exceptions of fact and for overruling the exceptions of law." McCord v. City of Jackson, 135 Ga. 176 (4), 177, 69 S. E. 28.

4. Records \S 9(10)—Finding in registration proceeding held sufficient finding that deed was not security deed; objections to findings and failure to find held ground for exceptions, and not motion to recommit.

The findings of the examiner covered all the issues in the case. In brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error it is stated that "the only question in this case is whether or not the deed made by Mrs. John Manion to G. W. Varn on the 25th day of September, 1917, was an absolute sale." The examiner found that "on September 25, 1917, Mrs. John Manion [Mrs. Margaret Manion] sold to the applicant, G. W. Varn, a one-half undivided interest in and to all the lots described in the applicant's petition. The examiner finds it as a fact that this deed is a deed of bargain and sale, and not a loan deed." This necessarily amounted to a finding that under all the evidence the deed in question was a deed of bargain and sale, and not a security deed. It was therefore not error to overrule a motion to recommit, based on grounds that the examiner had not considered and made specific findings upon portions of the evidence which it is claimed threw light upon the question at issue, or upon grounds that the examiner made erroneous findings upon certain phases of the evidence. Objections of this nature should have been made by exception, and not by motion to recommit.

5. Appeal and error \S 854(2)—Where approval of exceptions of fact should have been refused, it was immaterial that the court dismissed them for another reason.

None of the exceptions, either of law or of fact, was framed in compliance with the well-settled rule of practice set forth in the third head note; and this failure was a sufficient reason to overrule the exceptions of law and refuse to approve the exceptions of fact. While the trial judge "dismissed" the exceptions of fact for another reason, the right result was reached, without reference to the correctness of the reason given. There was no error in entering the final judgment in favor of the party in whom the examiner found the title was vested.

6. Continuance \S 20(1)—Denial because of absence of counsel held not abuse of discretion.

There was no abuse of discretion in overruling the motion for a continuance, based upon the absence of one of the attorneys for the objector, who, it was claimed, was the leading counsel. This attorney was in attendance upon another court, and had not procured leave of absence. The attorney appearing for the objector was first employed, and the objector did not make oath that she could not go safely to trial without the services of the absent counsel. Civil Code 1910, § 5718; Whitley v. Clegg, 120 Ga. 1038, 1040, 48 S. E. 406.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Quo warranto \S 34—May be maintained by citizen and taxpayer to declare office vacant.

Where the purpose is to declare a public office vacant, any citizen and taxpayer may file a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto.

2. Quo warranto \S 25—Membership in board of education is public office.

Membership of a county board of education is a public office.

3. Schools and school districts \S 48(2)—Member of board of education elected from same district as another member has no title to the office.

The provision in section 78 of the act approved August 19, 1919 (Acts 1919, p. 288), relating to the codification of the school laws of Georgia, that "the county board of education shall consist of five (5) members as now provided by law and selected by the grand jury as now provided by law, except that the grand jury in selecting such members shall not select one of their own number then in session, nor shall they select any two of those selected from the same militia district or locality," is mandatory, and the election of a member of the county board of education in violation of this provision creates no title to the office in the person thus selected; and quo warranto proceedings will lie for the purpose of declaring such office vacant.

Error from Superior Court, McIntosh County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Suit by W. J. Long and others against J. K. Clarke, Jr., and others. Judgment against defendants, and they bring error. Affirmed.

Tyson & Tyson, of Darien, for plaintiffs in error.

Edwin A. Cohen, of Savannah, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. On January 18, 1921, the defendants in error presented to the judge of the superior court of McIntosh county their petition for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto, and for a writ of quo warranto against the plaintiffs in error as members of the board of education of the county, alleging that there was a resident member of the board in the 271st militia district, and that the grand jury at the December term, 1920, of the superior court had selected and elected the plaintiffs in error as members of the board of education to succeed themselves, and, both being residents of the 271st militia district, the election was null and void; and petitioners obtained a rule nisi calling upon the plaintiffs in error to show cause before the judge, on January 27, 1921, why the prayers of relators should not be granted. The petition alleged that the plaintiffs in error, under the election by the grand jury, had qualified and were commissioned and were discharging the duties of their offices as members of the board of education; that relators were citizens and taxpayers of the county, and interested in the conduct of the affairs of the board of education, and that certain specified districts in the county were not represented on the board.

The defendants filed general and special demurrers to this petition. The petitioners offered certain amendments, one curative of the defects in the petition, and another descriptive of certain persons referred to in the petition. This last amendment was rejected by the court. The demurrers were overruled. After considering the case the court sustained the application for quo warranto, and declared the offices vacant. The respondents excepted.

[1, 2] "The writ of quo warranto may issue to inquire into the right of any person to any public office the duties of which he is in fact discharging, but must be granted at the suit of some person either claiming the office or interested therein." Civil Code, \S 5451. A member of a county board of education is a county officer. Stanford v. Lynch, 147 Ga. 518, 94 S. E. 1001. The purpose of the present application for leave to file proceedings in the nature of quo warranto was to declare the office in question vacant; and, where such is the purpose, any citizen and taxpayer may file such a proceeding. Hathcock v. McGouirk, 119 Ga. 978, 47 S. E. 563. The fact that the applicants were citizens and taxpayers of the county made them "interested" in the office, in the sense in which that word is used in the Code section above quoted, relating to the quo warranto. Davis v. City Council of Dawson, 90 Ga. 817, 17 S. E. 110; Stanford v. Lynch, supra.

[3] That, then, brings us to the inquiry into the right of the respondents to the office to which they had been elected by the grand jury. From the allegations of the application and the response it appears to be uncontroverted that the grand jury, so far as relates to the form of the proceedings, elected the respondents. But these respondents were residents of the 271st militia district and there was already on the board a resident of this district. In such a case, could the grand jury legally elect the respondents to the board? Section 78 of an act entitled "An act to codify the school laws of the state of Georgia," etc., approved August 19, 1919 (Acts 1919, p. 288), declares that—

"The county board of education shall consist of five (5) members as now provided by law and selected by the grand jury as now provided by law, except that the grand jury in selecting such members shall not select one of their own number then in session, nor shall they select any two of those selected from the same militia district or locality."

This provision is mandatory; and an election of two members of the county board of education from one district, and especially where the district already has a member on the board, falls directly within the inhibition of the words, "nor shall they [the grand jury] select any two from the same militia district," and the selection of two members of the board in violation of this provision of the statute was void, and a member selected in violation of this provision has no title to the office to which he was thus called. That being true, upon the application of parties interested in the office as citizens and taxpayers, for the writ of quo warranto, the writ may issue for the purpose of declaring the office vacant. The judge did not err in overruling the demurrers to the application, and, the essential facts being uncontroverted, he properly passed upon the petition and the response thereto, and held that, under the facts shown, the office in question should be declared vacant.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

DANIEL et al. v. MAYNARD et al.
(No. 2501.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 6, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Injunction \S 26(4)—Partition \S 55(1)—Petition in suit to establish title held to sufficiently allege informal partition; ejectment suits properly enjoined, and plaintiffs required to set up rights in equity to prevent multiplicity.

J. F. Daniel, Mrs. Martha L. Wilson, M. B. Daniel, each separately, and Mrs. Annie Johnson and Frank Sawyer jointly, filed ejectment suits in Wilcox superior court against Lillie Mae and Myrtle Maynard. The suit of each was for a one-seventh undivided interest in land lot 204 of Wilcox county, containing 490 acres. After the institution of such suits the defendants Lillie Mae Maynard and Myrtle Maynard filed an equitable petition against the plaintiffs in the ejectment suits, and R. S. Daniel, A. T. Daniel, J. S. Daniel, Olis Crump, Mrs. M. M. Mann, Mrs. L. M. Maynard, and J. D. Maynard, asking that such suits be enjoined and seeking other equitable relief, as will presently be indicated. The general purport of the allegations of the petition was as follows: The plaintiffs are owners in fee simple of all the land lot 204 in the first district of Wilcox county, except a certain tract containing about 70 acres in possession of A. T. Daniel, another tract containing about 90 acres in the possession of M. M. Mann, and another tract containing about 51 acres in possession of Olis Crump. The lot of land was formerly owned by Thomas O. Mitchell, who about the year 1880 executed a deed conveying the entire land to Margaret L. Daniel, since deceased, for and during her natural life, and after her death to her seven children, to wit, Martha L. Wilson, John F. Daniel, M. B. Daniel, R. S. Daniel, A. T. Daniel, J. S. Daniel, and Mrs. Lilla Sawyer. The last-named child predeceased her mother, and was herself predeceased by her husband. There was no administration of her estate, and her sole heirs at law are her two children, Frank Sawyer and Mrs. Annie Johnson. There was an informal agreement between Mrs. Margaret L. Daniel and her seven children, made prior to her death, that a division of the land should be made between the children. The agreement was in parol, and was carried into effect, the land being divided and each child taking possession of the part allotted to him in severalty, except one who took other property as hereinafter stated. After the division each child receiving portions of the lot in severalty sold and received the proceeds from the sales of their respective allotments, except A. T. Daniel. An abstract of mesne conveyances is attached, showing warranty deeds from the several children, except that in one instance there was a judicial sale under a mortgage foreclosure. The division of the land gave each child 70 acres either in quantity or the equivalent in value, so as to equalize the distribution. John F. Daniel had a deed made directly from Margaret L. Daniel to J. D. Maynard, a purchaser, conveying his portion of the division. J. S. Daniel sold 25 acres of his portion to one person and the balance to another, and had his mother to make deeds directly to the purchasers; one of them being Olis Crump, who is now in possession. After the division had been made and six of the children had received their allotments in severalty, the balance of the lot would have belonged to M. B. Daniel, one of the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit, but he and his mother desired that he have "the old home place," being a part of a different lot; and in consideration thereof M. B. Daniel surrendered his interest in land lot 204 to his mother, who conveyed it to J. D. Maynard. This last deed does not accurately describe the land conveyed, but declares it to be the balance of land lot 204 not apportioned to the other children, and it is alleged that it was afterwards conveyed to plaintiffs. The petition further alleges that the deed from Margaret L. Daniel conveying to J. D. Maynard the land apportioned to John F. Daniel, and made at the request of John F. Daniel, does not accurately describe the property, but that John F. Daniel was in actual possession thereof, and that it was afterwards conveyed to plaintiffs. The plaintiffs claim title to all of the land except the separate parcels in possession of A. T. Daniel, M. M. Mann, and Olis Crump, as hereinbefore stated, under warranty deeds executed to them by Mrs. L. M. Maynard and J. D. Maynard, who themselves derived title either immediately or remotely from the children of Margaret L. Daniel, who had participated in the division hereinbefore mentioned. Other allegations were that, to avoid a multiplicity of actions, preserve and perpetuate the facts on which plaintiffs' title rests, quiet the title to the property, and do full and complete equity, it is proper that a court of equity take jurisdiction of the entire matter, enjoin the plaintiffs in the ejectment suits, and compel them to assert in this suit such rights as they may have in the property. The prayers were: (a) That each of the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit be enjoined from prosecuting such suits, and be required to plead in the present suit. (b) That Mrs. Mann, J. S. Daniel, A. T. Daniel, and Ollis Crump be required to come into court and set up such title in the property as they have. (c) That, in the event it should be found there was no formal division, title be decreed in petitioners to all the land received by Lilla Sawyer, Martha L. Wilson, John F. Daniel, and all that was received by J. S. Daniel except that part which passed to Ollis Crump. (d) That J. D. Maynard and Mrs. L. M. Maynard, as immediate grantors to plaintiffs and warrantors of their title, be bound by whatever decree should be made in the case. (e) That it be decreed that R. S. Daniel has no further interest in the property. (f) That process issue, requiring all the defendants to answer the complaint. A demurrer was filed by John F. Daniel, Mrs. Martha L. Wilson, M. B. Daniel, R. S. Daniel, A. T. Daniel, Frank Sawyer, and Mrs. Annie Johnson; the demurrer being both general and special. Some of the grounds of the demurrer were sustained by an order striking certain portions of the petition, and others were overruled. The defendants excepted to the judgment in so far as it overruled any of the grounds of the demurrer. Held:

On the basis of an informal division among the children made by Margaret L. Daniel and acceptance by the children of the portions of the land allotted to them in severalty, and enjoyment and subsequent disposition thereof by them, some of the property finally passing by mesne conveyances to the plaintiffs and other parts of it to some of the defendants, the allegations of the petition were sufficient to state a cause of action. Dixon v. Patterson, 135 Ga. 183, 69 S. E. 21; Reed v. Mathewson, 146 Ga. 819, 92 S. E. 632, and cases cited. And inasmuch as the plaintiffs in the ejectment suits, suing for undivided interests in the land, were alleged to have participated in the division of the land and accepted the portions allotted to them in severalty, the allegations of the petition (in order to avoid a multiplicity of actions) were a sufficient basis for an injunction against the further prosecution of the common-law suits, and for an order requiring the plaintiffs in such suits to set up their rights in the equitable suit. Civ. Code 1910, § 5469, subd. 2.

2. Action \S 50(10)—Quieting title \S 30(1)—No misjoinder of causes or parties in suit to determine title to land informally partitioned.

As the children of Margaret L. Daniel were tenants in remainder as to the whole lot, as their shares in the land were transmitted in severalty by mesne conveyances until title to some portions thereof vested in plaintiffs, and all of the defendants are now interested either as owner of some part of the land or as warrantor of the title to some part of it, and the objects of the suit include quieting the title to the several portions by decreeing it to be in the parties to whom it rightfully belongs, there was no misjoinder of parties defendant or improper joinder of causes of action.

3. Quieting title \S 30(3)—In suit to establish title to land informally partitioned, legal representative of former life tenant not necessary party.

The petition did not seek reformation of any deed executed by Margaret L. Daniel, and a legal representative of her estate was not a necessary party defendant.

4. Foregoing rulings sufficient.

The foregoing rulings sufficiently deal with all of the grounds of demurrer which were overruled by the trial court.

HILTON v. ROGERS. (No. 2504.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Set-off and counterclaim \S 35(2)—Injunction \S 26(8)—Damages ex delicto cannot be set off against cause of action ex contractu, but may be set off in equity; party having equitable set-off may enjoin common-law action and have entire controversy determined in equity.

Mrs. Edward Hilton instituted an equitable action against Sarah Rogers. The petition as amended alleged that Sarah Rogers had sued plaintiff, in the municipal court of the city of Macon, for certain wages due her as cook, and that the defendant who was insolvent had stolen from her specified articles of the value of $53; that plaintiff had demanded the return of the goods, which was refused; that plaintiff desired to plead her demand as a set-off in the action for wages, but, being based on tort, such plea could not be urged in a court of law. The prayers as amended were: (a) That the suit pending in the municipal court be enjoined, and that the plaintiff therein be ordered to set up her demands in the equitable suit. (b) That plaintiff be allowed to recover "her property stolen by the defendant, and that her set-off be allowed." The judge overruled certain grounds of special demurrer, and dismissed the petition on general demurrer alone. The plaintiff excepted. Held: "Damages arising ex delicto cannot be set off against a cause of action arising ex contractu, but a defendant sued at law upon a cause of action arising ex contractu may, in equity, set off damages arising ex delicto, when the plaintiff is insolvent or a non-resident. And if the plaintiff's suit is pending in a city court, the defendant, in order to avail himself of such right of equitable set-off, may apply to the superior court, as a court of equity, to enjoin the common-law proceeding in the city court and take jurisdiction of the entire controversy between the parties and make a decree doing complete justice between them." Arnold v. Carter, 125 Ga. 319-325, 54 S. E. 177, 179; Hecht v. Snook, 114 Ga. 921, 41 S. E. 74; Ray v. Anderson, 119 Ga. 926, 47 S. E. 205.

2. Action ¶28—Injured party may waive tort if property converted into money, but not otherwise.

Where one wrongfully takes the personal property of another and converts it into money, the latter has a right of action ex delicto for the wrong done him, though he is not restricted to that form of action, but may as a general rule waive the tort and sue in assumpsit as for money had and received to his use. If the wrongdoer after taking the property converts the same to his own use in some other manner than by a sale, and does not receive any money therefor, the owner has a right of action ex delicto against such wrongdoer, and is restricted to this form of action. Civ. Code, § 4407; Cragg v. Arendale, 113 Ga. 181 (3, 4), 38 S. E. 399.

3. Injunction ¶26(8)—Relief against action at law improperly denied on ground that plaintiff could waive tort and counterclaim at law.

Whether or not it would be proper to refuse to entertain a suit for injunction and other relief where the plaintiff seeks to set off his demand founded on tort against a demand arising in contract, because the plaintiff might have an election to waive the tort and sue on the contract, it would not be proper to refuse the injunction and other equitable relief in this case where it is not alleged that the articles stolen were sold or otherwise converted into money.

4. Dismissal of petition held error.

Applying the principles above stated, the trial court erred in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

RIMES v. RIMES. (No. 2384.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Specific performance ¶68, 114(1)—Not generally decreed of contracts relating to personalty; allegations of petition held not to require specific performance of contract to sell stock.

As a general rule, equity will not decree specific performance of contracts relating to personal property. In order to sustain a bill for the specific performance of such a contract, it is necessary to allege some good reason in equity and good conscience to take the case out of the general rule. The allegations of the petition do not take this case out of the general rule, and the court did not err in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Action by R. D. Rimes against T. T. Rimes. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Melville Price, of Ludowici, for plaintiff in error.

Seabrook & Kennedy, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. Plaintiff's petition sought to have specific performance of a written contract of sale by defendant to plaintiff of 25 shares of the corporate stock of the Citizens' Bank of Ludowici. Defendant demurred generally and specially. The general demurrer was sustained, and plaintiff excepted.

No special value is attached to particular shares of stock in a corporation over other like shares. Generally damages at law are considered adequate to enable the plaintiff to procure stock in the open market, equivalent to that which he is entitled to receive under his contract. 25 R. C. L. 298, and cases cited in notes 11 and 12. It is not alleged in the petition here that defendant is insolvent, or that the value of the stock is uncertain. The ground upon which the jurisdiction of equity is invoked in this case is said to arise from the peculiar value which the stock has under the special circumstances of the case, by reason of which plaintiff's right to recover damages would not constitute an adequate remedy at law. The special circumstances relied on are that plaintiff contracted to buy the stock for the purpose of securing to himself the control of the corporation, and that, acting upon his contract with defendant, plaintiff purchased and paid full value for other large blocks of stock in the corporation, with the knowledge of defendant. While the contract, made for the avowed purpose of securing to plaintiff the control of the corporation, which purpose was known to defendant at the time, is not illegal (see Central Ry. Co. v. Central Trust Co., 135 Ga. 472 [2], 69 S. E. 708), it has been held that it is contrary to well-established equitable principles to grant relief for such purpose. (Clowes v. Miller, 74 Conn. 287, 50 Atl. 728; see, also, Ryan v. McLane, 91 Md. 175, 46 Atl. 340; 50 L. R. A. 514, 80 Am. St. Rep. 438). There are cases to the contrary. See Sherman v. Herr, 220 Pa. 420, 69 Atl. 899; Schmidt v. Pritchard, 135 Iowa, 240, 112 N. W. 801; Sherwood v. Wallin, 1 Cal. App. 532, 32 Pac. 566. It is generally held that specific performance of a contract for the sale of corporate stock will be decreed where the stock has some peculiar value to the plaintiff, or where the value of the stock is uncertain, or the stock cannot be obtained elsewhere. Hubbard v. George, 81 W. Va. 538, 94 S. E. 974, L. R. A. 1918C, 835, and cases cited in note; Morgan v. Bartlett, 75 W. Va. 293, 83 S. E. 1001, L. R. A. 1915D, 300, and cases cited in note; Hogg v. McGuffin, 67 W. Va. 456, 68 S. E. 41, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 491, and cases cited in note.

The plaintiff in this case does not affirmatively allege that he cannot obtain other shares of the stock in the open market. His allegation is "that he has been out and tried to buy stock in said bank to replace that of the said Troy F. Rimes, but entirely failed to buy same; that petitioner cannot buy same." But he also avers that defendant's purpose in refusing to complete the sale and transfer of the stock is to compel plaintiff to pay an unreasonable price for the stock. The further allegation is made that defendant and another stockholder in the corporation are acting together for this purpose. In the absence of a direct and unequivocal allegation that the stock could not be purchased in the open market, or that the value of the stock was not easily ascertainable, or other good cause, equity will not enforce specific performance of the contract against the solvent defendant upon the sole ground that the contract was made to enable plaintiff to secure to himself control of the corporation.

It is true that the petition alleges that plaintiff, if allowed to have the stock, will greatly increase its value by increasing the earnings of the bank, and that his damages in this regard cannot be ascertained if he is not granted the relief prayed. It is clear that plaintiff does not here intend to allege that the stock has a special or peculiar value. The element of value here asserted is not inherent in the particular stock itself. The expected profits and benefits to be derived from the control of the corporation by plaintiff are quite too remote and contingent to authorize the relief prayed. The allegations of the petition do not take the case out of the general rule stated in Carolee v. Handells, 103 Ga. 299, 29 S. E. 935, stated in the headnote; and the court did not err in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

EMPIRE COTTON OIL CO. v. TAYLOR.
(No. 2534.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal and error \S 267(1)—Writ dismissed when bill of exceptions does not assign error on final decree; assignment of error on ruling sustaining demurrer to amendment insufficient.

"Although the bill of exceptions specifically assigns error upon rulings made during the progress of the case in the trial court, and recites the rendition of a final decree, and specifies that decree as a part of the record to be transmitted, yet if it contains no assignment of error on the final decree, the writ of error must be dismissed. The final decree must be excepted to, in order to obtain consideration of exceptions to rulings preceding it." Winder Lumber Co. v. Washington Brick Co., 149 Ga. 215, 99 S. E. 863. Accordingly, where on the call of the case in this court the defendant in error moves to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that there is no assignment of error upon the final judgment rendered in the case, although it recites and shows that a final judgment was rendered, and where upon an inspection of the bill of exceptions it appears that the only exception is to the judgment of the court below sustaining a demurrer to an amendment in aid of the levy in the case, and exceptions pendente lite to such ruling were certified and ordered filed as a part of the record in the case, an assignment of error merely upon such ruling made during the progress of the trial is not an exception to the final judgment, and therefore, under the foregoing ruling, the motion to dismiss must be sustained.

STOKES et al. v. HUMPHRIES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Evidence ¶401—Reformation of Instruments ¶20, 36(1)—One giving note and taking bond for title cannot contradict the bond without showing fraud or mistake; fraud which will be relieved against must be fraud preventing reading of written instrument; partnership negotiations held not to have reached point where confidential relations excused failure of diligence in signing agreements; petition held not to show diligence in ascertaining terms of the writing.

The court did not err in sustaining a general demurrer to the petition, it appearing that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief sought, because he was bound by the terms of a written instrument, and was not entitled to be relieved of the effects of such written instrument under the facts alleged in the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Twiggs County; J. L. Kent, Judge.

Suit by W. C. Stokes and others against C. O. Humphries and others. Judgment for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The essential facts alleged in the petition brought by Stokes against Humphries and Waters are as follows: Stokes held an option on a tract of land belonging to the Napiers for $30,000. Stokes found a party willing to pay $38,000 for the land, and was about to consummate a sale to him whereby he would realize a profit of some $8,000, when Humphries advised him that the land with its valuable timber was worth much more than that amount; that the timber alone was worth $45,000 above the cost of cutting, sawing and marketing. Stokes knew Humphries to be a man of wide experience in the sawmill and lumber business. Humphries proposed to Stokes to finance the proposition, offering to put in the money necessary to purchase the land from the Napiers. The Napiers were willing to accept $28,500, $10,000 to be in cash and the balance in two annual payments of $9,250 each. Humphries proposed to make the first cash payment, and to put in active charge of cutting and sawing the timber one Waters, who was an expert sawmill man; that the three, Stokes, Humphries, and Waters would own each a one-third interest in the land; Humphries to reimburse himself for all sums paid to the Napiers from the sale of lumber obtained from the land; when fully reimbursed for such payments, the land would then belong jointly to Stokes, Humphries, and Waters. Humphries advanced the cash payment of $10,000 to the Napiers; whereupon the latter executed their warranty deed to Stokes. Stokes executed two promissory notes for $9,250 each in favor of the Napiers, for the balance of the purchase price of the land, payable on October 4, 1920, and October 4, 1921, respectively. To secure the payment of these notes Stokes executed his deed to the land, conveying the same to the Napiers. Humphries then advising Stokes that the proper thing to do was for Stokes to execute a deed to him for the land, this was done, Stokes at the same time executing his promissory note to Humphries for $9,250, and expecting to receive from Humphries a paper embodying the agreement and understanding of the parties. Whereupon Humphries procured a named lawyer, in whom petitioner had the utmost confidence, to draw the necessary paper, petitioner also having great confidence in Humphries, and believing that, on account of their partnership and confidential relations, Humphries would correctly inform the attorney who was to draw the paper as to the trade. The paper thus drawn and executed by Humphries was a bond for title, in which Humphries obligated himself to convey to Stokes a one-third undivided interest in the land upon the payment by Stokes of the two outstanding promissory notes given to the Napiers for $9,250 each, and the note given by Stokes to Humphries for $9,250. Stokes received from Humphries this bond for title, but did not read the same, supposing that it was a paper so drawn as to speak the agreement and understanding of the parties, to wit, that Humphries and Waters would begin promptly (this was in the fall of 1919) to place sawmills upon the land and proceed to convert the timber into lumber and sell the same, which at that time was very valuable, and, when a sufficient quantity was sold to reimburse Humphries, not only for the cost of cutting, sawing, and marketing the same, but to pay off all indebtedness against the land, Humphries would then convey to petitioner a one-third undivided interest in the land. Petitioner alleges that there was delay in placing sawmills on the land, although he urged Humphries and Waters to carry out their promise in this respect. At that time lumber was bringing high prices, and the delay was resulting in loss to petitioner. Becoming impatient with Humphries and Waters on account of the slow progress being made in cutting and sawing the timber, Stokes examined his bond for title, and found that the stipulation contained therein was to the effect that, upon the payment by Stokes of all outstanding indebtedness against the land, consisting of the three promissory notes aggregating $27,750, a one-third undivided interest in the land would be conveyed to him by Humphries. Whereupon Stokes, setting forth these facts, alleged that the bond for title did not speak the understanding between him and the defendants, and that the same was a fraud perpetrated upon him, and he prayed that the notes which he had executed be surrendered and canceled, that Humphries be required to perform his obligation as to sawing the timber on the land at his own expense; for an accounting for all lumber sold and the expenses incident to cutting, sawing, and selling same, and for other relief. The defendants filed general and special demurrers, which were sustained by the court, and the petition was dismissed. To this ruling the petitioner excepted.

Jordan & Moore and Walter De Fore, all of Macon, for plaintiffs in error.

John R. L. Smith and Grady C. Harris, both of Macon, and R. A. Harrison, of Jeffersonville, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The note which was executed by Stokes, the plaintiff in error, to Humphries for $10,000, and the bond for title which Humphries then executed, and delivered to Stokes, taken together, constituted a single contract in writing. While Stokes did not sign the bond for title, he did sign the note; and, before he could have the right to submit oral evidence to vary or contradict the terms of the contract as contained in the writing, it would be necessary for him to show that the contract was obtained by fraud or executed by mistake relievable in equity. The two papers constituting one written contract, the maker of the note, who was the obligee in the bond, could not vary or contradict the terms of the bond so as to enlarge his rights or diminish his liabilities without showing fraud upon the part of the maker of the bond and the payee in the note in obtaining the signature to the note and the acceptance of the bond. And, according to the repeated rulings of this court, the fraud which would relieve a party who can read, under the circumstances set forth in the petition, must be fraud which prevents him from reading.

"Equity will not reform a written contract because of mistake as to the contents of the writing on the part of the complaining party (who was able to read), and fraud of the other party which consists only in making false representations as to such contents, on which the complaining party relied as true because of confidence in the party making them, no fiduciary or confidential relation existing between the parties, and no sufficient excuse appearing why the complaining party did not read the contract." Weaver v. Roberson, 134 Ga. 149, 67 S. E. 662.

There is no merit in the contention that Humphries and Stokes were partners, and that because of that fact such confidential relations existed between them as would relieve the complainant of the effects of his negligence in acquainting himself with the terms of the contract for the sale and conveyance of this land. The establishment of the contention of the plaintiff in error as to this question depends upon the effect of his efforts to eliminate the written contract so as to permit him to enter upon a consideration of prior negotiations which resulted in the written contract. If those prior negotiations had resulted in a written contract embodying what the plaintiff in error now contends was the real understanding between the parties, there might have been something in the contention that such confidential relations existed between them as would have excused him for relying upon statements made in the conduct of the business, and that would have justified him in expecting from Humphries the observance of that good faith which one partner owes to another. But when this transaction was made the two parties had not progressed to that extent in the formation of a partnership which would excuse either one of them for failing to exercise the ordinary diligence of business men in the signing of written instruments embodying the evidence of a consummation of negotiations leading up to an important business transaction. If the bond for title in this case contained a mistake, or if the plaintiff in error was in ignorance of its terms, or if it contained terms which enabled the obligor in the bond to perpetrate an actual fraud, the mistake or fraud would have been apparent to one of ordinary intelligence upon a reading of the paper; but the plaintiff in error did not read it, it seems, and even alleges that he did not give it serious consideration. And, so far as appears from this petition, the complainant let a considerable time elapse before carefully considering the paper and ascertaining its contents; just how long a period of time he let elapse the pleader does not show—certainly does not show that he exercised any diligence in ascertaining the contents of the writing. It may be that the case is a hard one under the facts alleged, which are to be taken as true upon demurrer; but that does not authorize the court of equity to grant relief to one who failed entirely to exercise the diligence and prudence imposed by law upon one who seeks equitable relief.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the case must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur; ATKINSON, J., in the judgment.

BOWERS v. HANKS. (No. 2515.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Counties \S 21½—Have only such powers as are given by some legislative act.

Neither the counties of this state nor their officers can do any act, make any contract, or incur any liability not authorized by some legislative act applicable thereto.

2. Counties \S 114—County board held without power to employ county demonstration agent.

The board of commissioners of roads and revenues of the county of Floyd is without authority to employ a county demonstration agent and to pay his salary out of the funds of said county; there being no statute of this state authorizing such employment and expenditure.

3. Counties \S 192—Legislature may authorize employment of county demonstration agent.

Under the Constitution of this state the Legislature has authority to authorize the counties thereof to employ county demonstration agents, and to pay their salaries from funds to be raised by county taxation.

4. Counties \S 63 — No authority to employ county demonstration agent under act relating to boards of health.

The record in this case failing to disclose that the act of 1914, giving to the county board of health full power to adopt all such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitutions of this state and of the United States, for the protection of the health of their respective counties, had been recommended by two successive grand juries of Floyd county, and the record further failing to disclose that, if said act had been so recommended and rules and regulations prescribed, such rules and regulations authorize the employment of county demonstration agents, the contract in this case cannot be sustained under this act.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Mandamus by W. E. Bowers against J. D. Hanks, Chairman of the Board of Commissioners of Roads and Revenues of Floyd County. Judgment refusing to make the mandamus absolute, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

W. E. Bowers was employed by the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Floyd county as county demonstration agent of said county for the year 1921, at the salary of $150 per month. As such agent he rendered the services required for the months of January and February, 1921. The clerk of said board issued a warrant for the two months' salary due him; but the chairman of the board, upon whom devolved the duty of signing county warrants, refused to sign the same. Thereupon Bowers applied for a mandamus to compel him to sign the warrant issued by the clerk for his salary for the two months. Mandamus nisi issued; and in reply thereto J. D. Hanks, as chairman of said board, demurred to the petition, on the grounds: (a) That there was no law authorizing the employment of such agent and the payment of his salary by the county of Floyd; and (b) because such salary could not be constitutionally paid from the funds of said county raised by taxation. In his answer Hanks, as such chairman, set up the same defenses to the mandamus proceedings.

The case was submitted to the trial judge upon the petition, demurrer, and answer, and he refused to make the mandamus absolute. The plaintiff excepts to this judgment.

M. B. Eubanks, Lamar Camp, and L. A. Dean, all of Rome, and Cobb & Bell, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.

John W. Maddox, of Rome, for defendant in error.

HINES, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Article 2, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state declares that "each county shall be a body corporate, with such powers and limitations as may be prescribed by law." Civil Code, § 6594. Under this provision of our Constitution counties possess no powers not conferred upon them either expressly or by fair implication from the statutes applicable to them. When they undertake through their constituted authorities to exercise the power of taxation in any given manner, a clear and manifest legal right to do so must appear. Maxwell v. Cumming, 58 Ga. 384; Kennedy v. Seamans, 60 Ga. 612; Albany Bottling Co. v. Watson, 103 Ga. 503, 30 S. E. 270; Howard v. Early County, 104 Ga. 669, 30 S. E. 830; De Vaughn v. Booten, 146 Ga. 838, 92 S. E. 629.

[2] Has the Legislature granted to the county of Floyd the authority to employ and pay a county demonstration agent? Our attention has not been called to any statute of this state conferring this power generally upon the counties thereof; but it is insisted that the act creating the board of commissioners of roads and revenues for the county of Floyd confers statutory power upon said board to employ and pay such an agent from the funds of the county raised by public taxation. No such express power is given this board by the act of the Legislature creating the same; but it is insisted that this board can exercise, in addition to the specific authority granted in the act of its creation, such other powers as were granted by the then Code of this state to justices of the inferior court. Section 5 of this act declares that—

"Said board of commissioners shall have the same powers in appointing road commissioners and enforcing the road laws, as justices of the inferior court had by the Code of this state prior to the ratification of the late state Constitution, and shall exercise such other powers as are granted by the Code of the state to said Justices." Ga. Laws 1871-72, p. 228 et seq.

Under the then Code of this state the justices of the inferior court of the several counties had authority, upon the recommendation of the grand jury, to levy a tax upon the state tax, for educational purposes, of such per cent. as said jury may recommend. Code of 1867, § 1281. If the grand jury at the time they should recommend the general county tax failed to take any action in reference to this tax, then such justices might, in their discretion, levy a tax for such purpose, not to exceed 25 per cent. upon the state tax. Code of 1867, § 1282. The educational fund of each county was under the management of a board of education, consisting of the justices of the inferior court, the ordinary, and some other qualified citizen, to be selected by the judge of the superior court presiding in such county. Code of 1867, § 1285. If the board of education failed to devise any plan of education, the laws in force prior to December 13, 1859, were continued in force. Code of 1867, § 1294.

It is insisted that the act creating the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Floyd county is preserved by article 12, section 1, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of 1877, which provides:

"Local and private acts passed for the benefit of counties, cities, towns, corporations, and private persons not inconsistent with the supreme law, nor with this Constitution, and which have not expired nor been repealed, shall have the force of statute law, subject to judicial decision as to their validity when passed, and to any limitations imposed by their own terms"

—and that this board can still exercise all the powers with reference to county matters, including educational matters, that the justices of the inferior court possessed. This provision of the Constitution gives to this local act the force of statute law, and preserves to this board all powers which the justices of the inferior court had under the Code of 1867. Under this Code the justices of the inferior court had authority, upon the recommendation of the grand jury, to levy a tax upon the state tax, for educational purposes, of such per cent. as said jury might recommend; and in case the jury failed to act, then the justices could levy a tax for such purpose, not to exceed 25 per cent. upon the state tax. Code of 1867, §§ 1281, 1282. But this power, possessed by the justices of the inferior court, and given to the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Floyd county by the act creating it, does not confer upon this board the power to declare what kinds of education shall be provided. The plan and system of county education was to be fixed by the then county board of education, or, on their default in this matter, the plan and system provided by law prior to December 13, 1859, prevailed.

The justices of the inferior court were without power to declare and define educational purposes; but could only levy a tax to carry out such purposes when defined and fixed by the proper authorities. At the date of Irwin's Code the educational system of Georgia consisted of the University of Georgia, the Georgia Military Academy, the Academy for the Blind, the Academy for the Deaf and Dumb, county academies, and common schools. Code of 1867, § 1197 et seq. There was a board of education for each county, made up of justices of the inferior court, the ordinary, and some other qualified citizen selected by the judge of the superior court presiding in the county. Code of 1867, § 1285. This board adopted annually the school system. Code of 1867, § 1286. If this board failed to devise any plan of education, the system provided by law prior to December 13, 1859, was continued in force. Code of 1867, § 1294.

So the system of county education was then fixed by the county board of education; and the justices of the inferior court as such did not have the power to adopt the county system of education. As members of the county board the justices of the inferior court in that capacity could have predominant influence. But they exercised this influence, not as justices of the inferior court, but as members of the county board of education.

So the justices of the inferior court were without power to fix the curriculum in the county schools, but when the same was adopted by the county board of education they could levy the tax for the support of the county schools under the provisions of law above referred to.

Under the present Code county taxes can be levied "to pay charges for educational purposes, to be levied only in strict compliance with the law." Civil Code, § 513, par. 8. This provision does not confer power on the county authorities to levy a school tax ad libitum. This provision of law manifestly refers to statutes which authorize the levy, and on which such levy must depend. Richter v. Bacon, 145 Ga. 408, 89 S. E. 367.

[4] The county boards of health now have supervision over all matters relating to health and sanitation in their respective counties, where the operation of the act of August 17, 1914 (Ga. Laws 1914, p. 124), has been recommended by two successive grand juries. In counties where this law has been so adopted the county authorities have full power to adopt, enact, establish, and maintain all such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws and Constitutions of this state and of the United States, as they may deem necessary and proper for protecting the health of their respective counties. Civil Code, § 1670. As county demonstration agents have, as we shall hereafter show, much to do with sanitation and health, the county boards of health or the county authorities, after adopting proper rules and regulations, might provide for the employment and pay of these agents (Townsend v. Smith, 144 Ga. 792, 87 S. E. 1039), but this act has not been adopted in Floyd county, so far as the record discloses. So, in the absence of statutory authority, we reach the conclusion that the board of roads and revenues of Floyd county is without authority to employ and pay a county demonstration agent from the public funds of said county raised by taxation. The contract which the board made with the plaintiff, employing him as such agent, is without authority of law, and is null and void.

[3] 2. But we are equally clear that the Legislature of the state can authorize the counties of this state to levy taxes for the purposes of employing county demonstration agents. Under legislative authority any county can levy a tax for educational purposes. Civil Code, § 6562 (Ga. Laws 1910, p. 45).

Under the Constitution of 1877, as originally written, the Legislature could only delegate to counties the power to levy a tax "for educational purposes in instructing children in the elementary branches of an English education only." The Legislature was without authority to authorize the counties to levy a tax for any other educational purpose. Under this provision of the Constitution, as amended in 1910 (Ga. Laws 1910, p. 45), the Legislature has power to authorize the counties to levy a tax for educational purposes generally. So, if a county demonstration agent is engaged in carrying out an educational purpose, the Legislature can authorize the counties to levy a tax for such purpose.

What are the functions of a county demonstration agent? The Agricultural Extension Work Act of Congress (38 Stat. 372; U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8877a-8877h) was passed "in order to aid in diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics, and to encourage the application of the same"; and to this end it was enacted that—"There may be inaugurated in connection with the college or colleges in each state now receiving, or which may hereafter receive, the benefits of the act of Congress approved July second, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, entitled 'An act donating public lands to the several states and territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts, * * * agricultural extension work which shall be carried on in co-operation with the United States Department of Agriculture.'"

The assent of the General Assembly of Georgia was given to the provisions and requirements of this act of Congress, and the trustees of the University of Georgia were authorized to receive the grants of money appropriated under said act, to organize and conduct agricultural extension work. Ga. Laws 1914, p. 1243.

To carry out this university extension work county demonstration agents are appointed. They are required to make farm surveys, arrive at farm problems, and assist in solving them, to conduct demonstrations for adult farmers on the rotation of crops, improvement of the soil, better methods of cultivation, and the rational use of fertilizers, to develop the swine industry by the use of better pastures, better bred herds, and by fighting hog cholera, lice, other diseases and parasites, to enlarge the beef industry by the use of better bred sires and the development of pure bred herds, to assist in improving the farm dairy through the introduction of pure bred sires, the use of balanced rations, and the keeping of methodical records, to demonstrate the proper care of the home orchards, home gardens, small fruit and truck crops, to encourage local fairs and clubs for the purpose of securing united effort in developing community enterprises, such as co-operative creameries, meat-curing houses, methods of controlling boll weevil, and co-operation in the marketing of farm products, and to co-operate with school superintendents and teachers in the organization of boys' and girls' agricultural club work, and the introduction, use, and study of home economics in the public schools.

So the farm demonstration agent is appointed to carry out a very ambitious scheme of education in the above-enumerated matters. He is a peripatetic teacher of these subjects, going from home to home, from farm to farm, to impart information on these various subjects. He is employed to impart agricultural information to adult farmers. He does this by university or college extension work in connection with the agricultural college of this state and the United States Department of Agriculture. The educational purpose to be achieved by him is a very important one to the agriculture of this state. He carries on an important branch of education.

So we are of the opinion that under the present Constitution of this state the Legislature can authorize the county authorities to levy a tax for this educational purpose.

But, as the Legislature has not yet seen fit to authorize the counties to engage in this university extension work, the county of Floyd was without authority to employ the plaintiff to engage in this work in that county, and to pay him therefor from the public funds of that county raised by taxation. The judgment of the court below, refusing a mandamus absolute, is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators \Leftrightarrow 200—Widow gives entire estate subject to debts as year's support not liable for unpaid balance on stock.

Where a man at the time of his death held a certificate for five shares of bank stock of the par value of $100 a share, upon which a balance of $200 of the subscription price remained unpaid, and a year's support was set aside to his widow and minor children of his "entire estate after all the just debts are paid," and in the schedule of the appraisers the five shares of stock set aside as a part of a year's support was valued at $300, and subsequently, upon an inspection of a certified copy of the entire proceedings of the year's support exhibited to the cashier of the bank by the widow, the cashier issued to her a certificate for five shares of stock, in which there was the recital, "60 per cent. paid in and assessable," the receivers of the bank, which subsequently became insolvent, could not obtain against the widow a general judgment for $200, as balance due as unpaid subscription.

Beck, P. J., dissenting.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action by T. Y. Smith and others, receivers, against Mary Hartley. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (26 Ga. App. 212, 105 S. E. 725), and defendant brings certiorari. Reversed.

At the time of his death A. N. Hartley held a certificate in his name for five shares of stock in the Farmers' State Bank of Bartow, Ga., of the par value of $100 a share, for which he had paid 60 per cent. of such value, the certificate reciting, "60 per cent. paid in and assessable." Upon the application of his widow a year's support from his estate was set aside to her and their three minor children. The appointed appraisers set apart as such year's support the "entire estate [of the decedent] after all the just debts are paid." The schedule of the appraisers attached to their report included "five shares in Farmer's State Bank of Bartow, Ga., $300," and other itemized property of stated value. The report of the appraisers was duly made the judgment of the ordinary's court. Mrs. Hartley subsequently requested the cashier of the bank to issue to her a certificate of stock, which he declined to do unless presented with a certified copy of the year's support proceedings. Mrs. Hartley presented such certified copy to the cashier, and he issued to her a certificate for five shares of the stock, which contained the words, "60 per cent. paid in and assessable." Thereafter she received one dividend declared on the stock held by her. The bank became insolvent; and the receivers appointed for it brought an action against Mrs. Hartley, and a number of other stockholders, to recover $40 a share as the balance of the unpaid subscription to stock held by them. The judge of the trial court directed a verdict against Mrs. Hartley for $200, with 7 per cent. interest thereon from July 1, 1919, which was from the date of the institution of the action. The defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, the case was carried to the Court of Appeals for review. A majority of the division of that court before which the case came for decision rendered a judgment affirming the ruling of the trial court. The case is here on certiorari to the Court of Appeals.

Evans & Evans, of Sandersville, for plaintiff.

R. G. Price and Phillips & Abbot, all of Louisville, for defendants.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The entire estate of the decedent, Hartley, was set apart as a year's support to his widow and minor children, "after all the just debts are paid." The judgment of the court of ordinary setting aside a year's support in which the language quoted appears, did not and could not legally impose upon the widow and the other beneficiaries of the year's support any liability to pay the debts owing by the estate of the decedent. Of course the widow could, if so minded, have voluntarily discharged all the debts of her deceased husband's estate, and have taken it in its entirety, relieved from any liability. It is true that under the terms of the report of the appraisers and the judgment of the court of ordinary she and the children took the entire estate after the payment of all of its just debts; that is, all the just debts had to be discharged before the beneficiaries of the year's support could take the entire estate. And an administrator could have been appointed of the estate, whose duty it would have been to pay all of the just debts from the assets of the estate received by him, and whatever assets of the estate remained after the payment of the just debts and the expenses of administration would have gone to the widow and minor children as their year's support. This procedure, however, was not followed; but the receivers of the bank, which they claim held the debt against the estate of the intestate for the sum of $200 owing by the decedent at the time of his death, as a balance of unpaid subscription on the five shares of stock, brought this action against his widow as a debt due by her by reason of the fact that her husband owed it, and that the bank upon her solicitation had issued to her a certificate for the five shares of stock for which her husband held a like certificate at his death. The bank demanded the exhibition to it of the certified copy of the year's support proceedings, before it would issue to her a certificate. The bank therefore had actual notice, from the copy of the proceedings exhibited to it, that only an interest to the amount of $300 had been set aside to the widow and children in the five shares of stock owned by the decedent. The widow did not expressly or impliedly agree or promise to pay the bank anything for the issuance by it to her of a certificate. It follows that, whatever claim the bank may have against the estate of the decedent, it has no cause of action against the widow, upon which a general judgment could be obtained against her.

Our conclusion is that the judgment of the majority of the division of the Court of Appeals which affirmed the judgment of the trial court was error.

Judgment reversed.

WILKINS et al. v. MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF SAVANNAH. (No. 2491.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Municipal corporations \S 323(1, 3) — Lot owners may sue to enjoin repaving and assessments therefor for illegality; lot owners authorized to join in injunction suit to prevent multiplicity of suits; suit held not premature nor barred by laches.

Where a city is proceeding to repave a street and is preparing to have assessments for such improvement levied against the lots of owners abutting on such street, several owners of such lots can join in an equitable action to enjoin such work and to have the assessments against their lots enjoined on the ground that the municipal authorities are without power to make them, and that the contract between the city and the contractor for such work was illegal and furnished no valid basis for such assessments. In order to prevent a multiplicity of suits, several owners of such abutting lots can join in a common attack upon the validity of such assessments; the city admitting that it was getting ready to levy them against the lots of the plaintiffs. Sanders v. Mayor, etc., of Gainesville, 141 Ga. 446, 81 S. E. 215.

2. Statutes \S 76(2)—Special law relative to assessments for repaving held unconstitutional because of existence of general law.

So much of "An act to alter and amend the several acts relating to and incorporating the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah, and for other purposes," as authorizes the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah to assess the entire cost of repaving its streets to the lots of owners abutting thereon, instead of assessing to such lots the proportion of cost assessed against them when said streets were originally paved, is unconstitutional and void, because there was an existing general law applicable in such case when said act was passed.

3. Appeal and error \S 954(1)—Grant or refusal of injunction will be reviewed when question is one of law.

The rule that this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in granting or refusing an injunction does not apply when the question to be decided is one of law.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Municipal corporations \S 269(2)—Statute authorizing cities to "renew" pavement includes repaving.

Under Civ. Code 1910, \S 870, authorizing cities to renew or repair any pavement on the terms and conditions in force when the pavement was laid, the power to "renew" includes the power to repave, especially as the original act used the words "pave again."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Renew.]

5. Municipal corporations \S 414(1)—Statute requiring repaving on same terms and conditions as original paving held to include proportion of cost chargeable against abutting owners.

Civ. Code 1910, \S 870, authorizing cities to renew or repair pavements on the same terms and conditions as to assessment as were in force when the pavement was originally laid, includes in such terms and conditions the proportion of the cost chargeable to abutting lots.

On Motion for Rehearing.

6. Constitutional law \S 188—Municipal corporations \S 407(1)—Law providing for assessments under earlier law and validating proceedings thereunder held prohibited retroactive law.

Laws 1921, p. 1080, providing that when paving proceedings by the city of Savannah under Laws 1919, p. 1294, shall be invalid for any reason, assessments shall be levied under Laws 1884-85, p. 362, Laws 1887, p. 537, and Laws 1910, p. 1142, and the assessments shall be legal and binding, and validating proceedings under the act of 1919, is a retroactive law prohibited by Const. art. 1, \S 3, par. 2.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Suit by C. Wilkins and others against the Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah. An injunction was denied, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

C. Wilkins, Annie C. Warren, Victor G. Schreck, J. C. Slater and Kate G. Simkins filed their petition for injunction against the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah, and made this case: The plaintiffs are owners of lots which front on West Broad street between Indian street and Thirty-First street in the city of Savannah. Said street is now paved between the curbing with vitrified brick. Sections of said street within said limits were paved at various times by the city, under the act of the General Assembly approved October 1, 1887, (Laws 1887, p. 537), whereby the owners of abutting lots on each side of said street were assessed and paid two-thirds of the cost of said paving, exclusive of cost of paving the frontage of intersecting streets and lanes, which was paid by the city, and excluding the width of the street railroad tracks and two feet on each side, the cost of which was paid by the street railroad company. The city is now undertaking, by various resolutions and proceedings, to remove said vitrified brick pavement on West Broad street, and to repave said street with vibrolithic concrete. For this purpose the city, on January 28, 1921, executed a contract for this work with Dixon Contracting Company, and is now proceeding under color of the act of the General Assembly of Georgia approved August 18, 1919, known as the "Oklahoma Plan Act," to levy assessments against, and provide liens upon, the lots of plaintiffs fronting on said street, to pay for the whole cost of such pavement, except for the frontage of intersecting streets and lanes. The city of Savannah has a population of over 20,000 inhabitants, and has no lawful right to renew any pavement in said city, except as is provided by section 870 of the Civil Code of 1910. Plaintiffs allege that the Act of August 18, 1919 (Acts 1919, p. 1294 et seq.) under color of which the city is proceeding to repave West Broad street, is unconstitutional, because in conflict with article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that—

Plaintiffs allege that the assessments for this repaving, and the liens sought to be fixed upon their lots abutting said street for the payment of the entire cost of said pavement, constitute clouds upon their titles to the lots aforesaid. They pray that the city be enjoined from taking up said vitrified brick pavement, and from repaving West Broad street from Indian to Thirty-First street; from further proceeding to levy any assessments on their lots; and from issuing any street improvement bonds, payable out of said West Broad street assessments.

The city alleges that the pavement on West Broad street had become worn out and unserviceable; that on December 17, 1919, it had adopted a resolution under the provisions of section 22 of the Act of August 18, 1919, condemning said pavement, and on December 15, 1920, it had passed a resolution to repave said street between Indian street and Thirty-First street.

The city is proceeding to pave said street under the provisions of sections 10, 12, and 23 of the Act of August 18, 1919. The city contends that section 780 of the Civil Code of Georgia, which was amended August 19, 1919, never had any application to the city of Savannah until it was amended; that said Code section was enacted in 1890, and that at the time of its enactment the city of Savannah had full power and authority to renew existing pavements under the act of 1887, found in Georgia Laws 1887, p. 537. The city insists that the act of 1887 was not repealed by the act of 1890, embodied in said section of the Code, and that when the Act of August 18, 1919, was passed there was no general state statute which conflicted with said act of August 18, 1919.

The application for injunction was heard upon the petition and answer with the admission that the city of Savannah had a population of more than 20,000 inhabitants. The injunction was refused and the refusal of the injunction is complained of. The court below denied the injunction on the grounds: (1) Because the plaintiffs have an adequate and complete remedy at law; (2) because the unconstitutionality of the Act of August 18, 1919, was not made clearly to appear; and (3) in the exercise of his discretion the judge declined to grant a temporary injunction, the average excess amount which the complainants will be required to pay under the new plan over the old being $187.06, for which reason he was not willing to stop this needed public improvement.

H. W. Johnson, of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error.

Shelby Myrick, E. A. Cohen, and Lawrence & Abrahams, all of Savannah, for defendant in error.

HINES, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] On August 18, 1919, the charter of the city of Savannah was amended, and the city was given the authority to pave and repave its streets, and to assess the entire cost of such improvement to owners of property abutting on the streets so paved or repaved. Ga. Laws 1919, p. 1294 et seq. Plaintiffs, who own lots abutting on West Broad street in Savannah, the pavement on which had been condemned by the city and the street ordered to be repaved, attacked the constitutionality of so much of the said act of August 18, 1919, amending the charter of the city of Savannah as authorizes the city to assess the entire cost of repaving its streets to abutting property owners, on the ground that said act is in conflict with article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code, § 6391), which provides that—

[4, 5] At the date of the passage of this act there was in force a general law which declares that—

"The mayor and council or governing authority of any city having a population of over twenty thousand have authority to renew, by the use of any material that may be decided on, or repair any pavement in said city, upon the same terms and conditions, as to assessment of property and street car companies, as were in force when the pavement was originally laid." Civil Code, § 870.

Here is a general law which gives to municipalities in this state having a population of over 20,000 authority to renew or repair any pavements within their limits, upon the same terms and conditions, as to assessment of property and street car companies, as were in force when the pavement was originally laid. The power to renew is the power to repave. Regenstein v. Atlanta, 98 Ga. 167, 25 S. E. 428. In fact, the original act from which this section of the Code was taken used the words, "pave again," which clearly demonstrates that "renew" in the above section was used for "repaving." Under this general law municipalities could only assess the owners of property abutting on streets for repaving purposes the same percentage of cost assessable under the law when such streets were originally paved. In other words, assessments against owners of abutting property on streets which are repaved must be upon the same terms and conditions as to such assessments of property and street car companies as existed when the original pavement was put down. If, when the original pavement was laid, the owners of abutting lots could only be charged one-third, one-half, or two-thirds of the cost, then such owners, under this section, cannot be charged more when the pavement is renewed or the street repaved. The language, "upon the same terms and conditions as to assessment of property," includes the proportion of the cost which can be charged to owners of lots abutting upon the street which is repaved. Such proportion must be the same as that which could be charged to owners under the law in force when the pavement was originally laid.

When West Broad street was originally paved with vitrified brick, this was done under an act entitled:

"An act to authorize the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah to require the grading, paving, macadamizing or otherwise improving for travel or drainage any of the streets or lanes of the city of Savannah; to make and collect assessments for the same, and for other purposes." Ga. Laws 1887, p. 537.

Under this act the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah were authorized "to assess two-thirds of the cost of such paving, grading, macadamizing and otherwise improving on the real estate abutting on each side of the street or lane improved" and could require any street railroad company having tracks running through the streets of said city so improved to macadamize or otherwise pave, as the city might direct, the width of its track and two feet on each side thereof. These were the terms and conditions upon which the lots of owners abutting on streets of the city of Savannah could be assessed for paving or other improvements of its streets.

By the Act of August 18, 1919, the city is authorized to charge for repaving its streets the entire cost thereof to abutting property owners. This special act was passed when the general law embraced in section 870 of the Code was in force, and seems to us to be clearly in conflict with the provision of the Constitution of this state which forbids the passage of any special act for which provision had been made by an existing general law. This constitutional infirmity of the Act of August 18, 1919, is not cured by the fact that this section of the Code was amended on August 19, 1919, providing that—

"Where any change or modification is made in the charter of any city having a population of not less than 65,000 and not more than 100,000, in regard to the method of paving, by an amendment to such charter, provision may be made in such amendment for the renewal and repairing of any existing pavement under the provisions of such amendment." Ga. Laws 1919, p. 81.

This remedy came too late to save the fatal malady of the act of August 18, 1919. Jones v. McCaskill, 112 Ga. 453, 37 S. E. 724.

Counsel for the city of Savannah insist that section 870 never did apply to that city, because the act of 1887 conferred upon the city the identical power conferred by this section. It is urged that there is no conflict between the act of 1887 and this section of the Code, and that, for this reason, the local law is not modified or repealed. Granting this, the situation is not changed. The act of October 1, 1887, does confer upon the city the power to repave its streets. This section confers the same power; but it goes one step further, and establishes a general system of assessments for repaving for all cities of 20,000 inhabitants or more. It makes all assessments, chargeable under local laws, when the streets of such cities were originally paved, applicable to the repavement thereof.

Thus a general law on this subject is enacted, and by its express terms is made applicable to Savannah. But however this may be, the city of Savannah was not proceeding under the act of 1887, but under the amendment to its charter of 1919.

So we are of the opinion that so much of the act of August 18, 1919, as clothed the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah with the right to assess the entire cost of repaving this street to property abutting thereon, falls clearly within the case for which provision is made in section 870 of the Code, and for this reason is null and void because in violation of the provision of the Constitution above recited,

[3] The rule that this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in granting or refusing an injunction does not apply when the question to be decided by the trial judge is one of law. Chestatee Pyrites Co. v. Cavenders Creek Gold Mining Co., 118 Ga. 255, 45 S. E. 267.

[1] We do not think that the plaintiffs are guilty of such laches as would deprive them of the right of injunction. Counsel for the city contends that they are not entitled to an injunction, because they acted prematurely, as the assessments had not been made, but were only in process of being levied. They cannot be both premature in their action and at the same time guilty of laches. We think they are liable to neither charge.

We think that the court below should have granted an injunction restraining the mayor and council of the city of Savannah from proceeding to repave this street under the act of August 18, 1919. As this disposes of the case, we do not consider any of the other objections urged by the plaintiffs to these proceedings.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[6] Our attention has been called to the act of July 27, 1921 (Ga. Laws 1921, p. 1080), by which it is enacted that—

"Wherever and whenever said mayor and aldermen shall have undertaken to pave, or repave, or resurface, or otherwise improve any street * * * in the city of Savannah, under and by virtue of the provisions of the act of the General Assembly * * * approved August 18th, 1919, and found in Georgia Laws 1919, page 1294, and following * * * and the proceedings for such paving * * * and the assessments thereof, shall be held to be invalid for any reason, either before or after the paving * * * then and in such event the assessments for such paving * * * against the property and property owners shall be made and levied and collected under and by virtue and in pursuance of the provisions of the acts of the General Assembly * * * found in Georgia Laws 1884-1885, page 263 [362], and following, also in Georgia Laws 1887, page 537, and in Georgia Laws 1910, page 1142, and such assessments so made under the provisions of the last-named acts shall be legal and binding upon the property benefited and upon the property owners. All proceedings heretofore had by the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah under and by virtue of the act of the General Assembly, * * * approved August 18th, 1919, and found in Georgia Laws 1919, page 1294, and following for the paving or repaving or any street, * * * are hereby declared to be valid, it being the intention of the General Assembly of Georgia in the said act of August 18th, 1919, to include and import in the use of the word 'pave,' as used in sections 10 and 12 of said act the right to 'repave' any such street. * * *

It is insisted by able counsel for the defendant in error that this statute does not offend the provisions of our state Constitution against retroactive acts; and that although the act of August 18, 1919, under which the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah undertook to repave the portion of West Broad street and to assess the adjoining property for the cost of such improvement, has been declared by this court in this case unconstitutional, the above act of July 27, 1921, cures the invalidity of the proceedings for the repaving of this street and the assessments on the abutting lots for the cost of this improvement.

It is undoubtedly true that a municipal contract expenditure, or appropriation, invalid when made, may be cured by subsequent legislation, unless the invalidity results from a violation of a constitutional inhibition. So where municipalities, without authority, subscribe for shares in railroad companies, the Legislature formerly could pass acts making valid and binding such subscriptions, and authorize the municipalities to levy taxes for the purpose of paying such subscriptions. Winn v. Macon, 21 Ga. 275; Bass v. Columbus, 30 Ga. 845.

But the above cases are distinguishable from the case at bar. Those cases simply validated contracts made by municipalities and authorized the municipalities to levy taxes to meet the obligations incurred thereunder. They did not authorize the municipalities to enforce obligations against third persons and their property. Curative acts validating invalid obligations of a municipality are widely different from a curative act authorizing a municipality to enforce contracts which impose liabilities upon its citizens and making valid illegal and unconstitutional assessments upon their property.

The Constitution of this state prohibits retroactive laws. Article 1, § 3, par 2 (Civil Code, § 6389). Under this provision every statute which "creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty, or attaches a new liability in respect to transactions or consideration already past, must be deemed retrospective." Ross v. Lettice, 134 Ga. 866, 68 S. E. 734, 137 Am. St. Rep. 281.

So we are constrained to deny the motion for a rehearing in this case.

WASHINGTON EXCH. BANK et al. v. BARNETT, Tax Collector, et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1922.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Taxation —40(8)—Statute as to equalization not unconstitutional.

The provisions of section 6, 13, and 14 of the act of the General Assembly of Georgia for the equalization of taxation in this state, approved August 14, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 123), are not unconstitutional upon the grounds assigned.

2. Taxation —611(6)—Affidavit on motion for injunction held to support finding that notice of increase in valuation was given.

The judge was authorized to find from the evidence that the taxpayers whose tax returns were changed were served with notices as provided by law.

3. Taxation —611(6)—Evidence held to support finding that changes in assessments were made by board of assessors and not by tax receiver.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the court to find that the changes in the assessments had been made by the county board of tax assessors in accordance with instructions and directions from the state tax commissioner.

Error from Superior Court, Wilkes County; W. L. Hodges, Judge.

Suit by the Washington Exchange Bank and others against A. C. Barnett, Tax Collector, and others. Judgment denying an injunction, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The Washington Exchange Bank and some 33 citizens and taxpayers of Wilkes county filed their equitable petition against the tax collector, the sheriff, and the tax receiver of the county, seeking to enjoin the defendants from enforcing certain tax à la. It is alleged in the petition that within the time required by law petitioners legally and properly made returns of their property for taxation, in the year 1920; that for that year the board of tax assessors for the county were ordered by the state tax commissioner to increase the value of the assessment in Wilkes county 75 per cent. over the previous year's assessment, which the board of assessors and equalizers refused to do, but did increase the same 35 per cent. over the preceding year; that the board of assessors made report and wound up the business of the board in the year 1920 within the time required by law, their report showing an increase in the valuation of all the property in the county of 35 per cent., and gave notice by mailing same to petitioners; that petitioners were not given notice as provided by law of the increase in the assessment, and had no opportunity to be heard, so as to contest the raise in the valuation of their property, until after the assessment was made. In the petition an attack is made upon the constitutionality of sections 6, 13, and 14 of the act providing for a system of equalization of taxation in this state, approved August 14, 1913 (Acts 1913, p. 123).

At the interlocutory hearing the judge passed an order dissolving the restraining order theretofore granted, and refused the injunction.

I. T. Irvin, Jr., of Washington, Ga., for plaintiffs in error.

Clement E. Sutton, of Washington, Ga., and Alvin G. Golucke, of Crawfordville, for defendants in error.

GILBERT, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The court below did not err in refusing an injunction in this case. The questions of the constitutionality of those parts of the act here attacked have already been passed upon and discussed at length, rendering unnecessary a further discussion, inasmuch as we adhere to these decisions. In the case of Ogletree v. Woodward, 150 Ga. 691, 105 S. E. 243, not only is the decision rendered adversely to the contentions of the plaintiffs in error here, upon the constitutionality of the law, but the questions are there dealt with at length by Justice George; and that decision and the decisions upon which it is based uphold the constitutionality of the equalization act as against the attacks made in the instant case. The Ogletree Case deals with all the questions made as to the constitutionality of sections 13 and 14, and also points out that the decision in the case of Turner v. Wade, 254 U. S. 64, 41 Sup. Ct. 27, 65 L. Ed. 134, affects only that part of section 6 of the equalization act which contains the particular provision embodied in these words: "else the decision of said board shall stand affirmed and shall be binding in the premises." And it was also ruled in this connection, in the Ogletree Case, supra, that—

"The main purpose of the statute not being affected by the unconstitutionality of the particular provision, the whole act is not thereby defeated."

Upon a review of that case, made at the request of the plaintiffs in error, the court declines to reverse and set aside that decision.

[2] 2. The allegation in the petition, that notices of the changes made in the taxpayers' returns and of the increased assessments were not given as required by law, does not seem to be borne out by the evidence submitted at the hearing. At least, there is evidence in the record from which the judge could have found that the notices were duly served. An affidavit was submitted at the hearing, made by D. S. Standard, showing that he was a member of the board of tax equalizers for Wilkes county during the year 1920, and this affidavit contains the recital that—

"The board caused written notice to be served by the deputy sheriff of said county on all parties in said county whose cases are named, before the raise of their properties returned became finally fixed within the time required by law. That the only notices sent by mail were those to taxpayers living without said county and state, as required by the act."

[3] 3. It is alleged in the petition that the increase of 20 per cent. in the valuations of the properties for which the taxes were assessed was not made by the board of county tax assessors, although the state tax commissioner had already directed that such increase be made, but that the increase was made by the tax receiver himself. The judge was authorized to find to the contrary of this allegation. In the record we find the following affidavit made by P. N. Combs, tax receiver of the county:

"That on or about the — day of July, 1920, he was ordered by the state tax commissioner of Georgia to increase assessments of property of Wilkes county of each taxpayer thereof 20 per cent. over the assessments fixed by the board of county assessors for the year 1920. That the tax commissioner ordered the county tax assessors to make this increase, but that they refused to do so, and thereafter he was ordered to have said 20 per cent. of values added to each taxpayer's assessment in said county. That he objected to doing this, and sent an attorney to Atlanta to endeavor to get the state tax commissioner to rescind this order, but that the said state tax commissioner refused to do so."

But further on in the record we find another affidavit made by the same witness, as follows:

"That said P. N. Combs is tax receiver of Wilkes county, Ga., and acted as such during the year 1920. That he also served as clerk to the local board of tax equalizers of said county. That on or about the — day of —, 1920, after the book of the tax receiver was made up and mailed to the comptroller general, that about the date of July 30, 1920, he was instructed by the local board of tax equalizers of Wilkes county, Ga., acting under advice from Hon. H. J. Fullbright, state tax commissioner, and also by the said state tax commissioner directly, to add 20 per cent. increase to all the taxable property returned for taxation in Wilkes county for the year 1920, in order to equalize the taxes of said county with other sections of the state. That such instructions were immediately carried out, and all returns of taxpayers were raised 20 per cent. of the amount of the original return."

Construing the two together, as it is not absolutely necessary to hold that they are contradictory, it means that the affiant, clerk of the board, acting under the instructions of the board, made the changes complained of. And this was sufficient compliance with the law requiring the changes to be made by the board.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur, except BECK, P. J., disqualified.

WILLIAMS v. MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF WAYNESBORO. (No. 2625.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Licenses —29—City may increase occupation tax after tax first levied has been paid.

Where a city has full power to tax an occupation, it may increase the rate on the particular class of persons engaged therein at any time before the expiration of the period for the enforcement of the tax, after the tax first levied has been paid.

2. Licenses —7(9)—No power to impose prohibitive tax on legitimate business.

The mayor and council of a city have not, under legislative grant of authority to levy occupation taxes, the power to impose upon a useful and legitimate business a prohibitive tax.

3. Licenses —7(9)—Tax on ice dealers held unreasonable, prohibitive, and confiscatory.

The occupation tax of $300 on ice dealers in the city of Waynesboro, and $100 additional on each wagon employed in such business, is unreasonable, prohibitive, and confiscatory, under the facts in this case.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

4. Licenses —7(9)—Occupation tax presumed reasonable.

The presumption is always in favor of the reasonableness of an occupation tax imposed by a city, and the burden is on one attacking the tax to establish the fact that it is unreasonable and prohibitive.

Error from Superior Court, Burke County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Suit for injunction by J. P. A. Williams against the Mayor and Council of Waynesboro. An injunction was refused, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Williams filed his petition to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance of the city of Waynesboro, which imposed an occupation tax of $300 on dealers in ice and an additional tax of $100 for each wagon used in its delivery, on the ground that it was unreasonable and oppressive. This ordinance was passed on April 4, 1921. Prior to that time the occupation tax on ice dealers was $25. The plaintiff had been engaged in the business of selling ice in Waynesboro for a number of years prior to the enactment of this ordinance. The revenue year in that city runs from October 1st of one year to October 1st of the next year. Williams used three wagons in connection with his ice business, and under this ordinance would have to pay a tax of $600 per annum. For lack of money he was unable to pay this tax and would have to go out of business.

The members of the city council of Waynesboro at the date of the passage of this ordinance were A. J. Herrington, W. E. Taylor, F. Hamp Blount, Frank A. Blount, Gray Quinney, and Moses C. Cohen. Frank S. Palmer was mayor. A majority of these were members of the Waynesboro Ice Association.

A witness for the plaintiff testified that he heard Frank A. Blount, on April 8, 1921, say that the city council imposed this heavy license tax on ice dealers because Williams was selling ice at such a low price that the Waynesboro Ice Association could not compete, and that the tax was imposed to prohibit Williams from further dealing in ice. Another witness for the plaintiff testified that on the morning of April 9, 1921, a few days after Williams had been compelled to stop selling ice by reason of this tax, the Waynesboro Ice Association raised the price of ice from 70 to 80 cents per hundred, while Williams was retailing ice at 50 cents per hundred on the day previous. Edgar Barger, on behalf of the plaintiff, testified that for the past year and several years prior thereto he had been engaged in retailing ice in Waynesboro, but owing to this tax it was impossible for him to engage in the ice business. He could not carry on such business profitably when operated on the most economical basis. His yearly sales would not exceed 500 tons. In April, 1920, an ordinance was passed, imposing an occupation tax on such dealers of $25. During the years 1918 and 1919 the plaintiff sold, respectively, 2,100 tons and 2,600 tons. In 1920 his sales amounted to 1,700 tons, due to the fact that the Waynesboro Ice Association had begun the sale of ice in September of that year. This association sold approximately 300 tons during the remainder of that year. Edgar Barger sold about 500 tons. All dealers did not sell more than 2,700 tons. He sold ice at from $12 to $15 per ton, making a very small profit. The average consumption of ice in Waynesboro is 2,500 tons per annum. The Waynesboro Ice Association is selling one-half or more of the ice consumed in that city. The plaintiff's sales for the present revenue year will not exceed 1,200 tons, and will yield the gross sum of $12,000. The margin of profit is so small that he cannot afford to pay this occupation tax. The cost of 1,200 tons of ice and the sale and delivery to customers will amount to $10,000, leaving a profit of $2,000, with nothing deducted for depreciation.

the plaintiff paid the license tax on his ice business of $25 for the year ending October 1, 1920. No change in this tax was made for the year beginning October 1, 1920, until April 4, 1921, when the tax of $300, and $100 on each additional wagon was imposed. On April 9, 1921, the plaintiff tendered to him as clerk $25 in payment of said license tax, which he refused. Under the ordinance of the city of Waynesboro an occupation tax is imposed on merchants of $5 on the first thousand dollars worth of business done or fraction, and $1 on each additional thousand. Blacksmiths pay $35, merchandise brokers $25, stockbrokers $10, boarding houses $10, bottling works $75, contractors $25 to $100, dealers in cotton seed or seed cotton $25, public drays $25, express companies $100, hotel keepers $50, insurance companies $10, dealers in green meats $25, candy factories $10, carriage and wagon factories $35, opera houses or music halls $50, delivery and sales stables $25, telephone and telegraph companies $25, storage warehouses $50, lumber yards $25, dealers in brick $25, cotton-oil mills $200, packing houses $50, milk sellers $10, and public gineries $50.

J. E. Munday, manager, and John B. McNatt, bookkeeper, of the Southern Cotton Oil Company, testified that the annual business of such companies in Waynesboro amounts to $75,000 per annum. C. L. Rowland, manager of the Burke County Oil & Fertilizer Company, testified that his company did an annual business of $50,000 in Waynesboro. The occupation tax on ice dealers in the city of Augusta was $150 per annum and on wagons $5 for each horse. The population of Augusta was between 50,000 and 60,000, and that of Waynesboro between 3,000 and 4,000.

In its answer the defendant alleges that the plaintiff for a number of years was the sole ice dealer in Waynesboro, doing a business of $40,000, and making net profits of $10,000 per year, without payment of any license tax. He charged extortionate prices, and refused to give correct weights. The citizens of Waynesboro complained to the mayor and council for relief. On the first Monday in April, 1920, an ordinance was passed requiring all dealers to keep on hand accurate scales, and imposed a nominal license tax of $25 on its dealers.

Donald Blount, agent of the Central of Georgia Railway Company at Waynesboro, testified, for the defendant, that there was delivered to the plaintiff from January 3, 1920, to December 13, 1920, 111 cars of ice, that the freight on each car up to September 3, 1920, was about $15 per car of 30,000 pounds, and after September 3d $18.75 per car. The cars contained 30,000 pounds, except in a few instances.

Robert Barger, for the defendant, testified that E. Barger & Bro. sold ice in Waynesboro from April 1 to September 1, 1920, that during said period his firm sold an average of two cars of twelve tons each per week, or 480 tons. This ice cost from $6 to $8 per ton. Seven dollars would be an average price. The freight was $1.50 per ton.

Floyd Scruggs, on behalf of the defendant, testified that he was employed by the plaintiff as delivery man of ice during the years 1919 and 1920. He sold during the season of 1920 an average of about a ton and a half per day. He sold ice to drug stores and beef markets at 60 cents, to business houses and stores at 75 cents, and to residences at $1, per hundred. While these prices were supposed to be based on the weights of a hundred pounds, the ice weighed a great deal less; he being instructed to cut the ice so that it would sell at the weights at which the same was purchased. He was constantly met with complaints from the citizens of Waynesboro about the weights. He was paid $3 per day for his services during the ice season of 1920, and others were paid the same amount. The only other expenses were the cost of maintaining the delivery wagons and the cost of storage.

R. L. Oliver, city clerk, testified that in addition to the occupation tax the Southern Cotton Oil Company paid during 1920 an ad valorem tax of $379.80; the Burke County Oil Mill, in addition to the occupation tax, paid an ad valorem tax of $135; the Waynesboro Gin Company, an ad valorem tax of $105; and the Kitchens & Page Ginney, an ad valorem tax of $63. A business tax of $300 upon each agent engaged in delivering fertilizer from warehouses has since been imposed. The ordinance of which plaintiff complains was unanimously passed, and in his opinion was not unreasonable or discriminatory.

J. H. Whitehead, president of the Waynesboro Ice Association, testified that he and 36 other citizens of the city of Waynesboro, in the spring of 1920, formed said association; that they borrowed $25,000, and erected an ice plant in Waynesboro. Said organization was not formed for private gain, but solely for the benefit of the community. It is the purpose of said organization, as soon as its plant is paid for, to donate the same to the city of Waynesboro, without any gain or dividend to its members. This association and Williams are the only ice dealers within the limits of Waynesboro. The Waynesboro Ice Association has already paid this occupation tax. In his opinion this occupation tax is reasonable.

John G. Herrington deposed for the defendant that he is manager of the Waynesboro Ice Association, and that said association sold during 1920 400 tons of ice. The association is now selling approximately half of the total amount of ice sold in Waynesboro.

James H. Whitehead, president of the Waynesboro Ice Association, testified for the defendant that there had been no increase by this association in the price of ice after the passage of the ordinance of April 4, 1921.

In rebuttal, the plaintiff testified that he pays a property tax in the city of Waynesboro on his lot where his warehouse is located and on his residence. His profits on ice sales did not go above $2 per ton. The Waynesboro Ice Association did not go into the ice business until September of 1920. That company is now in the market, and he does not see how he could expect to sell more than 1,200 tons of ice during the year 1921.

When the purchaser weighed his own ice, the price was about $1 per hundred. He was selling this year at 50 cents per hundred pounds on the average. The other company was selling at 70 cents. He is now paying drivers $10 per week. He tried to sell ice so that the weights at which he bought in Augusta would hold out. The buyer would stand the loss. The ice he sold at $20 per ton to retailers, to wholesale consumers at $12 per ton, to drug stores at $15 per ton, cost him $6 per ton, later $7 per ton, beside freight. He cannot account for his making only $2 per ton profit when there is this difference between cost and selling price.

Frank A. Blount testified for the defendant that he denied that he made the statement about crushing out Williams' business, but admitted he did talk about it, and said if they wanted to take it that way they could do so. He admitted he said he would be willing to put the tax up to $1,000 on account of the way the plaintiff had been charging people for ice when he had no opposition.

F. S. Palmer, for the defendant, testified that he is the mayor of Waynesboro; he never made the statement that this tax was put on to crush out Williams, but admitted he wrote to persons outside of Waynesboro to know if he would be permitted to levy a tax of $2,000 or $2,500. He felt that they were obliged to take some kind of a defensive step. He denies that there was any increase in the price of ice made by the new company on April 9, after they stopped Williams from selling his ice.

The judge below refused to grant the temporary restraining order, and this is the error assigned.

E. M. Price, of Waynesboro, and Wm. H. Fleming, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error.

E. V. Heath, of Waynesboro, and H. J. Fullbright, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HINES J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It is insisted by the plaintiff that the mayor and city council of Waynesboro is without power to increase a business tax, where, at the beginning of the license year, there is an ordinance in existence fixing the amount of such tax; and that such increase of a business tax by a new ordinance, passed after the beginning of the revenue or license year of the municipality, would in effect be a revocation of the license granted to carry on the particular business for which it was granted. Counsel for plaintiff relies on the case of Peginis v. Atlanta, 132 Ga. 302, 63 S. E. 857, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 718. In that case this court drew a distinction between the collection of a business tax on occupations which are per se useful and lawful, although the method of imposing such tax is called a license, and the granting of a license, strictly so called, granted under the police power for the regulation and control of certain pursuits. The court said:

"In the former class the tax or charge is imposed for the purpose of collecting revenue; and although the mode of doing so is frequently called licensing, the real purpose is to enforce the collection of the municipal revenue. As to such occupations the municipal authorities are not vested with a discretion to grant or refuse licenses or to revoke such licenses at the will of the grantor."

This case is authority for the proposition that a municipal corporation cannot revoke a license to conduct a lawful and useful business, where the method of licensing is for the purpose of collecting an occupation tax on such business; but it does not decide that a municipality, having full power of levying occupation taxes, cannot change an ordinance in existence at the time its license year begins by passing a new ordinance increasing such occupation tax, where the increased tax is not unreasonable, arbitrary, prohibitive, or confiscatory, especially when such tax had not been paid under the prior ordinance before the passage of the new one. This court has held that—

"The municipal authorities could change an ordinance imposing a special tax upon a particular class of dealers by increasing the rate, after the tax first levied had been paid, but before the expiration of the time for returning and paying the same; and such a change, made between the date of the payment and the time when its collection could have been enforced, was not unlawful." Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Crawford, 75 Ga. 35.

The principle ruled in that case may be justified upon the ground that a municipality, having full power to levy business taxes, can at any time increase the tax on a particular class of dealers, provided such increase is not arbitrary, prohibitive, confiscatory, or discriminatory, whenever the exigencies of the municipal finances require the increase.

The case of the plaintiff is not so strong as that of the Crawford Case, just cited, because he did not pay the license tax for the license year beginning October 1, 1920, before the passage of the ordinance of April 4, 1921. Upon the authority of the Crawford Case we do not think that the levy of a larger occupation tax by the ordinance of April 4, 1921, than that fixed by the ordinance in force at beginning of the license year, is unlawful.

[2, 3] 2. It is now indisputably established by the decisions of this court that an occupation tax must be reasonable in amount and must not be discriminatory, confiscatory or prohibitive. Morton v. Macon, 111 Ga. 162, 36 S. E. 627, 50 L. R. A. 485; Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Cooper, 131 Ga. 670, 63 S. E. 138; Southern Express Co. v. Ty Ty, 141 Ga. 421, 81 S. E. 114; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Fitzgerald, 149 Ga. 330, 100 S. E. 104.

[4] The presumption is always in favor of the reasonableness of the tax, and the burden is upon the plaintiff to establish the fact that it is unreasonable or prohibitive. Is it shown under the facts of this case that the occupation tax, imposed upon the plaintiff, by this ordinance, is unreasonable, prohibitive, or confiscatory? The undisputed evidence shows that the tax has driven out of the ice business one of the three ice dealers in the city of Waynesboro, and prohibits the plaintiff, one of these three ice dealers, from continuing this business in the city. This leaves the Waynesboro Ice Association as the sole ice dealer in Waynesboro, and gives to this association a monopoly of the ice business in that city. The effect of this tax has been prohibitive as to all dealers in ice except this association.

The plaintiff asserts that his net earnings amounted to only $2,000 per annum, and this ordinance imposes a tax of 30 per cent. on that amount. The city contends that the plaintiff had been making a net income of $10,000 per annum. Even according to the contention of the city, he was making this amount of net income before the Waynesboro Ice Association began to make and sell ice in Waynesboro. Since the plaintiff has been compelled to meet this new competition, he has been able to do only about half as much business as he had been doing prior to the levying of this tax. It is shown that there are consumed in Waynesboro annually 25,000 to 27,000 tons of ice. The inference may be fairly drawn from the evidence that the plaintiff will hereafter sell not more than one-half of this amount of ice consumed in that city. In that event he will pay 12 per cent. upon his net income as an occupation tax. But assuming that the plaintiff could earn $10,000 per annum, this occupation tax amounts to 8 per cent. of that amount. This court has held that an occupation tax of $500 upon "money lenders, copartners, associations, corporations, or individuals, lending money on household or kitchen furniture and wearing apparel," is unreasonable (Morton v. Macon, 111 Ga. 162, 36 S. E. 627, 50 L. R. A. 485); and that a tax of $400 upon an agent selling fresh meats, his salary being but $1,800, was excessive and unreasonable (Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Cooper, 131 Ga. 670, 63 S. E. 138).

In this case the tax has been proved prohibitive in its results by driving out all dealers but one, and in creating a monopoly in the ice business in the city of Waynesboro. This alone would not make such tax unlawful, but can be considered in determining, under the whole situation, whether such tax is unreasonable.

So we reach the conclusion that this occupation tax is unreasonable, and that the court below should have granted an injunction restraining its enforcement.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur.

(152 Ga. 677)

CARAKER v. BROWN. (No. 2510.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Executors and administrators §130(2)—Administrator held not entitled to recover land not shown to be needed for payment of debts or for distribution.

There being no evidence that the administrator had ever been in possession of the premises sued for, or that any order for the sale thereof had ever been granted to him by the court of ordinary, or that there was any necessity for the administrator to recover them in order to pay the debts of his intestate, or any circumstances tending to show the necessity for their recovery in order for the administrator to distribute the same, a verdict for the defendant was demanded; and the court erred in not granting a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. Adams v. Phillips, 132 Ga. 455, 64 S. E. 467; Winn v. Simmons, 141 Ga. 680, 81 S. E. 1106.

2. Wills §800—Administrator of wife given nothing to which she was not otherwise entitled held not estopped to claim land by wife's acceptance of legacy; essentials of estoppel against legatee whose property is disposed of by will stated.

The fact that the intestate of the plaintiff owed no debts, and that all the legatees under the will of the husband of said intestate, including the latter, accepted and took possession of the legacies given them under said will, would not estop her administrator from asserting title to be in her to land in which she was given a life estate, under said will. To constitute an estoppel the testator must have affected to give property not his own, which was true in this case; but he must also have given a benefit to the person to whom that property belongs, which is not true in this case, as the wife did not get any benefit under the will to which she was not entitled independently of the will, and such legatee must elect to take under the instrument. Civ. Code 1910, § 4610; Johnson v. Hayes, 139 Ga. 218, 221, 77 S. E. 73.

3. Trial §240, 253(3)—Instruction on title by prescription held properly refused as argumentative; instruction erroneous as not enumerating essential elements of prescriptive title.

The court did not err in refusing a request to charge which was couched in argumentative language. McGee v. Young, 132 Ga. 606, 64 S. E. 689. The written request set out in the second ground of the defendant's amendment to his motion for new trial has this infirmity. Besides, this request was faulty in not enumerating all the elements necessary to give a prescriptive title.

4. Adverse possession §43(6)—Possession of executor, legatee, and legatee's grantee may be tacked.

The possession of property by the vendee of a legatee, by the legatee, and by the executor of the will under which the legatee was given such property may be tacked to make out the full period of the prescriptive term.

5. Adverse possession §116(1) — Husband and wife §16—Instruction as to title by possession for 20 years properly refused when not pertinent to evidence; prescription does not run as between husband and wife jointly occupying premises as a home.

The court did not err in refusing a written request to charge, based upon the theory that the defendant had acquired a prescriptive title by 20 years' possession, because there was no view of the evidence under which said charge was pertinent. Where a husband and wife jointly occupy premises as a home, prescription will not run in favor of one against the other. Carpenter v. Booker, 131 Ga. 546, 62 S. E. 983, 127 Am. St. Rep. 241.

6. Husband and wife §16—No presumption of husband's possession of property jointly occupied but owned by wife.

The court did not err in refusing to charge the jury, when requested so to do by the defendant, that, when husband and wife occupy property jointly, the presumption of law is that such possession is that of the husband, and that the burden was on the plaintiff to rebut this presumption; the undisputed evidence showing title in the wife to such property during their joint occupancy of the premises in dispute.

7. Deeds §119—Whether land involved was embraced held properly submitted to jury.

The court did not err in submitting to the jury the question whether the premises in dispute were embraced in the deeds under which the plaintiff claimed, as the court could not as matter of law determine this question from the description embraced in these muniments of title.

8. Estoppel §71—One permitting another to sell land and executing formal disclaimer held estopped to claim title.

Where the owner of land permits another to sell it to a third person, and at the same time executes a formal disclaimer of title thereto, which disclaimer is attached to the deed under which said land is so sold, and on the strength of which disclaimer the vendee buys and accepts title, the maker of said disclaimer, and his heirs would be estopped from afterward asserting title to the property so conveyed.

9. Deeds §25—Disclaimer of title under seal attached to another's conveyance held a sufficient muniment of title.

The court did not err in charging the jury that the muniments of title under which the plaintiff claimed were sufficient to convey the title to the premises in dispute from the common grantor to the intestate of plaintiff.

10. Appeal and error §302(3)—Grounds of motion complaining of admission of documents insufficient when they are not copied or contents stated.

The twelfth, fourteenth, and fifteenth grounds complain of the admission of certain deeds and a mortgage. These grounds do not contain copies of these instruments, nor state their contents substantially. For this reason these grounds cannot be considered. Calaway v. Beachamp, 140 Ga. 207, 78 S. E. 846.

11. Evidence §175, 273(3)—Homestead §51—Original homestead papers the best evidence, and record inadmissible until loss of original shown; homestead void when not approved at time fixed; homestead papers inadmissible to prove person's title when evidence of adverse possession unnecessary.

The court did not err in excluding the record of the homestead of Hamilton Brown, Sr.: (a) Because the original homestead papers, and not the record thereof, were the highest and best evidence, the loss of the originals not being shown. Brown v. Driggers, 62 Ga. 354; Larey v. Baker, 85 Ga. 687, 11 S. E. 800. (b) Because the homestead was void, not having been approved at the time fixed for the hearing of the application. West v. McWhorter, 141 Ga. 590, 598, 81 S. E. 859. (c) Because the homestead proceedings were irrelevant, declarations of one in possession of the property in favor of his own title being only admissible to prove his adverse possession (Civ. Code 1910, § 5767), and title being shown in Hamilton Brown, Sr., at the date of the homestead, thus rendering evidence of adverse possession unnecessary and irrelevant to establish his title.

12. Deeds §38(1)—Property may be conveyed by descriptive name, which will prevail over uncertain and imperfect description.

When property has a descriptive name, it may be conveyed by that name; and such description will prevail over one which is intended to be further description, but which is uncertain and imperfect. Bunger v. Grimm, 142 Ga. 448, 83 S. E. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 178.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

13. Adverse possession §83(4)—Grantor's possession may be adverse to grantee in case of explicit disclaimer.

Though possession never surrendered by a grantor is held under the grantee, and not adverse to his title, an explicit disclaimer by the grantor of such relation and a notorious assertion of right in himself will render it adverse.

14. Adverse possession §10—Executor holds in his own right within rule as to character of holding.

Within Civ. Code 1910, § 4164, providing that possession, to be the foundation of prescription, must be in the right of the possessor, and not of another, the possession of the executor is in his own right as such until he assents to a devise under section 3895.

15. Adverse possession §83(4)—Grantor's devise of land held explicit disclaimer of grantee's title rendering possession adverse.

A grantor's will devising the granted lands to a third person was an explicit disclaimer of the grantee's title, rendering his executor's possession adverse to the grantee.

Error from Superior Court, Baldwin County; J. B. Park, Judge.

Action by Joe Brown, administrator, against C. T. Caraker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This was an action of ejectment in the fictitious form commenced on December 20, 1913. The demise was laid in the name of Joe Brown as administrator of Katherine Brown. The suit was brought to recover "that tract of land situated and lying in the city of Milledgeville, Baldwin county, Ga., known in the plan of the city as part of lot No. 3, square No. 24, bounded on the east by lands of Bell Brown; north by Washington street; south by lands formerly owned by Hamp Brown estate; west by Elbert street." The defendant filed his plea of not guilty, and set up title by prescription by possession for 20 years, and by possession for 7 years under color of title. The defendant amended his answer by setting up valuable improvements made upon the premises, under a bona fide claim of title, of the value of $1,024.53, and prayed that the value of such improvements be adjudged a lien upon the land if the plaintiff should recover.

Both parties claimed under W. G. Lanterman. On March 28, 1871, Lanterman conveyed to Hamilton Brown certain lands, including the premises in dispute. On January 7, 1878, W. G. Lanterman conveyed by deed to Samuel Walker lands embracing the premises in dispute, which was duly recorded; and attached to said deed was the following instrument:

inafter described are not included in my homestead, and I lay no claim thereto, as I was due the purchase money to W. G. Lanterman for said city lots, and the mortgage given by me to said Lanterman on the Island was dated prior to the homestead act of 1868, said property known and described as follows: "The north half of lot No. three (3) in square 24, and the south half of lot No. three (3) in square twenty-four (24), and the south half of lot No. four (4) in square twenty-four (24), and the whole of lot No. one (1) in square twenty-four (24), containing one acre, and the three half lots containing half acre each, together with all the appurtenances thereto appertaining; also the John Haas and Dan'l Caraker Island, lying in the Oconee river, near Milledgeville, Ga., in said county, containing seven acres, more or less, one half undivided interest thereof for and during the natural life of Lizzie Willis, the other undivided half interest in fee simple."

"In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and affixed my seal this Jan'y. 7, 1878.

"Hamilton Brown. [L. S.]

"Attest:

"B. B. Adams.

"W. W. Williamson."

The plaintiff claimed by mesne conveyances from Samuel Walker into Katherine Brown. He introduced his letters of administration on Katherine Brown's estate, granted by the court of ordinary of Baldwin county on November 18, 1913.

Hamilton Brown and his family lived on these premises for many years prior to his death in February, 1902. His wife, Katherine Brown, died in possession of these premises, some seven months after the death of her husband. The plaintiff did not introduce any order of the court of ordinary authorizing him to sell this land, and he did not show that it was necessary for him to recover the same for the payment of debts or the distribution among the heirs of Katherine Brown. Hamilton Brown died testate, and his will dated June 7, 1901, was probated and admitted to record on February 5, 1902. The eighth item of his will was as follows:

"I give and bequeath to my son, Frank, the house and lot on which I now reside, after the death of his mother, everything to remain on said premises just as it now is, so long as his mother shall live, also all of the parcel of land outside of that belonging to Joseph, with all the improvements thereon, in same block as that of my residence lot, also the vacant quarter of an acre lot fronting the Covey lot, and adjoining lot given to William."

This item devised the property in dispute.

Frank Brown was named as executor of this will, and letters testamentary were issued to him on February 5, 1902. On November 17, 1909, Frank F. Brown conveyed to C. T. Caraker the premises in dispute. Caraker took immediate possession of the premises in dispute, under his deed from Frank Brown, and has had continuous and uninterrupted possession thereof since his purchase. Sometimes the house on these premises would be vacant, due to the fact that one tenant would move out and some time would elapse before another tenant would take possession; but Caraker controlled and claimed this property, his possession being open, public, and notorious.

Frank Brown, as executor of his father's will, took possession of the premises in dispute, and held the same as executor or individually, through tenants, continuously from the death of his testator down to the time he sold the same to Caraker.

The jury found for the plaintiff the premises in dispute; that the rental value of the land from December 20, 1909, was $850; that the present market value of the land, exclusive of improvements, was $800; that the defendant placed these improvements thereon in good faith; and that the present market value of such improvements was $1,500. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, in accordance with this verdict. The defendant moved for a new trial on the formal grounds, and on the following additional grounds:

(1) Because the court refused to charge the jury, when properly requested in writing by the defendant, "that if you believe from the evidence that Katherine Brown died owing no debts, and * * * that all the legatees under the will of Hamilton Brown accepted the legacies provided therein for them, and went into possession of the various legacies therein provided without protest or objection, I charge you that the plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Katherine Brown, would be estopped to assert that the title to the property sued for was in Katherine Brown."

(2) Because the court erred in refusing to charge the jury, when properly requested in writing, the following: "The defendant in this case contends that; even if it is true that Katherine Brown died in possession of the property sued for, claiming it as her own in good faith, and even if it is also true that she had occupied the property openly, notoriously, uninterruptedly, continuously, and adversely under a bona fide claim of right for seven years under color of title, giving her a good prescriptive title, nevertheless the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, because, as defendant contends, after the death of Katherine Brown in possession, he acquired a good prescriptive title under seven years' possession under color of title. He contends that immediately after the death of Hamilton Brown, Frank Brown, executor of his * * * will, * * * took possession of the property in controversy as legatee under the will of Hamilton Brown, and that this possession continued uninterruptedly for more than seven years thereafter, and that while in possession as such legatee * * * Brown sold the property in dispute * * * to Caraker, who continued in possession thereof about four years before the filing of this suit. The defendant contends that the possession of Frank Brown as legatee under the will of Hamilton Brown was open, notorious, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and under a bona fide claim of right, and that the possession of Caraker under deed from Frank Brown was also open, notorious, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and under a claim of right.

"I charge you that the will of Hamilton Brown was color of title; and if you believe that Frank Brown took possession of the premises in dispute as legatee, and said possession continued uninterruptedly and adversely for the period named, and that, under the deed from Frank Brown, C. T. Caraker held possession of a similar character from that date to the date of the filing of this suit, then the defendant would have a good title by prescription, and it would be your duty to find a verdict in his favor, although you might be satisfied that Katherine Brown at the date of her death had a good title to the property."

(3) Because the court erred in refusing a timely written request to give in charge to the jury the following: "If you believe from the evidence that Frank Brown, as executor of the estate of Hamilton Brown, went into possession of the property in controversy in 1902, immediately after the death of Hamilton Brown, Sr., and remained in possession thereof from that date to 1909, at which date he sold the property to C. T. Caraker, and if you believe that that possession as executor was open, notorious, peaceable, continuous, uninterrupted, adverse, and under a bona fide claim of right, as executor, and if you further believe that in 1909 he sold the property to C. T. Caraker, and that C. T. Caraker remained in possession of said property from that date to the filing of this suit, and if you further believe that the possession of Caraker was of the same character hereinbefore referred to, then I charge you that the defendant would have a good prescriptive title, and it would be your duty to find a verdict in his favor, although you should believe that Katherine Brown at the time of her death had a good prescriptive title thereto."

(4) Because the court erred in refusing a timely written request to give in charge to the jury the following: "I charge you that, if you believe from the evidence that the possession of Hamilton Brown and Frank Brown and C. T. Caraker was taken together for a period of 20 years or more, and that the possession of all three of said persons named was of the character hereinbefore set out, then the defendant would have a good title, and it would be your duty to return a verdict in his favor, notwithstanding the fact that Katherine Brown died in the physical possession of the property. * * *"

(5) Because the court erred in refusing a timely written request to give in charge to the jury the following: "I charge you that, where a husband and wife occupy property jointly, the presumption of law is that the possession is that of the husband, and that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff in this case to show that the possession was really the [wife's], and that she occupied the property under a bona fide claim of right in herself. * * *"

(6) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "I charge you this principle of law: It is claimed that Mr. Caraker did not buy this land until 1909. I charge you, if Frank Brown went into possession of the property in dispute, not as a legatee, but as the executor, and he remained in possession of it as executor, and not as legatee, and if he sold it to Mr. Caraker in the year 1909, in order for Mr. Caraker to have a good prescriptive title to the property, he and Frank Brown, under whom he claims, must have been in possession of the land as the owner, as I have already explained to you, for seven years previous to December 30, 1913; and if Frank Brown was in possession of it from 1902 up to a short time before he sold it to Mr. Caraker as executor, and not as legatee, then the possession he held it under as executor would not be counted as part of the seven years. He would have to be in possession of it, he and Mr. Caraker, for seven years, and Frank Brown's possession would have to be as legatee, and not as executor. * * *"

(7) Because the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "There have been certain deeds introduced in evidence; and I will call them out to the jury, that you may clearly understand them. All these deeds will be out before you, and when you go to your jury room it would be proper for the jury to take all these instructions I read to you; then it is for you to say whether or not the property in dispute is embraced in those deeds. If you reach the conclusion the property in dispute is not embraced in the description in those deeds, under those circumstances the court charges you that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. But, if you reach the conclusion the property in dispute is embraced in the description of those deeds that will be out before you, the court charges you the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, provided Mr. Caraker has not a prescriptive title to the land as explained to you by the court. * * *"

The defendant assigns this charge as error, because the property sued for is described as being bounded on the north by Washington street and on the west by Albert street, and the property embraced in said deeds does not touch either of said streets.

(8) In this ground it is complained that the court erred in his construction of the disclaimer of Hamilton Brown, attached to the deed of Lanterman to Walker, made in 1878. The court charged the jury that, if Brown signed this paper disclaiming title to the property therein described, and on the strength of that paper that property was sold by Lanterman to another, on the strength of his disclaimer, then Brown and his heirs would be bound by that paper, provided the premises in dispute are embraced in said disclaimer.

(9) In the charge complained of in this ground the court called the attention of the jury to the muniments of title under which the plaintiff claimed title to the premises in dispute, and instructed the jury that if, after reading the descriptions of the property embraced in those conveyances, they reached the conclusion that the property sued for was the same property embraced in those instruments, they were sufficient to convey the title from Lanterman to Katherine Brown. The court then instructed the jury that, when property having a descriptive name is conveyed by that name, such description will prevail over one which is intended to be a further description, and left the jury to determine whether the property sued for was embraced in those conveyances. The exception to this charge is that these conveyances show upon their face that the property embraced therein is different from that sued for. The further contention is that said charge is not abstractly true, but, if correct, is irrelevant, because the deeds referred to refer to the property as the Hamp Brown place, whereas the uncontradicted evidence shows that Hamp Brown owned the entire block, containing about four acres.

(10) In the charge complained of in this ground the court instructed the jury that, if they reached the conclusion that the property sued for is not embraced in the conveyances under which the plaintiff claims, they should find for the defendant, but, if they found that the land sued for is embraced in those conveyances, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, if the defendant does not show a prescriptive title.

(11) In this ground the court instructed the jury that, if Frank Brown went into possession of this property in 1902 as a legatee, and not as executor, and if his possession, coupled with the possession of Caraker in this case, was for a period of seven years or longer, previous to the filing of this suit, Caraker would have a good prescriptive title to the property, although it may have belonged to Katherine Brown at the time of her death. The defendant says this charge is erroneous because under the uncontradicted evidence Frank Brown went into possession of this property in the year 1902 as legatee, and not as executor.

(12) This ground complains of the admission in evidence of a deed from W. A. Walker to Joseph E. Pottle, dated July 16, 1890, a deed from Joseph E. Pottle to W. A. Walker, dated July 17, 1890, and a deed from W. A. Walker to Katherine Brown, dated October 3, 1890. The objection to these deeds was that they described the property therein conveyed as "all that lot or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in the city of Milledgeville, said state and county, known in the plan of said city as part of lot No. three (3) in square No. twenty-four (24), formerly known as the Hamp Brown place, bounded as follows: By Hamp Brown and others on the north, east, and west, and on the south by Saml. Walker; said lot said to contain one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) acre, more or less"; that the descriptions in these deeds show that the property therein conveyed is different from that sued for; and that the court should have so instructed the jury.

(13) In this ground it is complained that the court erred in admitting in evidence the disclaimer signed by Hamilton Brown, Sr., made in 1878, hereinbefore fully set out.

(14) In this ground it is complained that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over the objection of counsel for the defendant that the same were irrelevant, "the deed from W. G. Lanterman to Jerry Cooper; deed from C. W. Ennis, sheriff, to Samuel Walker; deed from Samuel Walker to C. H. Wright & Son; deed from C. H. Wright & Son to Matthew Brown; and mortgage from Matthew Brown to W. A. Walker, with power of sale."

(15) In this ground the defendant complains that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over his objection, "a mortgage from Matthew Brown to W. A. Walker, containing a power of sale." The objection to its admission was that it did not convey or create a lien on the property sued for.

(16) Because the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence, when tendered by the defendant, "a homestead record of Baldwin county, on page 176 thereof, showing a homestead set aside to Hamilton Brown. Said homestead application was sworn to before the ordinary February 28, 1874, and was approved by the ordinary of said county on March 12, 1875, and the property surveyed and set apart to Hamilton Brown as a homestead for the benefit of his wife and minor children, including the whole of block No. 24 in the city of Milledgeville, and said block includes the property sued for." The defendant contends that this homestead was relevant because it showed that, during the life of Katherine Brown, Hamilton Brown claimed the property as his own, and that Katherine Brown recognized the property as that of Hamilton Brown, occupied it as beneficiary under the homestead, and that she made no claim or title to any part thereof.

The court overruled the defendant's motion for new trial; and this is the error complained of.

Allen & Pottle, of Milledgeville, for plaintiff in error.

Sibley & Sibley, of Milledgeville, for defendant in error.

HINES, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3, 5-7, 10-12] 1. None of the headnotes require elaboration, except the fourth, eighth, and ninth grounds.

[8] 2. The court construed the disclaimer of title by Hamilton Brown, Sr., to apply to lands embracing the premises in dispute. The court instructed the jury that under this disclaimer Brown and those claiming under him would be estoppel to assert title against one who acquired title to these premises on the strength of his disclaimer. In this disclaimer Brown, who had undertaken to take out a homestead in lands embracing the premises in dispute, alleged that he was due W. G. Lanterman the purchase money of these lands, and had given a mortgage on a certain island prior to the homestead act of 1868 (Laws 1868, p. 27) to secure the payment thereof. In view of these facts he declared he laid no claim to this property. This disclaimer was under seal and attested by two witnesses, and was attached to the deed by which Lanterman conveyed this property, for a valuable consideration, to Samuel Walker. Evidently Brown knew that he could not hold the lands embraced in his homestead against the claim of Lanterman for the purchase money thereof; and for this reason made this solemn disclaimer of title thereto.

One who silently stands by and permits another to purchase his property without disclosing his title is estopped from subsequently setting up such title against the purchaser. Civil Code, § 4419. His heirs would likewise be estopped. If a person and his heirs can be estopped from asserting title to land under the above circumstances, he and his heirs would certainly be estopped from asserting title thereto when he solemnly enters into a written disclaimer of title upon the strength of which a purchaser buys. This disclaimer of title is tantamount to Brown's joining in the deed from Lanterman to Walker. So the court did not err in charging the jury that Brown and his heirs were estopped from asserting title to these lands, after such solemn disclaimer, against one who purchased for value from Lanterman.

[9] 3. The court charged the jury that the muniments of title under which the plaintiff claimed were sufficient to convey the title to the premises in dispute from the common grantor to the plaintiff's intestate; and this charge is complained of. Both the plaintiff and the defendant claimed under W. G. Lanterman. The plaintiff claimed under mesne conveyances from W. G. Lanterman into Katherine Brown. The first deed under which the plaintiff claimed, being one from W. G. Lanterman to Samuel Walker, was made subsequently to a deed from Lanterman to Hamilton Brown, Sr. Whether this charge was correct or not depends upon the force and effect of the disclaimer made by Hamilton Brown, Sr., hereinbefore referred to. In essence and effect, this disclaimer, made under seal, and attached to the deed from Lanterman to Walker, has the same force and effect as if Brown had joined in the deed from Lanterman to Walker. In this disclaimer Brown admitted that he had purchased the premises in dispute from Lanterman, and had not paid him the purchase money thereof. Although Brown had undertaken to have these premises set aside, with other lands, as a homestead, the homestead would not be good against Lanterman's claim for the purchase money thereof. Realizing this, Brown disclaimed title thereto for the evident purpose of enabling Lanterman to convey the land directly to Walker; and this amounts to Brown's so joining in this conveyance as to pass to the vendee of Lanterman the title to the premises in dispute. It may be said that this disclaimer amounted to an estoppel only, and did not convey title. Thornton v. Ferguson, 133 Ga. 825, 67 S. E. 97, 134 Am. St. Rep. 226; Coursey v. Coursey, 141 Ga. 65, 68, 80 S. E. 462. No prescribed form is essential to the validity of a deed to lands. If sufficient in itself to make known the transaction between the parties, no want of form will invalidate it. Civ. Code, § 4182. Very informal instruments have been held sufficient to pass title. Horton v. Murden, 117 Ga. 72, 43 S. E. 786, and cases cited.

When Brown executed this disclaimer, and it was attached to the deed from Lanterman to Walker, it was, in effect, the same as if Brown had joined in this conveyance, and was effectual to convey Brown's title to the premises in dispute to Walker under whom Katherine Brown claimed. So we submit that the court did not err in this charge.

[4] 4. The court was requested to charge the jury that the possession of the premises in dispute by the executor of Brown could be tacked to the subsequent possession of Frank Brown, to whom the premises in dispute were devised under the will of Brown, and to the possession of the vendee of Frank Brown, in order to make out the necessary period of prescription. This the court declined to do, but, on the contrary, charged the jury that they could not consider the possession of the executor in determining whether the vendee of Frank Brown had acquired a title by prescription to the premises in dispute. This is the vital point in this case. It is earnestly insisted by the counsel for the defendant in error that the court's ruling in this matter is correct. The argument is that the vendor, after making an absolute deed to lands, cannot prescribe against his vendee. Counsel for the plaintiff then asserts that the possession of the executor is that of his testator, and then draws the conclusion that, as the vendor could not prescribe against the vendee, the executor of the former cannot prescribe against such vendee. This would be sound logic, and unanswerable, but for the view which will now be stated.

[13] This court has held that possession, remaining with the grantor and never surrendered, is held under the grantee, and is not adverse to his title. Jay v. Wheelchel, 78 Ga. 786, 3 S. E. 906. But an explicit disclaimer by the vendor of such relation and a notorious assertion of right in himself will be sufficient to change the character of his possession and render it adverse to the grantee. 2 C. J. 143, § 246. There is nothing in the relation of vendor and vendee by deed executed which will prevent the vendor who may remain in possession from claiming adversely to the vendee.

"To say," says the Supreme Court of Vermont, "that the grantor, remaining in possession after his deed, is incapable of committing a disseisin upon his grantee, involves an absurdity too gross almost for argument. He is a mere tenant by sufferance, whom the grantee may elect to treat as a tenant, or as a disseisor. He may bring ejectment, or treat him as an occupier under himself. But if the grantor set up a claim of title in himself, and this be made known to the grantee, the grantor, from that time, becomes a disseisor in fact—the grantee can no longer treat him as a tenant." Stevens v. Whitcomb, 16 Vt. 121.

The grantor by warranty deed may acquire title against his grantee by adverse possession, and the rule estopping the grantor from setting up after-acquired title does not apply. Chatham v. Lunsford, 149 N. C. 363, 63 S. E. 81, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 129; Abbott v. Page, 92 Ala. 571, 9 South. 332; Doollittle v. Robertson, 109 Ala. 412, 19 South. 851; Garabaldi v. Shattuck, 70 Cal. 511, 11 Pac. 778; Knight v. Knight, 178 Ill. 553, 58 N. E. 306;

McClenahan v. Stevenson, 118 Iowa, 106, 91 N. W. 925; Bishop v. Van Winkle (Ky.) 117 S. W. 345; Zebriiska's Succession, 119 La. 1076, 44 South. 893; Traip v. Traip, 57 Me. 268; Hines v. Robinson, 57 Me. 324, 99 Am. Dec. 772; Stearns v. Hendersass, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 497, 57 Am. Dec. 65; Kelly v. Palmer, 91 Minn. 133, 97 N. W. 578; Sherman v. Kane, 86 N. Y. 57; Milnes v. Van Gilder, 197 Pa. 347, 47 Atl. 197, 80 Am. St. Rep. 828.

[14] If the grantor can hold adversely to his grantee and acquire title by prescription against his grantee, why cannot the executor of the grantor likewise hold adversely to the grantee of his testator and acquire title by prescription, not for himself, but for those whom he represents? The executor represents the devisees and legatees under the will. Fulghum v. Carruthers, 87 Ga. 484, 13 S. E. 597. It is said by counsel for the plaintiff that the possession of the executor is not in his own right, but in that of his testator, and that for this reason prescription cannot be based on his possession. This contention rests upon the principle that—

"Possession to be the foundation of a prescription must be in the right of the possessor, and not of another." Civil Code, § 4164.

This means that possession must be hostile, and that the possessor cannot prescribe against the persons for whom he holds possession. This contention is not sound. The possession of the executor is in his own right as such. He holds the title to the property devised until he assents to the bequests and turns over the land devised to the devisee. So there seems to be no good reason why his possession cannot form a link in the chain of possession from which a prescriptive title will ripen.

If property is conveyed to an active trustee, who holds possession of real estate for the use of the beneficiaries in the trust, his possession would be such as would enable the beneficiaries to tack their possession to his, in order to make out a prescriptive title. The possession of a receiver may be tacked to that of the debtor, and to that of the purchaser of the premises at a sale made under a decree in the case, to make out the full period of the prescriptive term. Verdery v. Savannah, etc., Ry. Co., 82 Ga. 675, 9 S. E. 1133. Here the receiver does not hold possession in his own right, but holds it as an officer of the court, for the benefit of those to whom the property, or its proceeds, may be awarded by the final judgment in the case.

If his possession is such as will support a prescription in favor of the owner of the property placed in his hands, why should not the possession of an executor be such as would support a prescription in favor of the devisees under the will of his testator?

Such privity exists between the testator and the devisee as will authorize the tacking of the two possessions to make out the period necessary to acquire title by prescription.

Where the administrator has the legal right by statute to take possession and control of real estate, his possession is in privity with that of the intestate, and upon his possession prescription can be based. Cannon v. Prude, 181 Ala. 629, 62 South. 24; Ricker v. Butler, 45 Minn. 545, 48 N. W. 407; Fugate v. Pierce, 49 Mo. 441; Rowland v. Williams, 23 Or. 515, 32 Pac. 402.

If prescription can be based upon the possession of an administrator, to which the subsequent possession of a grantee from him can be tacked in order to make out the prescriptive period, there is no reason why the possession of an executor will not support prescription. The case of the executor is stronger than that of the administrator. Upon the death of an intestate his lands descend at once to his heirs, subject to be administered; but in the case of a will the property devised or bequeathed does not pass immediately to the devisees or legatee, but the title thereto vests in the executor until he assents to the legacy. No devise or legacy passes the title until the assent of the executor is given to such devise or legacy. Civil Code, § 3895.

[15] In this case Hamilton Brown, Sr., by his will, disposed of the premises in dispute by devising them to his son, Frank Brown. Here was an explicit disclaimer of the title of his vendee and those claiming under such vendee. His will was probated and recorded. His executor immediately took possession of these premises under this will, and openly and notoriously held possession thereof as such executor and devisee for a period of seven years, and then sold to Caraker, who held possession for something over four years under his deed from the devisee of these premises.

We hold that the possession of the executor can be tacked to that of the vendee of the devisee to make out the necessary period of prescription.

Judgment reversed.

Sales \S 377—Petition on assigned contract for purchase by defendant of accumulations of mills insufficient without showing accumulations would be within the contract if it had not been assigned.

The petition did not set out a cause of action, and the court erred in overruling the general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the Gatti-Goodyear Company against Edward Rose Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Little, Powell, Smith & Goldstein, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Rosser, Slaton, Phillips & Hopkins, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. The Gatti-Goodyear Company, a corporation, brought suit against Edward Rose Company, a corporation, on the following contract:

"Greenville, S. C., Dec. 31, 1919.

"We confirm having sold you the following: Quantity: About 30,000 pounds monthly Dirty Dust House Fly, quantity estimated but not guaranteed, but to include all that we will accumulate during 1920. Price: 15¢ cents per pound. F. o. b. shipping point of the Mills or Greenville, S. C. Terms: Net cash thirty days. Shipment: Monthly as accumulated. Remarks: The quality of this stock is to be just as produced by the mills.

"[Signed] The Chester Goodyear Co.,

"Per G. M. Goodyear, Treas.

"Accepted:

"Edward Rose Co.

"C. H. McMillan."

The petition alleges that on November 29, 1920, this contract was assigned by Chester M. Goodyear Company to Joseph Gatti, and that on December 7, 1920, Joseph Gatti assigned it to Gatti-Goodyear Company, the plaintiff in this case. The petition shows that on December 6, 1920, the plaintiff shipped to the defendant 22,129 pounds of the commodity contracted for, and that this shipment was refused by the defendant, and that the contract price thereof was $359.59, for which sum plaintiff sues. The petition further alleges that in December, 1920, plaintiff had on hand 14,950 pounds of the same commodity which it sought to ship and deliver to the defendant, but which the defendant refused to allow the plaintiff to ship, and that this refusal was a breach of the contract and damaged the plaintiff in an amount equal to the difference between the contract price of the goods and the market price, to wit, $205.56, for which additional amount suit is brought. The petition alleged that the accumulations sued for were from the same mills as previously accumulated from, and none other, by Chester M. Goodyear Company, and that the accumulations were from the mills being accumulated from at the time the contract was made and subsequently; and that Chester M. Goodyear Company was accumulating from various mills at the time the contract between it and the defendant was made. The petition, however, does not allege that the goods sued for were not greater in quantity than they would have been if they had been accumulated by the Chester M. Goodyear Company, although the accumulation sued for was from the same mills as previously accumulated from by the Chester M. Goodyear Company. It does not appear from the petition that Chester M. Goodyear took over "all" the accumulations from those mills, or that the plaintiff did not take over all of such accumulations. In other words, the petition does not show that the accumulations sued for would have been included in the accumulations of the Chester M. Goodyear Company for the year 1920, had the contract not been assigned to the plaintiff. Hence, even if the contract were assignable (which question is not here passed upon), the petition does not show that the goods sued for were accumulated in accordance with that contract. Under these circumstances, the defendant, not having consented (so far as the petition shows) to the assignment of the contract, and not having in any way ratified the assignment, was not legally bound to accept the shipment made, or the shipment tendered, by the plaintiff.

It follows that the petition did not set out a cause of action, and that the court erred in overruling the general demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

NORWOOD v. STATE. (No. 13111.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Feb. 16, 1922.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Homicide — 317—Instruction that pistol is gun not cause for new trial.

"An indictment for murder charged that the accused shot and killed the named decedent 'with a certain gun' which the accused then and there held. On the trial it appeared that the accused committed the homicide by shooting the decedent with a pistol. Held, that it was not cause for a new trial that the court told the jury that a pistol is a gun. State v. Barrington, 198 Mo. 23, 95 S. W. 235." Hill v. State, 147 Ga. 650(1), 95 S. E. 213. See Burney v. State, 22 Ga. App. 622(1), 97 S. E. 85, and cases cited in the opinion. The rulings in the above cases dispose of grounds 4 and 5 of the motion for a new trial. Counsel for the plaintiff in error request that we certify this case to the Supreme Court, in order that the above decisions may be "reviewed and overruled." We think this would be a useless consumption of time.

2. Homicide — 317—Failure to define felony in charge on self-defense not error.

"In charging section 70 of the Penal Code, failure to explain to the jury the meaning of the word 'felony,' used therein, is not cause for a new trial, in the absence of an appropriate and timely request so to do." Smith v. State, 23 Ga. App. 541(4), 99 S. E. 142 citing Pressley v. State, 132 Ga. 64(3), 65, 63 S. E. 784; Pickens v. State, 132 Ga. 46, 63 S. E. 783; Jordon v. State, 16 Ga. App. 393, 400, 85 S. E. 455. Under the rulings in the above cases there is no merit in special ground 6 of the motion for a new trial.

3. Homicide — 309(4)—Charge on manslaughter and mutual combat authorized when anything deducible tending to show manslaughter.

In Cain v. State, 7 Ga. App. 24, 65 S. E. 1069, this court said: "It is well settled by repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and this court that on a trial for murder, if there is anything deducible from the evidence or the defendant's statement that would tend to show manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury fully on the law of manslaughter. Crawford v. State, 12 Ga. 142(6); Jackson v. State, 76 Ga. 473; Wynne v. State, 56 Ga. 113; Bell v. State, 130 Ga. 865, 61 S. E. 996; Strickland v. State, 133 Ga. 76, 65 S. E. 148; Pyle v. State, 4 Ga. App. 811; 62 S. E. 540. In the Crawford Case, supra, the court strongly expresses itself on the subject, as follows: 'When a defendant is put upon trial for murder, and there is any doubt as to the grade of homicide of which he is guilty, it is the duty of the court clearly and distinctly to instruct the jury as to the law, defining the several grades of homicide as recognized by the Penal Code, and then leave it to the jury to find from the evidence of what particular grade he is guilty.' In Jackson v. State, supra, the court uses still stronger language, and holds that 'where there is evidence sufficient to raise a doubt, however slight, upon the point whether the case is murder or manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary, the court should instruct the jury upon these grades of manslaughter as well as murder.'" Under these rulings as applied to the facts of this case, the trial judge did not err in charging on voluntary manslaughter or upon a mutual intent to fight.

4. Failure to give charge not error.

Under all the facts of this case it was not error harmful to the accused for the judge to fail to give in charge to the jury section 73 of the Penal Code of 1910.

5. Criminal law — 942(1, 2)—Declarations of witness at variance with testimony not ground for new trial; evidence to impeach only witness on vital point not ground for new trial.

The following principles are thoroughly established in this state:

(a) "Declarations of a witness after trial, at variance with his sworn testimony, even when made under oath and explicitly asserting that his testimony on the trial was false, do not constitute a cause for a new trial. Laseter v. Simpson, 78 Ga. 61 (3 S. E. 243); Munro v. Moody, 78 Ga. 127 (2 S. E. 688); Jordon v. State, 124 Ga. 417(2) (52 S. E. 768); Hardy v. State, 117 Ga. 40 (43 S. E. 434); Clark v. State, 117 Ga. 254(8) (43 S. E. 853), and cases there cited. Hayes v. State, 16 Ga. App. 334, 335(2) (85 S. E. 253); Civil Code, § 5961." Smarr v. Kerlin, 21 Ga. App. 813(2), 95 S. E. 306.

(b) "Though the witness sought to be impeached by newly discovered evidence was the only witness against the prisoner upon a vital point in the case, if the sole effect of the evidence would be to impeach the witness a new trial will not be granted." Arwood v. State, 59 Ga. 391(1); Levin v. State, 18 Ga. 513(1); Wright v. State, 34 Ga. 110(2); Jackson v. State, 98 Ga. 190, 18 S. E. 401; Haynes v. State, 18 Ga. App. 741(3), 742, 743, 90 S. E. 485, and cases cited." Key v. State, 21 Ga. App. 795(1), 95 S. E. 269.

Under the above rulings there is no merit in the tenth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial.

6. Reason for rule denying new trial.

In connection with the immediately preceding paragraph, we call attention to the following words of Judge Starnes, who delivered the opinion of the court in Levin v. State, 13 Ga. 513: "If it be true that an innocent man has been convicted upon false testimony, and witnesses have since been discovered who can prove that testimony false, the victim is not without a remedy, potent to break his bonds, and free his character from stain. Such a case presented to the Executive will, without doubt, successfully appeal to the power with which the Constitution clothes that officer, and speedily invoke that pardoning clemency for the sufferer, which, whilst it carries with it a remedy for his wrongs, will insure justice to his character and memory. It is better that to this efficient tribunal we should commend such a case of individual hardship, than by granting a new trial, violate one of those general rules, so essential to the pure and certain administration of justice."

7. Sufficiency of evidence.

There is evidence sufficient to support the finding of the jury, and the judgment is affirmed.

CLARK v. STATE. (No. 13093.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §958(1)—Affidavit as to acquittal for related offense not considered on motion for new trial.

Plaintiff in error was convicted of manufacturing liquor, and made an extraordinary motion for a new trial.

Upon the hearing of this motion the movant offered an affidavit, a portion of which is as follows: "At a subsequent term of court, after defendant's conviction for manufacturing liquor, he was placed on trial for having liquor in his possession, and the same bottle of liquid used in the case for manufacturing was used against him in the case for possessing, and defendant was acquitted on the latter charge. I kept possession of the bottle and know the facts." The bill of exceptions alleges that "the court erred in disallowing the above portion of said affidavit, and says that same should have been allowed and considered." The court properly refused to consider this portion of the affidavit.

2. Criminal law §957(2)—Affidavit of jurors subsequently acquitting defendant on related charge not considered.

Movant also offered an affidavit as follows: "We were members of the jury which tried Charley Clark for having liquor in his possession, which trial was subsequent to the trial for manufacturing liquor, and the defendant was acquitted because the liquid introduced by the state did not appear to be liquor and was not shown to be intoxicating, and did not look like liquor, and the jury was convinced that the defendant's wife, who had taken up with and was living with another man, was trying to railroad the defendant to the chain gang to get him out of her way, and was responsible for the prosecution." It is alleged that the court erred in disallowing this affidavit, and should have received and considered it. In refusing to consider this affidavit the court did not err.

3. Criminal law §942(2) — Declarations of witness at variance with testimony not ground for new trial.

In the motion for a new trial it is alleged that Wallace Clark was the chief witness for the state, and that "since said trial at which movant was convicted, said Wallace Clark has made a written affidavit to the effect that his testimony on the trial which resulted in movant's conviction was false, and was given by the witness at the instance and by the direction of his mother, who was movant's wife, separated from him, and who was the real prosecutor of said case. Said Wallace Clark further testified in said affidavit that movant was not guilty, as charged, and that he had never seen movant manufacture or make intoxicating liquors of any kind, or around the still where same was manufactured, if there was such still and such manufacture." It is well settled in this state that the declarations of a witness after trial which are at variance with his sworn testimony, even when made under oath and explicitly asserting that his testimony on the trial was false, do not constitute a cause for new trial. Story v. State, 28 Ga. App. —, 110 S. E. 328, and citations; Norwood v. State, 28 Ga. App. —, 111 S. E. 59.

4. Criminal law §913(4)—Objection to sentence not ground for new trial.

"Objection that a sentence imposed in a criminal case is for any reason illegal or irregular cannot be made the ground of a motion for a new trial." Chapman v. State, 118 Ga. 58(1), 44 S. E. 814. See Sable v. State, 22 Ga. App. 768, 97 S. E. 271, and citations. Under the rulings in these cases we cannot consider that ground of the motion for a new trial which attacks the sentence as being "unlawful and without authority of law."

5. Extraordinary motion properly overruled.

The court did not err in overruling the extraordinary motion for a new trial.

MACK v. AMERICAN AGR. CHEMICAL CO.
(No. 12579.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
March 4, 1922.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Negligence \S 121(5)—Possible cause may be inferred on evidence eliminating all other causes.

Where there are several possible causes of an event and the evidence authorizes an elimination of all but one of such possible causes as having no causal connection therewith, it may be inferred, in the absence of any evidence, either direct or circumstantial, connecting the remaining possible cause as having a causal relation to the event, that the last remaining possible cause was the cause of the event.

2. Master and servant \S 265(3, 5)—Inference of negligence in insecurely tying chain justified.

It follows therefore that, where a suit for personal injuries is predicated upon the alleged negligence of the defendant in insecurely tying a chain which the defendant had wound around a post for the purpose of safely securing a pulley or some such similar attachment to the chain, the mere fact that the chain became unwound from the post will, in the absence of evidence that the chain became unwound from any cause other than its being insecurely tied, authorize the inference that the defendant insecurely tied the chain. Where there was evidence to the effect that the chain was, before it was used as above indicated, good and in no wise defective, and that the noise made by the chain when breaking loose from the attachment was not such a noise as would have been made by a breaking chain, or by the breaking loose of a hook affixed to the attachment hooking it to the chain, but was such a noise as could only have been made by the chain becoming unwound from the post, the inference is authorized that the chain did not become disengaged on account of its breaking, or that the hook broke loose from the attachment, but that the chain became unwound.

3. Inference authorized by evidence.

The evidence authorized the inference that the only possible cause of the chain becoming unwound from the post and thereby releasing the attachment and causing the latter to hit and injure the plaintiff was that the chain was insecurely tied, and that the insecure condition of the chain was most probably due to the negligence of the defendant.

4. Master and servant \S 189(2), 190(9)—Superintendent held a vice principal; vice principal's negligence in directing tying of chain held chargeable to employer.

"A person employed as a superintendent or foreman, having authority to supervise the master's business and to employ and discharge employees and direct them in their work, is the vice principal or alter ego of the master, and his negligence in the discharge of such duties may be imputed to the master." Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. Everett, 24 Ga. App. 788

(1), 102 S. E. 167. Where the master, through his alter ego or vice principal, undertakes to provide for the servant a suitable appliance to be used by him in the performance of a particular work, superintending and directing himself the manner of construction, and in consequence of his negligence the appliance is so imperfectly constructed that in its proper use the servant is injured, the master would be liable. Blackman v. Thomson-Houston Elec. Co., 102 Ga. 64, 70, 29 S. E. 120. The evidence in this case authorized the inference that the foreman directing the tying of the chain around the post was the alter ego or vice principal of the master, and that the chain under his direction was so negligently and imperfectly tied that in its proper use by the plaintiff he was injured by reason of such defect.

WRIGHT, Comptroller General, v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. (No. 13105.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1 March 8, 1922.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)Counties \S 190(2)—Tax levy for county purposes unauthorized to extent of excess over one-half of state tax levy.

This case arose by reason of an affidavit of illegality filed to the levy of a tax execution issued by the Comptroller General for the use of Henry County against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. The commissioner of roads and revenues of Henry county levied a tax of 15 mills or $15 on each thousand dollars of property for the year 1920. Of this levy of taxes, there was levied for general county purposes four mills, or $4 on the thousand, as follows: To pay sheriffs, jailers, or other county officers fees one-half mill, or 50 cents; to pay all fees that may be due the coroner for holding inquests, one-quarter mill, or 25 cents; to pay the expenses of the county bailiffs at court, nonresident witnesses in criminal cases, servant hire, stationery, and the like, one-half mill, or 50 cents; to pay jurors per diem compensation, 1 mill, or $1; and to pay all other lawful charges against the county, 1½ mills, or $1.75. The railway company, after paying all of the state tax, which was 5 mills, and the entire levy of 15 mills except 1½ mills, or $1.50 on the thousand, challenged by affidavit of illegality the legality of the execution, upon the ground that the said tax levy for general county purposes exceeded by 1½ mills, or $1.50 on the thousand, 50 per cent. of the state tax of 5 mills, or $5 on the thousand. By agreement the issue raised by the affidavit of illegality was submitted to the judge of the superior court, without the intervention of a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts in which the tax levy as pleaded in the affidavit of illegality was admitted. The judge determined the issue in favor of the railway company, and sustained the affidavit of illegality. To this judgment exception was taken upon the ground that it was contrary to law. Held, upon the agreed statement of facts, it was not error to sustain the affidavit of illegality. To the extent of 1½ mills, or $1.50 on the thousand, the tax levied exceeded the legal amount authorized by law to be levied for the general county purposes so levied and as pointed out in the affidavit of illegality. See Civil Code 1910, §§ 508-513; Sullivan v. Yow, 125 Ga. 326, 54 S. E. 173; and compare Sheffield v. Chancy, 138 Ga. 684, 75 S. E. 1112.

1. Executors and administrators — 138(1, 6)
—Offer to perform contract made before issuance of letters held ratification or acceptance of offer; letters held to confirm retroactively executor's power to make contract.

Where, after the death of a testator, and before the probate of the will, and before the issuance of any letters testamentary to the executor named in the will, who is vested with power to sell certain real estate belonging to the estate of the testator, the executor enters into a contract of sale with a purchaser, who has full knowledge of the above-recited facts, by which contract it is agreed that the executor is to sell and the purchaser is to buy such real estate, but where it is further agreed that the executor is not to execute and deliver a bond for title to the purchaser until a certain date in the future, which date is designated and agreed upon between the parties because it will occur after the executor shall have obtained letters testamentary, and where the purchaser goes into possession under such contract and immediately makes a payment on the purchase price, and upon the arrival of the designated date upon which it has been agreed that the executor is to execute a bond for title to the purchaser the executor has received his letters testamentary, and offers to perform his obligations under the contract and to execute to the purchaser a bond for title to the real estate, such offer by the executor to perform, even if the original agreement could be considered as void for lack of power in the executor at the time to execute it, in the absence of any offer to rescind by the purchaser, and especially in view of the purchaser's remaining in possession, amounts to a ratification by the executor of the original agreement, or to an acceptance by the executor of an outstanding offer to purchase by the purchaser. The right of the executor to make a sale and to execute the necessary papers was confirmed by the retroactive effect of the letters testamentary. Northington v. Farm- ers' Gin Co., 119 Ga. 851, 47 S. E. 200, 100 Am. St. Rep. 210; Hatch v. Proctor, 102 Mass. 351.

2. Vendor and purchaser §22—Description by street and number, etc., held sufficient.

A description of the land contained in the contract is sufficiently definite where the land is described as "all that tract or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Atlanta, Georgia, being house and lot known as No. 22 Alaska Ave., lot being 50x140 feet on the west side of Alaska Ave., located 250 feet north of Highland Ave." Horine v. Hicks, 25 Ga. App. 802, 104 S. E. 922.

3. Executors and administrators §138(1)—Purchaser's refusal to perform obligations of contract held a breach.

Where the executor offered to perform as above set out, a refusal by the purchaser to comply with his obligations under the contract amounted to a breach.

4. Petition held not subject to demurrer.

This being a suit by the executor against the purchaser, seeking to recover damages for such an alleged breach of the contract, the plaintiff's petition is good against the general and special demurrers interposed, and the trial judge erred in dismissing the petition on demurrer.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. March 7, 1922.)

False pretenses §4, 49(1)—Lack of authority to draw drafts as represented held essential to offense; evidence held not to show lack of authority.

Where an indictment for cheating and swindling alleges that the defendant drew drafts for a stated sum on a nonresident mercantile concern and induced a bank of this state to cash them, by falsely representing that he had express authority from such drawee to draw such drafts, and that they would be paid on presentation, etc., the lack of such authority from the drawee to make such drafts is an essential element of the alleged offense. Mere proof that the drawee did not pay the drafts when payment was demanded by a bank in the city of the drawee's residence will not suffice to establish the defendant's alleged lack of authority from the drawee to draw them. Where, in such a case, the cashier of the bank cashing the drafts testifies to all the alleged representations, adding that "those statements made by the defendant were false and fraudulent," but it clearly appears from his testimony as a whole that he had no connection with or knowledge of the business of the drawee or of its relation to or communications with the defendant, such testimony will not suffice to establish the defendant's alleged lack of authority from the drawee to draw the drafts. Nor will the two circumstances together sufficiently establish the allegation. There being in this case no other proof offered to establish this essential allegation of the indictment, the verdict of guilty was without evidence to support it, and it was error to deny the defendant's motion for a new trial.

Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1005(2)—Approved verdict not disturbed.

The several special assignments of error in this case are but amplifications of the general grounds, and are resolved into the single assignment of error that the evidence did not authorize the verdict. There is some evidence to authorize the verdict, which verdict has the approval of the trial judge. For no reason assigned did the court err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

DURDEN v. STATE. (No. 12122.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Feb. 14, 1922.)

1. Sufficiency of indictment.

Where an indictment is drawn in two counts, the first count charging the forgery of "a certain paper, acquittance, and receipt," which paper is therein set out in full, and the second count charging the accused with knowingly uttering a forgery, for that he did falsely and fraudulently utter and publish as true "the above-described false, fraudulent, forged, and altered paper, acquittance, and receipt," and the accused is convicted under the second count only, the failure to set out the alleged forged instrument in the second count is not ground for arrest of judgment.

2. Indictment and information \Leftrightarrow 117—Allegation as to "offense and offender being heretofore unknown" construed.

In a special presentment by a grand jury, the language "the offense and offender being heretofore unknown," properly construed, means that the offense and offender were unknown until the date of the indictment. It follows that a special presentment for a felony (forgery and uttering a forgery) which shows upon its face that the offense charged was committed more than four years before the indictment was returned, and which alleges "the offense and offender being heretofore unknown," but which fails to set out the date upon which the alleged offense became known, is not so defective that after verdict and judgment a motion to arrest the judgment should be sustained, on the ground that it affirmatively appears from the face of the indictment that the offense charged is barred by the statute of limitations.

3. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 885—Verdict recommending punishment as for misdemeanor and invoking extreme mercy not void.

The accused was convicted of a felony (uttering a forgery), and was given a misdemeanor sentence. The verdict was as follows: We, the jury, find the defendant guilty on the second count in the indictment, and recommend that he be punished as for a misdemeanor by a term of imprisonment of no less than four years and not over five years. We further invoke the extreme mercy of the court." Under these facts, it was not error for the court to overrule that ground of the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment which alleged that the verdict was a nullity and amounted to an acquittal of the defendant, and that it was so vague, indefinite, and unintelligible that no valid legal judgment could be based thereon.

4. Rulings of Supreme Court.

This court certified to the Supreme Court the several questions of law involved in this case, and the rulings of the Supreme Court thereon are substantially given above. See the full opinion of the Supreme Court rendered December 16, 1921 (152 Ga. —, 110 S. E. 283).

5. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 1050, 1092(4)—Overruling of demurrer held not reviewable when not preserved by exceptions pendente lite.

The assignment of error in the bill of exceptions upon the overruling of the demurrer to the indictment cannot be considered, as the exception to that judgment was not preserved by exceptions pendente lite, and the demurrer was overruled on May 28, 1920, and the bill of exceptions was not tendered to the judge until January, 1921.

6. Motion in arrest properly overruled.

Under the rulings set forth in the first, second, and third preceding notes, the court did not err in overruling the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment.

Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly denied when evidence sufficient.

This case is here upon the sole assignment of error that the verdict was unauthorized by the evidence. There is evidence to authorize the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO. v. REVILLE. (No. 12319.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 22, 1922.)

1. Corporations §509(6)—Entry of service on affidavit and bond may be amended to show service on corporation by serving its agent.

While it is true that the person named in the entry of service upon an affidavit and bond for garnishment as the person upon whom the summons of garnishment was served is presumably the person to whom the summons of garnishment was directed, yet where such entry shows that the summons was served upon an individual by name who is described in the entry of service as "agent in charge of the office of said county for" a certain named corporation, and who happens to be the proper person with whom to leave the summons of garnishment directed to the named corporation when perfecting service upon the corporation, the entry of service is amendable to show that service of the summons of garnishment was perfected upon the named corporation by serving such summons personally upon the named individual, describing him in such amended return as "agent in charge of the office for said county for" the named corporation, thereby showing presumably that the summons of garnishment was directed to the named corporation and not to the individual. See in this connection, Southern Express Co. v. National Bank of Tifton, 4 Ga. App. 309, 61 S. E. 857; Burnett v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 117 Ga. 521, 43 S. E. 854, 97 Am. St. Rep. 175; Jones v. Bibb Brick Co., 120 Ga. 321, 48 S. E. 25; Phillips v. Bond, 182 Ga. 413, 421, 422, 64 S. E. 456.

2. Garnishment §97—Amendment to return of service properly permitted on motion to set aside judgment in absence of traverse.

Where a judgment by default has been rendered against a named corporation as garnishee, for failure of such corporation to make answer to the summons of garnishment, it was not error, in the absence of any traverse to the amended return, or of any evidence sustaining a traverse to the amended return, by the corporation, who has moved to set aside the judgment upon the ground that the movant had never been served with the summons of garnishment, to permit the officer who made the original entry of service to amend such return so as to make it show that the summons of garnishment was served upon the corporation by serving personally the individual named in the original return as "agent in charge of the office for said county for" the named corporation.

3. Garnishment §97, 141—Amendment of return of service related back to time of original entry as respected time for answering.

In such a case the amended return related back to the time of the original entry, and the corporation as garnishee, not having made answer to the summons of garnishment within the required time, was in default, and could not, after the allowance of the officer's amendment to his original return, be allowed to make answer to the summons.

4. Garnishment §187—Motion to set aside judgment for want of service properly denied when return amended to show proper service.

The trial court did not err in permitting the amendment to the returns of service, or in refusing to allow the corporation to make answer to the summons of garnishment, and did not err in overruling the motion made by such corporation to set aside the judgment which had been rendered against it.

SWEAT v. FOSTER. (No. 13120.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 8, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Physicians and surgeons \S 18(4)—Pleading \S 364(5)—Allegations as to unskillfulness and carelessness held conclusions and properly stricken; petition held not to show improper diagnosis and neglect of patient was cause of death.

The court did not err in striking paragraph 11 of the petition, or in dismissing the amended petition, on general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by O. Sweat against K. E. Foster. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This was a renewal suit brought within six months of the dismissal of the original suit. The petition as amended (its formal parts and a copy of the petition of the first suit being omitted) is as follows:

"1. That the defendant is a resident of said state and county, a regular practicing physician, practicing the profession of medicine for compensation in said state and county.

"2. That this is a renewal of suit No. 39170, filed in the clerk's office of the superior court of said county on the 13th day of December, 1917, between the same parties and the same cause of action; said suit No. 39170 having been dismissed by plaintiff's attorney on July 16, 1921.

"3. Petitioner alleges that he has been damaged in the sum of $25,000 as will hereinafter appear from the facts set out.

"4. Petitioner shows that on Sunday evening, the 14th day of October, 1917, petitioner's wife (Mrs. Mollie Sweat) was taken ill.

"5. Petitioner shows that he immediately called at the home of the defendant for the purpose of securing said defendant's services to wait upon petitioner's wife, but petitioner did not see defendant until the following morning, October 15, 1917.

"6. Petitioner shows that defendant responded to petitioner's call and agreed and promised to visit and wait upon petitioner's wife, and did so visit and wait upon said wife on Monday October 15, 1917, at about 7 o'clock a. m. Defendant examined her and stated she was in child labor, and thereupon treated and waited upon petitioner's wife for that trouble and in that respect.

"7. After remaining and treating petitioner's wife for about one hour, for child labor, defendant left said wife, stating he would return to continue the treatment of petitioner's wife, for child labor, at 1 o'clock p. m., Monday, the 15th, 1917. Defendant did not call upon said wife at 1 o'clock as he had promised, as alleged and set out in this paragraph, but not until many hours afterwards, viz., about 5 p. m.

"8. Petitioner shows that he went to defendant's house about 4 o'clock p. m. Monday, the 15th day of October, 1917, and urgently requested defendant to return and look after and wait on petitioner's wife. Defendant did so return in about one hour, and remained about 30 minutes, continuing the treatment of said wife, as for child labor, and stated to those present that the child would be born in an hour. Defendant then left and returned no more to petitioner's wife and home. Petitioner charges that defendant's so leaving at this time was an act of gross carelessness and neglect of said petitioner's wife.

"9. Petitioner shows that his wife died on Tuesday, October 16, 1917.

"10. Petitioner shows that petitioner's wife was not in child labor at all at the time defendant waited upon and treated her for same, but her illness was caused by an entirely different thing, viz., gastritis.

"11. Petitioner alleges and charges that the death of his wife was due to the unskillful diagnosis and treatment by defendant as a medical practitioner, and to the gross carelessness and neglect in his treatment and handling of said wife's illness.

"Petitioner prays that he may recover of the defendant in the sum of $25,000, by reason of the facts set out in this petition."

The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the petition, and the following special demurrer:

"Paragraph 11 of the plaintiff's petition should be stricken, because the allegations thereof are vague and indefinite and are conclusions of the pleader."

O. L. Kemper, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Bryan & Middlebrooks and Chauncey Middlebrooks, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, O. J. (after stating the facts as above). It is well settled that in a suit for damages alleged to have been caused by the malpractice of a physician, the burden is on the plaintiff to show a want of due care, skill, or diligence, and also that the injury resulted from the want of such care, skill, or diligence. Georgia Northern Railway Co. v. Ingram, 114 Ga. 639, 40 S. E. 708, and authorities cited. Conceding, but not deciding, that the petition in the instant case established a want of due care, skill, or diligence, on the part of the defendant, it did not show that this negligence of the defendant was the cause of the death of the plaintiff's wife; paragraph 11 of the petition having been properly stricken on the special demurrer interposed. The court did not, therefore, err in dismissing the suit on general demurrer. In view of this ruling, it is unnecessary to decide whether the first suit was void or merely voidable.

Judgment affirmed.

ROME RY. & LIGHT CO. v. GADDIS.
(No. 12974.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
Feb. 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers \S 314(2)—Petition alleging failure of motorman to alight and see that there is no danger before crossing railroad tracks held not demurrable.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer interposed by the Rome Railway & Light Company to the plaintiff's petition.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Carriers \S 280(1)—Carrier owes passenger duty of extraordinary care.

A carrier owes a passenger extraordinary care for his protection and safety.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by Mrs. V. H. Gaddis against the Rome Railway & Light Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lamar Camp and Linton A. Dean, both of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

Porter & Mebane, of Rome, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. This was a joint suit brought against the Rome Railway & Light Company and the Southern Railway Company, to recover damages for the homicide of the plaintiff's husband. The plaintiff alleged that her husband was riding as a passenger in one of the cars of the Rome Railway & Light Company, and that a collision occurred between the car in which he was riding and a passenger train of the Southern Railway Company at a point where the tracks of the Rome Railway & Light Company's car line crossed the tracks of the Southern Railway Company, and that as a result of this collision her husband received injuries to his person which caused his death several months later. Upon the call of the case the Rome Railway & Light Company interposed the following demurrer (the formal parts being here omitted):

"The allegations in said petition do not set forth a cause of action against this defendant, and there is no cause shown therein. The allegations in plaintiff's petition show that the independent intervening cause was the alleged negligence of the Southern Railway Company, its agents and employees, and that but for such intervening cause no injury would have occurred to plaintiff's husband. The only allegation of negligence in said petition charged against this defendant is that the street car motorman 'ran said street car on which petitioner's said husband was a passenger, as aforesaid, out and on and across the tracks of said Southern Railway Company and in front of said oncoming, powerful, and fast running train, without getting off his car and seeing and knowing that his said car would not collide with said train.' Defendant says that this does not allege negligence upon the part of this defendant to constitute a cause of action."

[1, 2] We think the demurrer was properly overruled. The plaintiff's husband was being transported as a passenger by the Rome Railway & Light Company, and therefore that company owed him extraordinary care for his protection and safety. Under the facts, and the allegations of negligence, as set forth in the petition, it was for the jury to say whether extraordinary care for the safety of the plaintiff's husband required the motorman of the car (in which the husband was a passenger), before he ran his car onto the tracks of the Southern Railway Company and in front of the oncoming passenger train, to get off of his car and to see and know that his car would not collide with such train.

Judgment affirmed.

WHITE PROVISION CO. v. HARDMAN.
(No. 12853.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)

Appeal and error \S 1005(2)—Approved verdict supported by evidence not disturbed.

The White Provision Company obtained judgment against C. W. Christian, and W. L. Hardman was served with a summons of garnishment. Hardman answered that he was in no way indebted to the defendant in fi. fa., and had in his hands nothing belonging to him. This answer was traversed. Upon the trial of the issues raised by the traverse and on conflicting evidence the jury returned a verdict in favor of the garnishee and against the traverse. The motion for a new trial contained the general grounds only; there was some evidence to support the finding of the jury, and their verdict having been approved by the trial judge, under the repeated and uniform rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, a reviewing court is powerless to interfere. See Bradham v. State, 21 Ga. App. 510, 94 S. E. 618, and cases cited.

SUMMERFORD v. HOFFMAN.

(Nos. 12306, 12307.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
Feb. 22, 1922.)

1. Judgment \S 713(2)—Adjudication on the merits on demurrer or otherwise conclusive when issues determinable under pleadings as they might have been amended.

Where the issues presented by the pleadings in a pending suit could have been inquired into and adjudicated in a former suit between the same parties, based upon the same cause of action, either under the pleadings there existing or as the pleadings could and should have existed by germane and appropriate amendments made thereto, an adjudication of the former suit on its merits, either by demurrer to the petition or otherwise, is res judicata of all issues presented in the suit pending. Civil Code 1910, \S 4338; Perry v. McLendon, 62 Ga. 598; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 714. See, also, Draper v. Medlock, 122 Ga. 234, 50 S. E. 113, 69 L. R. A. 483, 2 Ann. Cas. 650.

2. Judgment \S 572(2)—On demurrer is judgment on the merits, though more full statement of facts might have shown liability.

"A judgment on demurrer, which passes on the legal sufficiency of the facts stated by the plaintiff to hold the defendant to liability to him, is a judgment on the merits, although the plaintiff * * * has stated only a part of the facts when he might have stated more, and although, if the plaintiff had stated the facts fully, fairly, and truly, as they really existed, he might have set up a transaction showing liability against the defendant." Wolfe v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 6 Ga. App. 410, 412, 65 S. E. 62, 63.

3. Judgment \S 713(2)—Sustaining demurrer held adjudication against right to recover for another breach of contract, whether pleaded or not.

Where, in a suit by an agent against the owner for a breach of a brokerage contract for the sale of real estate, the petition alleges a written contract between the parties, and, as a breach thereof entitling the plaintiff to recover, that the plaintiff procured, in pursuance of the contract, certain named parties, who were ready, willing, and able to buy upon the terms stipulated by the owner, and that the owner refused to accept such purchasers, and failed to pay to the plaintiff the commission contracted for, an adjudication by the court, sustaining a general demurrer filed by the defendant to such petition upon the ground that the allegations therein failed to set out a cause of action against the defendant, is an adjudication upon the merits of the case, and adjudicates the plaintiff's right to recover for any breach of the contract, whether such breach is specifically pleaded in the petition, or could and should have been pleaded by germane and appropriate amendments thereto.

4. Adjudication of special demurrers immaterial.

The court having adjudicated the merits of the former suit in passing upon the general demurrer, it is immaterial whether or not the adjudication of the special demurrers passed upon the merits of the questions raised in the petition.

5. Judgment \S 1—Reasons and arguments expressed by court not adjudication.

"It is the judgment rendered [by the court] and its legal effect, and not the reasons and arguments in support thereof expressed by the judge in his order or judgment, which constitutes the adjudication." Matthews v. Green (Ga. App.) 110 S. E. 507.

6. Judgment \S 572(1)—Plea of res judicata properly sustained in action for broker's commissions.

In a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff against the same defendant for a breach of the same contract, although the contract is more elaborately set out than it was in the former petition, and although it is now alleged that the breach by the defendant consisted in the actual selling by the defendant of the property to another and different purchaser from that alleged in the petition as the one who was procured by the plaintiff under the terms of the contract, and that the defendant refused to pay to the plaintiff the commission to which the plaintiff was entitled, a plea of res judicata, setting up the adjudication on the demurrer in the former case, was properly sustained. Dodson v. Sou. Ry. Co., 137 Ga. 583, 73 S. E. 834; Smith v. Smith, 125 Ga. 83, 54 S. E. 73; Kimbro v. Tenn. Air-Line Ry., 56 Ga. 185.

"An essential element of the offense of violating section 715 of the Penal Code (known as the 'labor-contract act'), and one which the state must prove, is that the accused failed to perform the services contracted for, or failed to return the money advanced, 'without good and sufficient cause.' (Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2. Feb. 22, 1922.)

Master and servant §82(2) — Lien claimant held a laborer.

The sole question for determination being whether or not the defendant in error Tolbert was a laborer, and therefore entitled to a lien upon the proceeds of the sale of the property of his employer upon which the plaintiff in error had foreclosed a mortgage, and the evidence upon the hearing of the rule against the officer having in hand the funds arising from the proceeds of the sale being such as would authorize the inference that Tolbert was employed by his employer in the performance of work which consisted mostly in manual labor and not in mental skill, the finding of the trial judge upon the facts, holding that Tolbert was a laborer and therefore entitled to a lien upon such proceeds to the extent of the amount of the indebtedness due him by his employer for the services performed, is not without evidence to support it. AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO. v. DUBOIS BROS. (No. 12247.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2, March 4, 1922.)

1. Carriers ⇨76—Consignor may sue for damages when goods refused by consignee.

"Where a consignee of freight refuses to receive goods on account of damage done to them in the hands of the common carrier, and the goods are subsequently thrown back on the hands of the consignor, the latter has a right to bring an action for such damages against the carrier." Savannah, Florida & W. R. Co. v. Commercial Guano Co., 103 Ga. 590, 30 S. E. 555.

2. Carriers ⇨134—Evidence ⇨142(3)—No recovery in absence of evidence of value of damaged goods; evidence of selling price of perishable goods day following tender not evidence of value at time of tender.

"Where, in a suit by a shipper against a common carrier for loss or damage to goods in transit, it appears from the evidence that some of the goods were not totally damaged or destroyed, but were of some value, and the evidence fails to furnish sufficient data from which a jury might infer the value of the damaged goods, the verdict is without evidence to support it." Southern Express Co. v. Bass, 24 Ga. App. 742, 102 S. E. 168.

(a) This being a suit by a shipper against a common carrier to recover damages alleged to have been sustained to goods consisting of celery and cucumbers while delayed in transit, and there being evidence that the goods were of some value after having been damaged, and there being no evidence as to this value at the time when the goods were by the carrier offered to the consignee, the verdict is without evidence to support it. Evidence as to the selling price of such goods on the day following is insufficient to establish such value, since the goods were of a nature, as appeared from the evidence, highly perishable and subject to rapid deterioration and decline in value. The trial judge therefore erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1, Feb. 14, 1922.)

Criminal law ⇨935(1) — New trial properly denied when finding authorized by evidence.

The motion for a new trial contained the usual general grounds only; the finding of the judge, sitting without the intervention of a jury, was amply authorized by the evidence, and the refusal to grant a new trial was not error.

Error from City Court of Macon; Will Gunn, Judge.

Charlie Elder was convicted of carrying a pistol and pointing a pistol, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Criminal law ⇨1092(4)—Writ of error dismissed when bill of exceptions not tendered in time.

The recitals in the bill of exceptions in this case show that the motion for a new trial was overruled August 20, 1921; the certificate to the bill of exceptions is dated September 10, 1921, and the bill of exceptions shows affirmatively that it was tendered on that date to the judge who tried the case; and, this being a criminal case and the bill of exceptions having been tendered more than 20 days from the date of the judgment complained of, the writ of error must be dismissed.

Criminal law \S 935(1)—Not error to deny new trial, when evidence sufficient.

The defendant was convicted of the offense of simple larceny. His sole assignment of error is upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize the conviction. There was evidence to authorize the defendant's conviction, the verdict has the approval of the trial judge, and it was not error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Long County; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Robert Middleton was convicted of simple larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)

Intoxicating liquors \S 236(19)—Evidence insufficient to sustain conviction for manufacture.

The defendant was convicted of the unlawful manufacture of liquor. His conviction was dependent upon the circumstance that he was present with several other men at a still which was in operation. At that time he stated to the officer who discovered the still that he had no connection with it, that he was present merely because he saw the smoke rising, and thought the woods were on fire and went to see about it. The other persons present at the still testified positively that he had no ownership in the still and no connection with it, and that he walked to where it was in operation some time after they had begun to operate the still. The testimony is not sufficient to authorize this defendant's conviction of participating in the unlawful manufacture of liquor as alleged in the indictment. It was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Dorsey Cates was convicted of the unlawful manufacture of liquor, and he brings error. Reversed.

Henry & Jackson, of La Fayette, for plaintiff in error.

1. Contracts \S 92—Entire loss of mental capacity necessary to avoid.

"To avoid a contract on account of mental incapacity, there must be an entire loss of understanding."

2. Bills and notes \S 537(6)—Verdict properly directed in action by bona fide holder.

The court properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Evidence \S 535—Opinion as to mental condition properly excluded for want of showing that witness was expert.

Testimony that for several years defendant had not been in condition mentally to make a contract was properly excluded in absence of showing that witness was an expert, or knew what degree of mentality defendant possessed or what degree was necessary.

Error from Superior Court, Banks County; Blanton Fortson, Judge.

Action by J. C. Hill against Ella Holland. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. W. Start, of Commerce, for plaintiff in error.

Oscar Brown, of Lula, and S. R. Jolly, of Homer, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. John C. Hill, transferee, sued Ella Holland on a mortgage note for $500, given to the original payees and transferors for services rendered by them as attorneys at law. The plaintiff alleged that he was a bona fide holder for value. Defendant filed a plea denying liability, and denying that the plaintiff was "a bona fide purchaser of said note without notice." Upon the trial the plaintiff proved his case as alleged, and the defendant testified that the attorneys to whom the note was originally given told her that their fee would be about $8 or $10, and that she had no recollection of giving the note, and that her mind was defective at times. After the introduction of all the evidence the judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and to the judgment overruling the motion the defendant excepted.

[1,3] 1. In the first special ground of the motion for a new trial it is alleged that the court erred 'in refusing to allow a witness, Pat Hardy, to testify that—

"For four or five years this woman (defendant) has not been in a condition mentally that she could make a contract."

The court did not err in refusing to allow this witness to testify that the defendant had been in such condition mentally that she could not make a contract. This would be a conclusion of the witness, and there is nothing in the record to show that he was an expert, or knew what degree of mentality the defendant possessed, or knew what degree of mentality was necessary for the making of a contract. Furthermore, the testimony fails to show that defendant's understanding and reason were entirely gone at the time she signed the note. In Bond v. First National Bank, 19 Ga. App. 817 (1, 1a), 92 S. E. 285, it is held:

"To avoid a contract on account of mental incapacity, there must be an entire loss of understanding. Frizzell v. Reed, 77 Ga. 724; Maddox v. Simmons, 81 Ga. 512, 527; Nance v. Stockburger, 111 Ga. 821, 36 S. E. 100; De Nieff v. Howell, 138 Ga. 248, 75 S. E. 202. One who has not strength of mind and reason equal to a clear and full understanding of his act in making a contract is one who is afflicted with an entire loss of understanding. Barlow v. Strange, 120 Ga. 1015, 1018, 48 S. E. 344."

[2] 2. There is no merit in the ground of the motion for a new trial that—

The court erred "in directing a verdict for the plaintiff in said case, because there were, as claimed by the movant, enough facts and circumstances in the case to require the jury to pass on and say whether or not the plaintiff was a bona fide innocent holder of said note before due and for value, and that it was error for the court not to leave that question to the jury, as well as whether or not the note sued on was an illegal contract, as well as whether or not defendant ever agreed to sign any such contract or note."

The record shows that the plaintiff received the note before it was due, and without notice of any defect or defense, and there was no proof of non est factum, gambling, or immoral and illegal consideration, or fraud in its procurement. Civil Code 1910, § 4286.

Under the evidence as shown by the record, the verdict for the plaintiff was demanded, and the court did not err in directing a verdict in his favor, and in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

MORGAN v. STATE. (No. 13115.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. March 8, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law §200(4)—Conviction for manufacturing liquor will not bar prosecution for possessing liquor.

Under some circumstances a person could be guilty of manufacturing intoxicating liquors without having the liquors in his possession or control. It follows that, upon the trial of one charged with possessing intoxicating liquors, a plea of autrefois convict, setting up that a few days before the call of the case, and during "the present term of this court," the accused had been convicted of the offense of manufacturing intoxicating liquors, and that the court had jurisdiction of the crime and of the person, and that the charge against him of manufacturing intoxicating liquors, upon which he had been convicted, and the present charge of possessing such liquors, are based upon the same facts and grew out of one and the same transaction, and that the lesser offense of possessing intoxicating liquors was merged into the greater offense of manufacturing such liquors, is insufficient in law, and is not a good plea of autrefois convict.

2. Criminal law §547(2)—Defendant's statement in related case properly admitted.

It was not error for the court to admit in evidence upon the trial of this case the defendant's statement made to the jury in his trial in a previous case where he was charged with manufacturing whisky, the statement being read by the official stenographer of the court from his notes and without being sworn. This evidence was relevant, and was not inadmissible for any reason assigned. The proper construction of the ground of the motion for a new trial which complains of the admission of this evidence shows that it (the statement of the defendant) was objected to because it was not sworn testimony, but that no objection was made on the ground that the stenographer himself was not sworn before he read the statement to the jury.

3. Charge not erroneous.

The excerpt from the charge of the court, complained of in the motion for a new trial, was not error for any reason assigned.

4. Criminal law §935(1)—Denial of new trial not error when evidence sufficient.

The evidence amply authorized the conviction of the accused, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Bulloch County; H. B. Strange, Judge.

Alexander Morgan was convicted of possessing intoxicating liquors, and he brings error. Affirmed.

W. F. Slater, of Eldora, and Francis B. Hunter, of Statesboro, for plaintiff in error.

A. S. Anderson, of Millen, for the State.

BROYLES, C. J. The defendant was indicted for possessing intoxicating liquors. Upon the call of the case, and before pleading or arraignment, he filed a plea of former jeopardy, in which he alleged, in effect, that on August 17, 1921, and during "the present term of this court," he was tried and convicted of manufacturing the same liquors which he is now charged with illegally possessing, and that both of the alleged offenses grew out of one and the same transaction, and that the lesser offense of possessing intoxicating liquors was merged into the greater offense of manufacturing them. Upon motion of the state this plea was stricken as being insufficient in law.

[1] 1. The question first ruled upon is whether a person can be lawfully convicted of manufacturing intoxicating liquors, and subsequently be prosecuted for controlling or possessing the same liquors? This question, so far as we have been able to ascertain, has never been directly passed upon in any judicatory. However, the Supreme Court, in Bell v. State, 103 Ga. 397, 30 S. E. 294, 68 Am. St. Rep. 102, cited and relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff in error, made certain broad and general rulings which we think are in principle controlling upon the question. It was there held, in effect, that where one had been convicted of an offense he could lawfully be prosecuted for another offense, if neither of them was a necessary element in and an essential part of the other, or, in other words, if either offense could be committed without perpetrating the other. And, in our opinion, this is the true criterion by which this question should be adjudicated. This is also the view taken of the question by counsel for the plaintiff in error, and they plant their case squarely upon the contention that it is impossible for a person to physically manufacture intoxicating liquors without having the liquors in his possession. A little reflection will refute this contention. Under the laws of this state, any person who is present at a distillery, aiding and assisting another in making whisky, is himself guilty of manufacturing whisky, although he may have no interest whatever in the distillery or the whisky, and may have no possession or control of the whisky. As an illustration, suppose A., the owner of a distillery, and of all the corn, meal, mash, etc., from which the whisky is made, gives B. $2 a day to cut wood at the distillery and to keep up the fire in the still while the whisky making is going on, and suppose further that A. is present at the distillery at all times while B. is there, and that A. at all times has the exclusive custody, possession, and control of the whisky and the ingredients from which it is made, B. never touching the ingredients or the whisky, and having no interest whatever in them, and doing no work except to cut wood and keep up the fire. It is clear that, while B. would be guilty of manufacturing whisky, he would not be guilty of having the whisky in his possession or control.

It follows that the plea of autrefois convict in the instant case, which in effect merely alleged that a person could not be guilty of manufacturing whisky without also being guilty of possessing the whisky, was properly stricken as being insufficient in law.

[2-4] 2. The other rulings stated in the headnotes do not require elaboration.

BURKHALTER v. WATERS. (No. 12835.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.

Executors and administrators §20(5)—Application for administration not showing applicant's right to administer dismissed.

"An application for letters of administration which fails to allege that the applicant is an heir at law of the decedent, or a creditor of the estate, or any other reason which, under the law, would entitle the applicant to the administration, should be dismissed upon motion made on that ground by caveators appearing at the hearing who are heirs at law of the decedent." Towner v. Griffin, 115 Ga. 965, 42 S. E. 262.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; H. B. Strange, Judge.

Application by Mrs. John Burkhalter for letters of administration on the estate of Mrs. Libble Waters, to which W. W. Waters filed a caveat. Judgment denying the petition, and the petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Burkhalter applied for letters of administration on the estate of Mrs. Libbie Waters, alleging that she was the mother of the decedent. W. W. Waters filed a caveat, alleging that administration was not necessary, for the reason that the decedent left no debts, and left as her two heirs at law the caveator, who was her husband, and a minor child, and that the caveator had taken out letters of guardianship of the person and property of the child, and, as such guardian, had taken possession of the property of the child, and that administration on the estate would cause unnecessary expense, and further alleging that, if the court decided to appoint an administrator of the estate, the caveator, and not Mrs. Burkhalter, was entitled to be appointed. Upon a hearing before the ordinary the petition for administration was denied. An appeal was taken to the superior court, and on the trial there the presiding judge, after all the evidence was in, made the following announcement:

"It appearing to the court that the applicant for letters of administration is the mother of the deceased, and it appearing further that the deceased left a husband who now survives her, and one child, and it appearing that there are no debts owing by the estate of the deceased, and it further appearing that the applicant is neither an heir nor a creditor of said estate, the court is of the opinion that the applicant has no legal rights whatever to letters of administration upon this estate; and it further appearing that the entire estate has been turned over to the husband of the deceased as an heir and as guardian for his minor child, and that there is no necessity for his administration upon this estate, the court denies the application for administration, and directs that a verdict be returned in favor of the caveator."

The jury returned a verdict "in favor of the caveat, and that there be no administration granted." A judgment was entered upon this finding, and Mrs. Burkhalter brought the case here for review.

A. S. Way, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. (after stating the facts as above). This case is controlled by the ruling in Towner v. Griffin, 115 Ga. 965, 42 S. E. 262. In that case Mr. Justice Cobb said:

"The Code provides that every application made to the ordinary for the granting of any order shall be by petition in writing, stating the ground of such application and the order sought. Civil Code [1895] § 4254. It is also provided that all objections or caveats to an order sought shall be in writing, setting forth the grounds of such caveat. Civil Code [1895] § 4256. It has been held that a caveat to an application for letters of administration should show that the caveator is interested in the estate, either as a creditor of the estate or an heir at law of the decedent. Williams v. Williams, 113 Ga. 1006, and case cited. The reason for this rule is that a mere interloper should not be allowed to interfere where a proper application has been made for letters of administration upon the estate. A person who is not concerned in any way in the question should, of course, not be heard before the court. While there is no ruling to the effect that an application for letters of administration must show that the applicant is an heir at law or a creditor or for some other reason entitled to the administration, it would seem that the principle at the foundation of the ruling above referred to would apply in such a case. Except in those cases where the law authorizes the county administrator or the clerk of the superior court to be appointed administrator upon an estate, the law does not recognize the right of any one to be appointed administrator, unless he is an heir at law of the decedent, or a creditor of the estate, or otherwise interested therein as legatee or devisee, or has been selected by a majority of the heirs at law as administrator, or has been associated as coadministrator with one who is entitled to the administration for some one or more of the reasons just referred to. Civil Code [1895] § 3367. No other person than those just referred to is entitled to be appointed administrator; and it would seem that no other person should be allowed to file an application for letters of administration, and thus involve the estate and those interested therein in the expense necessary to determine whether an administration is necessary or to defeat the application of a mere intermeddler. If the heirs and creditors and all other persons interested in the estate are satisfied to allow the same to go unrepresented, it is no concern of one who has no interest whatever in the estate. In the present case the application does not allege that the applicant has any interest whatever in his own right in the estate, or that he represents either as next friend or otherwise, any one who is interested in the estate. He does not show upon the face of his application that he has any right to bring before the court the question as to whether administration should be had upon the estate. The section of the Code which requires that every application made to the ordinary must state 'the ground of such application,' when applied to a petition for letters of administration, means that the applicant must show in his application that he has such an interest in the estate, either in his own right or as the representative of some other person, as would authorize him to bring the estate before the court in order that it might determine whether there should be representation thereon."

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF DAWSON et al. v. MCGILL.
(No. 12860.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Overruling of demurrers not error.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrers to the petition.

2. Municipal corporations \S 788(2), 791(2), 817(1)—No recovery against contractor without proof that planks were placed by him over excavation and were insecure; city not liable unless it had notice of presence of insecure planks; facts insufficient to show city officials might have known of insecure planks.

Under the evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict against either of the defendants.

3. Other grounds not considered.

As a new trial must result from the ruling in the immediately preceding paragraph, it is unnecessary to consider other grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Dawson; M. O. Edwards, Judge.

Action by Edna McGill against the City of Dawson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

W. H. Gurr and R. R. Marlin, both of Dawson, and Pottle & Hofmayer, of Albany, for plaintiffs in error.

Parks & Parks, of Dawson, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1-3] We need to elaborate only the second headnote. The petition, among other things, alleges that—"The city of Dawson, in April, 1920, through the city council of Dawson, awarded to the said Pittman Construction Company a contract to grade and pave certain streets in Dawson. By the authority granted and direction given to it by the said city of Dawson, through the city council aforesaid, the Pittman Construction Company was empowered and authorized to make excavations, to remove and reset curbs, to eliminate any obstructions to the work of grading, paving, and setting curbs which might be necessary, to close streets or ways to traffic, and to do any and all other works of construction or demolition for the expeditious and successful carrying on of the operations aforesaid. During the entire period of such operations, including the 14th day of September, 1920, a civil engineer employed by the city of Dawson overlooked the work of the said Pittman Construction Company, with full power and authority vested in him to reject any unsafe or unsatisfactory construction or work incident to the carrying out of its contract by the said Pittman Construction Company. * * *

"On the 14th day of September, 1920, while engaged in the paving operations aforesaid, the said Pittman Construction Company removed a cross-bridge at the intersection of Lee and Stonewall streets, said bridge being over a ditch at the edge of and contiguous to the curbing at the east end of the sidewalk on the north side of Lee street in front of the building known as Kennedy's warehouse building. A broad stream of water was turned into the curb ditch by the said construction company on the north side of Lee street, and ran thence down the west side of Stonewall street along and beyond and on either side of where the said crossing bridge had been removed. Several planks were placed across said ditch by the said construction company, or with its knowledge and consent and approval, where said bridge had been. These planks were about 4 feet in length and of the aggregate breadth of about 12 inches, one end of each being placed upon the curbing at the end of the sidewalk and the other upon the ground in the street, the same sloping at an angle of about 25 degrees. The same were not securely fixed in place, the ends resting upon the sidewalk curbing unevenly. This defect was not observable to petitioner or other pedestrians, but they apparently represented a safe and satisfactory means and ways of crossing. * * *

"About dark on the evening of the said 14th day of September, 1920, while returning to her home on Lee street from her work and proceeding along the sidewalk on the north side of said Lee street, petitioner proceeded to use the planks placed as aforesaid for the purpose of crossing at the regular crossing place from Lee street across said ditch and Stonewall street, and upon her stepping upon one of these planks it suddenly turned to one side and precipitated her into the ditch. At the time when petitioner attempted to make use of the said crossing and at no time prior thereto was the said sidewalk or crossing closed to pedestrians, nor were there any lights, ropes, and other signals to indicate that the sidewalk or the means of crossing provided as aforesaid should not be used or was safe and trustworthy. On the contrary, the said sidewalk had been continuously open to pedestrians during the whole of said day, and the planks placed as aforesaid had been in general use by the public during the whole of said afternoon, and said crossing of planks presented an open invitation to petitioner and pedestrians generally for its use. Petitioner further shows that there was no other place of crossing in the immediate locality except at the place where she attempted to cross, as a broad stream of water stood next to the curbing on both Lee and Stonewall streets, and there was no other passageway over the same. * * *

"As a result of the defective condition of said crossing as aforesaid, petitioner, without fault on her part, was thrown violently to the ground, and sustained a severe strain and laceration of her right ankle."

(a) Before the Pittman Construction Company could be held liable for the injury to the plaintiff, it would be necessary to prove the allegation in the petition that "several planks were placed across said ditch by the said construction company, or with its knowledge and consent and approval, where said bridge had been," and that "the same were not securely fixed in place." The evidence fails to support these allegations, and a verdict against the construction company was unauthorized.

(b) The city of Dawson could not be held liable for the damage to the plaintiff resulting from the planks being placed across the ditch, unless the evidence showed that the city had actual knowledge that they were there and were not securely placed, or unless the facts were such as to charge the city with such knowledge. The record shows that the city authorities had no actual knowledge of the presence of the planks; and, as the evidence showed that they had been placed across the ditch only a few hours previous to the injury of the plaintiff, under the ruling in Mayor and Council of Jackson v. Boone, 93 Ga. 662 (3), 20 S. E. 46, this was not sufficient to show that, in the exercise of ordinary care, the city officials might have ascertained the presence of the planks, and that they were not securely fixed in place, the plaintiff was not entitled to a verdict against the municipality. Judgment reversed.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1,2] The People's Bank of Savannah sued L. K. Meldrim on two promissory notes, both payable to Savannah Collection Agency, both signed by John Hardy Purvis, and both indorsed by him and by L. K. Meldrim, the defendant. It was alleged that petitioner was the owner and holder of the notes "in due course, bona fide, and for value," and that "said notes were duly and legally protested for nonpayment, and the defendant notified thereof." The defendant filed a demurrer as follows:

"First. Defendant demurs generally to said petition, because no cause of action is set out against him therein. Second. Defendant demurs specially to the second paragraph of said petition, because the alleged obligation of this defendant and his actual relationship in regard to the notes is not stated. Third. Defendant demurs to the third paragraph, because it is not stated at or in what manner the petitioner became the owner and the holder of said notes, nor at what time petitioner acquired such ownership. Fourth. Defendant demurs specially to the entire petition, because the relationship of the petitioner to the other parties whose names appear on the note is not disclosed, nor is there any allegation as to whether or not either or any of said parties have paid or satisfied said note, or have been released of their obligation thereon."

There is no merit in any of the grounds of the demurrer to the petition, and it was properly overruled. See, in this connection, sections 3541, 3553, and 3559 of the Civil Code of 1910; *McMillan v. BANKENDORF v. SEVELOVITZ. (No. 13098.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)

Sales \Rightarrow 41—Buyer held entitled to return of money where stones sold as diamonds were not diamonds.

The verdict in this case was not authorized by the evidence, and, for this reason, it was error to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Duke Davis, Judge.

Action by S. C. Bankendorf against G. C. Sevelovitz. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. H. Thompson, of La Grange, for plaintiff in error.

M. U. Mooty, of La Grange, for defendant in error.

LUKE, J. Bankendorf sued Sevelovitz, alleging that he had bought from the defendant three alleged diamonds, paying the defendant $375 for them; that the defendant expressly warranted the diamonds to be genuine and well worth more than the amount he was paying for them; that the stones looked like diamonds, but in fact were not genuine diamonds, but were spurious or paste diamonds, and were totally worthless; and that by reason of the breach of warranty and fraudulent statements of the defendant, the plaintiff was damaged in the sum paid for the diamonds. The plaintiff's evidence amply supported his petition. The testimony was uncontradicted that the stones purchased were not diamonds and were worthless, that they were mere imitations, but were such imitations as to mislead the casual observer, even though he might be familiar with diamonds; that they were, however, such fake or spurious stones that upon taking them out of the setting the casual observer would know that they were not diamonds. The plaintiff's evidence was to the effect that the defendant expressly warranted the stones to be genuine diamonds. The defendant, by his evidence, denied that he had warranted the stones to be genuine diamonds. He testified that he merely sold the three stones to the plaintiff and had given the plaintiff ample time to have them examined and see what he was buying; that before showing the stones to the plaintiff and while out riding with the plaintiff and his wife, diamonds were mentioned, and he told the plaintiff that he had a lavalliere which he had taken in upon a loan, and that the next day after this ride the plaintiff came around and asked to see the lavalliere, and it was handed to him with the statement that he could take it and, when he was satisfied with it, he could pay for it. On cross-examination however, he testified:

"I told him I had a diamond lavalliere with three stones in it. I told him they were set in white gold." "I sold them to him for diamonds." "I took them in as genuine diamonds." "I told him I took in the lavalliere with three diamonds." "I didn't know it was a fake when I sold it to him."

The jury trying the case found a verdict in favor of the defendant. Upon the undisputed evidence, was the jury authorized to return a verdict in favor of the defendant? It is without dispute that the defendant sold them as diamonds, and it is without dispute that they are not diamonds. Can the defendant escape the return of the money paid for these stones, upon the ground that he took them in as diamonds and did not know they were not genuine diamonds, but gave the plaintiff a chance to examine them himself or have any one else examine them before purchasing them? We think not. By common information we know that there are many grades of diamonds, but a diamond is a diamond. If the issue had been here, upon the plaintiff's side, that these stones were expressly warranted to be a certain grade of diamonds, and upon the defendant's side that he did not warrant them to be of any particular grade, then the verdict could stand. In this case, no such issue is raised. The defendant himself says that he sold the plaintiff three diamonds and for such the plaintiff paid him. The evidence is undisputed that they were not diamonds. In our opinion, the evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff, and it was error for the court to overrule the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

1. Sufficiency of evidence.

Upon conflicting evidence the jury were authorized to convict the accused of having violated the prohibition law as charged.

2. Criminal law §938(1)—New trial not granted for newly discovered cumulative, impeaching evidence not likely to change result.

The ground of the motion for a new trial, based upon alleged newly discovered evidence, falls squarely within the rules that where such evidence is merely cumulative and impeaching, and would not likely produce a different result upon another trial, it does not require a new trial.

(No. 12968.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 9, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Brokers §82(1)—In action for services in negotiating for purchase of property which defendant subsequently purchased direct, petition held demurrable.

In substance the petition of the Mercer Company alleges that Center employed the company to negotiate with the owner for the purchase of a certain lot in the city of Savannah; that on a certain day after such employment the company made an offer of a certain amount to the owner for the property, and the owner declined the offer; that Center was notified that the offer had been refused, and after such notice he advised the company to make an offer at a named increased amount; that the increased offer was refused and the refusal was reported; that Center then advised and instructed the Mercer Company to wait a few days before making any further offer to the owner of the property; that subsequently Center, without the knowledge of the Mercer Company, negotiated with the owner of the property, and at a still further increased amount bought the property; that after Center had bought the property the Mercer Company demanded of him the payment of a certain amount of money which it alleged to be the reasonable value of its services for negotiating for the purchase of said property, which Center refused to pay, and that he is indebted to it in the same sum on open account for this service. The defendant challenged the petition upon the ground that it did not set forth a cause of action; that the petition was vague, indefinite, and insufficient in law, it not having set forth what the terms of the employment of the plaintiff by the defendant consisted of, nor what the consideration of the employment was, nor whether the plaintiff was to be paid by the defendant for his services, nor how the amount sued for was arrived at. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted to this judgment. Held, it was error to overrule the general demurrer to the petition, as the petition did not disclose the length of time or duration of the contract, and was otherwise vague, indefinite, and uncertain. The petition shows that the plaintiff was unable to purchase the property at the price at which the defendant was willing for it to pay. It is not alleged that the plaintiff's negotiations amounted to the procuring cause and cumulated in the purchase of the property by the defendant, or that the plaintiff discharged his full duty in the premises. See, in this connection, Roberts v. Martin, 15 Ga. App. 206, 208, 82 S. E. 813.

1. Criminal law ¶594(1)—Denial of continuance not error when absent witnesses not subpoenaed and showing not made that testimony was expected at next term.

The court did not err in overruling the defendant's motion for a continuance of the case. 1. Appeal and error ¶588, 639(2)—Questions dependent on evidence not considered without proper brief of evidence; judgment affirmed in absence of brief of evidence or of questions not dependent on the evidence.

Where no proper brief of evidence is sent up, this court cannot decide any question which is dependent upon a consideration of the evidence. "If all the assignments of error are of that class, a judgment of affirmance will result. If there are assignments of error, such as rulings on demurrers, or the like, which do not involve a consideration of the evidence, they may be passed on." Crumbley v. Brook, 135 Ga. 723, 70 S. E. 655.

2. Appeal and error ¶588—Stenographic report of proceedings with objections and rulings not proper brief of evidence.

What purports to be a brief of the evidence in the instant case is evidently a copy of the stenographic report of the proceedings therein, and contains all the questions propounded by counsel on both sides to the witnesses, the answers thereto, the objections of counsel to the admission of evidence, and the rulings of the court thereon. Such a paper is not a substantial compliance with the law as to the bringing of a brief of evidence to this court; and, as all the grounds of error involve a consideration of the evidence, an affirmance must result.

Receivers \Rightarrow 174(1)—Suit not maintainable against receiver without leave of court; suit for breach of contract to furnish cars not within exception to rule.

Except as modified by the provisions of Civ. Sullivan*, 27 Ga. App. —, 108 S. E. 127. The petition in the instant case having failed to show a compliance with this requirement, and not being governed by the provisions of the Code sections mentioned, it not being a suit based on tort, for damage to personality on account of the failure of the defendant to comply with its common-law duty to furnish cars for the transportation of freight within a reasonable time after demand (Southern Ry. Co. v. Moore, 183 Ga. 806, 67 S. E. 85, 26 L. R. A. [N. Damages $49 — Innkeepers $10 — Petition held to show want of ordinary care in using unlighted stairway; no recovery for mental anguish unaccompanied by physical injury or pecuniary loss.

Robt. G. Plunkett, Walter De Fore, and Jas. C. Estes, all of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

Herrington & Napier, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BROYLES, C. J. This was a renewal suit brought within six months from the dismissal of the first suit. The petition as amended was brought in two counts. Conceding that the present suit was for substantially the same cause of action as the first suit, and that in other respects it was a proper renewal thereof, and conceding further that the second count of the amended petition was sufficiently complete within itself, we do not think that either count of the petition set out a cause of action. The first count of the petition alleged that the defendant owned and was in full charge and control of a certain hotel in which the plaintiff lived; that on January 7, 1918, about 3 o'clock p. m., the plaintiff had occasion to go upstairs from the first to the second floor, and that when she subsequently came down the stairs from the second floor, about 6 p. m. on the same day, on account of insufficient light upon the stairway she fell when three or four steps from the bottom step, and thereby sustained the injuries sued for; that prior to this occasion the stairway was always sufficiently lighted for one to make his way safely up and down it, but that on this occasion, through the gross and wanton negligence of the defendant, the usual and necessary light for the stairway was not provided. The petition further alleged that—

"Petitioner was not aware that there was not sufficient light on the stairway when she went up to the second floor, and after she completed her errand to the second floor, and, desiring to descend to the lobby on the first floor, and there being [only] one stairway leading to said lobby, she was compelled to use said stairway, although it was darkened. Said stairway was not dangerous when lighted [and if it had been lighted] she would not have sustained the fall and the injuries incident thereto." (Italics ours.)

These averments of the petition, properly construed most strongly against the plaintiff, clearly show that when the plaintiff had finished her errand on the second floor and started to return to the first floor, she became aware that the stairway was not sufficiently lighted for her to safely attempt to descend by it, and that in attempting to use it in the darkness she was not in the exercise of ordinary care. See, in this connection, Flournoy v. American Hat Mfg. Co., 21 Ga. App. 599, 94 S. E. 835; Day v. Graybill, 24 Ga. App. 524, 101 S. E. 759; Lebby v. Atlanta Realty Corporation, 25 Ga. App. 369, 103 S. E. 433; Ogoin v. Imperial Cafe, Inc., 25 Ga. App. 415, 103 S. E. 594.

In the second count of the petition the plaintiff sought to recover damages for an alleged willful and wanton trespass upon her premises. It was alleged in this count that the trespass caused her mental pain and anguish, and prolonged an illness from which she was then suffering. In our opinion this count did not set forth a cause of action, as the law is well settled in this state that there can be no recovery for damages on account of mental pain and anguish unaccompanied by any physical injury to the person or any pecuniary loss. Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183; Seifert v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 129 Ga. 181, 58 S. E. 699, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1149, 121 Am. St. Rep. 210; Goddard v. Watters, 14 Ga. App. 722, 82 S. E. 306; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Knight, 16 Ga. App. 203, 84 S. E. 986; Dresbach v. Davis, 17 Ga. App. 79, 86 S. E. 256.

From what has been said it follows that neither count of the petition set forth a cause of action, and that the court erred in overruling the general demurrer to the amended petition.

Judgment reversed.

Railroads ⚡484(3, 4)—Negligence causing fire held for jury.

When this case was here before, the verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff was set aside because, under the ruling of the Supreme Court in Seaboard Air-Line Ry. v. Jarrell, 145 Ga. 688, 89 S. E. 718, the evidence was not deemed sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the engine of the defendant caused the fire by the emission of sparks. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Howard, 25 Ga. App. 83, 102 S. E. 456. On the second trial (in which a verdict for the defendant was directed by the court) there was additional testimony submitted by the plaintiff on this point, and also relative to the handling of the engine. There was evidence to show the slipping of the driving wheels of the locomotive, and the too rapid and unnecessary forcing of steam in the steam chest, attended by the emission of an unusual quantity of sparks, which flew upward and higher than the house toward which the wind was blowing. Such evidence, when taken with the entire testimony, was sufficient to have authorized a finding that the fire was occasioned by sparks emitted from the defendant's locomotive; and, while (contrary to the facts in Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Trammell, 23 Ga. App. 25, 97 S. E. 461), we do not think the record discloses any testimony to combat the evidence submitted by the defendant, that the engine was then and there properly equipped with an approved spark arrester, still, under the testimony disclosed by the record, it was for the jury to say whether the fire was occasioned by sparks emitted from the locomotive, and, if so, it became their duty to determine whether or not the engine was then being operated with ordinary and reasonable care and safety. Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Maynard, 139 Ga. 407(1), 77 S. E. 399.

1. Account, action on ⚡2—Action may be brought on open account when written contract fully performed by plaintiff; contract may be used only as evidence in action on open account for goods sold or services rendered.

An action may be brought and sustained on open account for goods sold or services rendered, although there may have been a special contract in writing governing the subject-matter of the suit, where it appears that the plaintiff has fully performed his part of the agreement and nothing remains to be done except for the other party to make payment. Tumlin v. Standard Sewing Machine Co., 21 Ga. App. 373, 376, 94 S. E. 646. In such a suit, the contract not being declared on, its breach does not constitute the cause of action, but the contract can be used merely as evidence of the indebtedness. Chapman v. Conwell, 1 Ga. App. 212(2), 58 S. E. 137; Pittman v. Hodges, 13 Ga. App. 25, 26, 78 S. E. 688; Ittner v. Farmers' State Bank, 15 Ga. App. 235, 82 S. E. 909.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1. March 7, 1922.)

1. Evidence \S 185(1)—Notice to produce letters, etc., held too indefinite and extensive in range.

This case was before this court upon a former writ of error, and is reported in 24 Ga. App. 308, 100 S. E. 781. Subsequently the defendant served upon the plaintiff the following notice to produce: "All letters, documents, correspondence, and any other written communication written by the defendant M. O. Ringwald to the plaintiff above set out, or to any one connected with said company, or to any individual of said company, between the dates of December 1, 1914, and December 25, 1917." Upon motion of the plaintiff, the court held that this notice was not sufficiently definite, and was too vague and uncertain in description and too extensive in range to direct the plaintiff to produce the papers called for in the notice. This court is convinced that the notice is too indefinite and too extensive in range to require the production of the letters. By the notice the plaintiff is commanded to produce every kind of written communication to the plaintiff or to any one connected with the company, or to any individual of said company. See Ga. Iron & Coal Co. v. Etowah Iron Co., 104 Ga. 395, 30 S. E. 878, and cases cited;

March 7, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Chattel mortgages \S 280—Sale not suspended on affidavit of illegality, unless bond substantially as statute requires.

"The giving of a bond is a condition precedent to the return of the papers to court for trial, where an affidavit of illegality is tendered to the execution issued on the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage, and if the bond be not conditioned substantially as the statute requires, the papers ought not to be returned to court and sale suspended." Brantley v. Baker, 75 Ga. 676(1).

2. Chattel mortgages \S 280—Bond on affidavit of illegality held not in compliance with statute.

The statute provides that, when such an affidavit of illegality is filed by the mortgagor, the bond shall be "conditioned for the return of the property when called for by the levying officer," and "shall be made payable to the plaintiff." Civ. Code 1910, \S 8301. These requirements are not met by a bond the condition of which is that, should the defendant "well and truly deliver said property so levied upon at the time and place of sale, in the event said illegality shall be dismissed by the court or withdrawn, then this obligation to be void, else of full force and effect," and which is made payable to the sheriff of the county. Brantley v. Baker, supra. See, in this connection, Hayes v. Savannah Chemical Co., 17 Ga. App. 376, 86 S. E. 1073.

3. Chattel mortgages \S 280—Leave to file new bond with affidavit of illegality held properly denied.

The trial judge did not err in refusing to allow the defendant to file a new bond after he had announced ready for trial, nor in sustaining the motion to dismiss the affidavit of illegality. This case differs from Lytile v. De Vaughn, 81 Ga. 226, 7 S. E. 281, and Gelders v. Mathews, 6 Ga. App. 144, 64 S. E. 576, cited and relied upon by plaintiff in error. In each of those cases the motion was to amend the bond given so as to make it conform to the terms of the statute. In this case "the defendant tendered a written amendment asking that he be allowed to amend his affidavit of illegality in said case by filing a new bond." The "new bond" had only one security, the old two, and it does not appear that the "new bond" had been accepted by the levying officer. In Fountain v. Napier, 109 Ga. 226, 34 S. E. 351, in referring to a bond given under Civ. Code 1910, \S 3301, supra, the Supreme Court said: "In order to make such a bond a binding contract between the parties and to render the person signing the bond as an obligor liable thereon, it is essential, not only that the bond should be signed by the obligors, but that the same should be accepted by the levying officer as a forthcoming bond."

Feb. 14, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Names \S 19—Issue of idem sonans is for court.

Where a demurrer to a plea of misnomer raises the issue of idem sonans, and the two names, although spelled differently, necessarily sound almost alike, the issue is to be determined, as matter of law, by the court and not by the jury. Veal v. State, 116 Ga. 589, 42 S. E. 705, and authorities cited.

2. Names \S 16(2)—"Keen" and "King" held idem sonans, and plea of misnomer properly stricken.

The defendant was indicted under the name of "Sampson King." He filed a plea of misnomer in which he alleged that his true name was "Sampson Keen," that he had always been known and called by that name, and that he had never been known or called by the name of "Sampson King." Upon motion of the state the court struck the plea as being insufficient in law. Held, the names "King" and "Keen" are idem sonans, as a matter of law, and the court did not err in its ruling. Roland v. State, 127 Ga. 401, 56 S. E. 412, and citations.

3. Criminal law \S 828—Timely written request for charge on impeachment of witnesses is necessary.

Under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court and of this court, it is not error for the trial judge to fail to charge upon impeachment of witnesses, in the absence of a timely written request therefor.

4. Charge held sufficiently full in absence of request.

The charge of the court upon the subject of a reasonable doubt was sufficiently full, in the absence of a timely written request for a more detailed charge thereon.

5. Remaining grounds of motion.

The remaining grounds of the amendment to the motion for a new trial are without merit.

8. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 935(1)—New trial properly denied when verdict authorized by evidence.

The verdict was amply authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Feb. 14, 1922.)

Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 1071—Petition for certiorari not sanctioned when giving or acceptance of bond not properly shown; statements in petition and clerk's certificate as to compliance with law held conclusions.

The petition for certiorari does not affirmatively allege that such a bond as is required in certiorari cases from a police or recorder's court was filed in the police court, or that such bond was approved and accepted by the clerk of said court (it appearing that there was such a clerk); no certified copy of the bond is attached to the petition; and the certificate of the clerk of the police court does not show that the bond was approved or accepted by him. The statement in the petition that the petitioner had "complied with the requirements of law in such cases," and in the certificate of the clerk that the accused "has given bond and security as required by law," are but conclusions. See Hubert v. Thomasville, 18 Ga. App. 756 (1-a), 90 S. E. 720. This being true, the judge of the superior court did not err in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari. See *Gillespie v. OWENS v. JONES-KENNEDY FURNITURE CO. (No. 13078.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)

1. Sales §202(2, 3)—Title held not to pass where check given as cash payment was not paid.

Where personal property was sold on the installment plan and by the contract the first payment was to be made in cash, and a check was given for this "cash" payment, on the faith of which the property was delivered to the purchaser, the title to the property did not pass from the vendor to the vendee if the bank refused to pay the check because of "insufficient funds" and the vendor within a reasonable time demanded possession of the property from the vendee.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. Landlord and tenant §269(2)—Buyer's landlord held not in position of bona fide purchaser without notice of fraud.

Where a tenant was in arrears with her rent when she purchased furniture and gave a worthless check therefor, and the landlord levying distress warrant thereon did not extend credit or part with anything on the faith of her possession of the property, he was not in the position of a bona fide purchaser.

3. Sales §479(5)—Where check not good, seller not required to tender contract and check before claiming goods.

Where payment of the check given as the cash payment on property purchased on an installment contract was refused, it was not necessary for the seller to formally tender the contract and unpaid check to the buyer before making claim to the property; they being introduced in evidence on the trial of the claim case.

Proceedings on a claim filed by the Jones-Kennedy Furniture Company to property levied on under a distress warrant in favor of J. S. Owens. Judgment for the claimant, and Owens brings error. Affirmed.

Etheridge, Sams & Etheridge, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Leon C. Greer, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] Mrs. Lady P. Kinsey rented a house from John S. Owens. She obtained from Jones-Kennedy Furniture Company certain furniture which it delivered at her house, the same being the house rented from Owens. As a part of the purchase price of the furniture, she gave a check for $50 and executed a contract in which it was stated that she was to pay $50 cash and the balance of the purchase price at the rate of $10 per week. The check for $50 which she gave was returned by the bank marked "insufficient funds." The agent of the sellers notified Mrs. Kinsey that "if she could not pay the check she would have to return the furniture." The check was not paid. The agent finally obtained from her the key to the house, and with a conveyance went there to remove the furniture. When he reached the house he found that the furniture had been levied upon by virtue of a distress warrant in favor of the landlord, John S. Owens. The Jones-Kennedy Company filed a claim to the furniture, and a trial of this claim in the municipal court resulted in a judgment in favor of the claimant. Certiorari was sued out, the certiorari was overruled, and Owens excepted.

"Fraud voids all contracts." Civil Code 1910, § 4234. See, also, sections 4111, 4112, and 4113 of the Code. In Starnes v. Roberts, 123 Ga. 718, 58 S. E. 348, the Supreme Court said:

"If personal chattels be sold upon the express condition that they are to be paid for on delivery, and they are delivered upon the faith that the condition will be immediately performed, and performance is refused upon demand in a reasonable time, no title passes to the buyer. Bergan v. Magnus, 98 Ga. 514."

Demand for the property was made in a reasonable time. See Wilson v. Comer, 125 Ga. 500, 54 S. E. 355, 114 Am. St. Rep. 245; Newman v. Claffin Co., 107 Ga. 89 (1), 32 S. E. 943; Landauer v. Cochran, 54 Ga. 533; Jaffrey v. Brown (C. C.) 29 Fed. 477 (8), and cases cited on page 482, and especially cases cited in note on page 485.

[2] The record shows that at the time Mrs. Kinsey contracted to purchase this furniture she was a tenant of Owens and in arrears with her rent, and it is clear that the landlord did not extend credit to her, nor did he pay anything or part with anything "on the faith of the property in the possession of the tenant." Sutton v. Ford, 144 Ga. 596, 87 S. E. 799, L. R. A. 1918D, 561, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 106; Matthews v. Kennedy, 118 Ga. 378, 38 S. E. 854. He does not stand in the position of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of the fraud. In Exchange Bank v. Claffin

Co., 100 Ga. 642 (1), 28 S. E. 439, the Supreme Court said:

"A title obtained by fraud is voidable in the vendee and is good only when set up by a bona fide purchaser without notice." Civil Code, § 3540 (section 4120 of the Civil Code of 1910).

A creditor by mortgage who did not extend credit on faith of the property, title to which was obtained by fraud, is not such a purchaser as will be protected. Dinkler v. Potts, 90 Ga. 103, 15 S. E. 690. All the cases cited by the plaintiff in error can be distinguished from the one under consideration. The question of fraud, which enters into this case, differentiates it from several of those cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error. As an illustration, take the case of Gartrell v. Clay, 81 Ga. 327, 7 S. E. 161. In that case there was no suggestion of fraud. Besides, the Supreme Court in the opinion in that case (81 Ga. 330, 7 S. E. 162), said:

"The debt which the distress warrant was sued out to secure was a contract by Sophie Johnson with Clay some time after the goods had been purchased by her from Gartrell. She rented the house from Clay, and had this furniture in her possession. Perhaps it was on the faith of her having this furniture in her possession that Clay gave her credit."

In the case sub judice, as shown above, the furniture was purchased after the house was rented. Mrs. Kinsey gave a check for the initial payment. That this payment was to be "cash" is shown by the contract, and it is evident that the seller accepted the check as cash, and when the bank refused payment of the check because of "insufficient funds," there was really no payment, and the title to the property did not pass to Mrs. Kinsey. "A bank check tendered in payment is not such until paid." Sims v. Bolton, 138 Ga. 73 (1), 74 S. E. 770; Civil Code 1910, § 4314. In the case just cited the Supreme Court held that—

"The transaction of purchase and sale being a cash one, the title to the mule did not pass from the vendor to the vendee on the failure of the bank to cash the check."

[3] Under the ruling in that case it was not necessary for the vendor to formally tender to the vendee the contract and the unpaid check, as they were introduced in evidence upon the trial of the case.

Under the facts of this case, title to the furniture never passed into Mrs. Kinsey; it was not subject to the distress warrant, and the certiorari was properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. THOMPSON. (No. 12687.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 9, 1922. Rehearing Denied
March 20, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Railroads \S 382(6)—Presence on track in helpless condition did not defeat recovery, where evidence to excuse presence was not insufficient.

The evidence by which the plaintiff sought to account for and excuse the presence of the deceased, lying helpless on the track, at the time and place of the homicide, although weak and circumstantial, is not absolutely insufficient, and was coupled with testimony tending to negative the fact of his being then and there intoxicated. It follows that the ruling in Parish v. Western & Atlantic Railroad Co., 102 Ga. 285, 291, 29 S. E. 715, 40 L. R. A. 364, does not control the case adversely to the plaintiff. It was held in that case that the presence of the injured person, lying at night on the track of the defendant company in a helpless and exposed position, amounted prima facie to a failure on her part to exercise ordinary care, that such negligence, except in a case where the injury is willful or wanton, would prima facie operate to prevent a recovery, and that the burden of explaining and excusing presence in such a helpless and exposed position rests upon the plaintiff, and not upon the defendant. See, in this connection, Fairburn & Atlanta Ry. & Electric Co. v. Latham, 26 Ga. App. 698, 107 S. E. 88.

2. Railroads \S 391(4) — Contributory negligence does not defeat recovery for wanton injury.

Under the law of this case as formerly adjudicated by this court, and under the evidence disclosed by the record, the verdict for the plaintiff could not be disturbed, even though it were to be held that the jury were unauthorized to find that the plaintiff had succeeded in satisfactorily explaining and excusing the presence and helpless condition of the deceased on the track at the time and place of the homicide. "While it is true that a railroad track is a place of danger, and one who trespasses thereon is guilty of negligence, yet when the company discovers this negligence, or has reason to anticipate it, and if such a trespasser is on the track in an apparently helpless condition, ordinary diligence requires the use of every means then available to avoid running down and killing him; and if, under such circumstances, this degree of care is not exercised, and death results, the killing will be deemed in law to have been willful and wanton. Contributory negligence on the part even of a trespasser will not defeat a recovery for a wanton homicide." Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 25 Ga. App. 715 (2), 104 S. E. 515. See, also, Crawford v. Southern Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 870, 873, 33 S. E. 826; Southern Ry. Co. v. Chatman, 124 Ga. 1026 (5), 53 S. E. 692, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283, 4 Ann. Cas. 675. There was some evidence sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the defendant was then under the duty of anticipating the presence of the deceased, and was actually aware of his presence in such helpless and exposed condition in time to have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care in the performance of the special duty thus arising and owing to him. Tice v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 25 Ga. App. 346 (1), 103 S. E. 262, and cases cited.

CITY OF TALLAPOOSA v. BROCK.BROCK v. CITY OF TALLAPOOSA.

(Nos. 12671, 12689.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 9, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \S 655(2)—Bill of exceptions presented in time not dismissed though held by the judge for verification.

The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions must be denied. The certificate of the judge shows that within the time prescribed by law it was presented to him by counsel for plaintiff in error, to be certified by him in terms of the law, and that it was held by him for certain purposes of verification, without any fault on the part of plaintiff in error or its counsel. The mere fact that the judge in his certificate may have specified an additional part of the record as material to a clear understanding of the case would not operate to change the rule.

2. Limitation of actions \S 130(10)—Suit held to toll statute though demurrable for failure to show presentation of claim.

Although, under the ruling made by the Supreme Court in City of Tallapoosa v. Brock, 138 Ga. 622, 75 S. E. 644, the former suit was demurrable, in that it failed in its attempt to set forth a substantial compliance with the provisions of section 910 of Civil Code 1910, relative to a presentation of the claim to the governing authorities of the municipality for adjustment, it nevertheless was not such an absolute nullity that it could not operate to toll the statute of limitations so as to allow the bringing of another suit within six months after its dismissal. The statute embodied in section 4381, providing for the renewal of suits, is remedial in its nature, and is intended to afford relief from such mistakes, accidents, and errors. Lamb v. Howard, 150 Ga. 12, 102 S. E. 436.

3. New trial ¶35—Admission of evidence of death in action for injuries not ground for new trial when limited.

In an action for damages for physical injuries, pain, and suffering, the admission of evidence showing that the injuries set forth in the petition subsequently resulted in the death of the plaintiff's intestate does not afford ground for a new trial where the judge, in admitting such testimony, plainly and expressly limited its probative value "as a circumstance showing the extent of the injuries," and in his charge repeated the substance of such ruling, and plainly instructed the jury that they could not consider the death as an element of damage. Chattanooga R. Co. v. Liddell, 85 Ga. 482, 11 S. E. 853, 21 Am. St. Rep. 169.

4. Appeal and error ¶1033(5)—Trial ¶255(13)—Failure to define "patent defects" and "latent defects" not reversible error; instruction referring to patent and latent defects, but giving only rule of liability for latent defects, held favorable to defendant.

The failure of the judge to define or elaborate without request, the meaning of the terms "patent defects" and "latent defects" does not authorize the setting aside of the verdict and judgment. The meaning which the law attaches to those terms is in accordance with their ordinary acceptation, and the sense in which they were employed was such as to make clear the idea intended to be conveyed. The charge, while making reference to both patent and latent defects, was especially favorable to the defendant, in that it treated the alleged defect, if a defect, as latent in character, and amounted to such an instruction, since the only rule of liability given was such as might arise out of the negligence of defendant on account of latent defects, of which, under the evidence, the jury might determine the defendant had actual notice, or ought in the exercise of ordinary care to have discovered and remedied. City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785 (9), 48 S. E. 818.

5. Appeal and error ¶1033(5)—Instruction as to nonliability if injury resulted from accident held not confusing or prejudicial to defendant.

The excerpt from the charge complained of in the eighth ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, set forth below, does not constitute reversible error, as being calculated to confuse the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. It was given for the defendant's benefit, and the only ordinary and reasonable meaning of the excerpt is that the city would not be liable if it had exercised ordinary and reasonable care, even though the plaintiff might be likewise blameless.

6. Sufficiency of evidence and excessiveness of damages.

Under the evidence disclosed by the record, it is not possible to hold either that the verdict was without any evidence to support it or that the amount of the verdict ($6,500) is excessive.

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by W. B. Brock, administrator, against the City of Tallapoosa. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff brings cross-bill of exceptions. Cross-bill dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

M. J. Head and Lloyd Thomas, both of Tallapoosa, for plaintiff in error.

Edwards & Edwards, of Buchanan, and U. G. Brock and H. J. McBride, both of Tallapoosa, for defendant in error.

JENKINS, J. This was a suit for personal injuries, pain, and suffering, alleged to have been occasioned plaintiff on account of the failure of defendant to comply with its duty of keeping and maintaining a portion of one of its sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition. The petition alleges that a section of a certain wooden ventilator covering a portion of defendant's sidewalk, on which petitioner was standing, gave way, causing her to fall through, thereby inflicting serious personal injuries. The evidence shows that the wooden grate had been constructed and had been in use for a long number of years prior to the date of the injury. The suit is alleged to be in renewal of a former suit for the same cause of action, and is maintained by her administratrix, the original plaintiff having died subsequent to its institution. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $6,500, and exception is taken to the overruling of the defendant's motion for new trial. The grounds of the motion relied upon in the briefs filed by counsel for plaintiff in error are:

[1, 2] (1) The cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, and the suit cannot be maintained in renewal of the former suit, for the reason that the former suit was void on account of its failure to show a substantial compliance by the plaintiff with the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 910, relative to a presentation of the claim to the municipal authorities for adjustment (grounds 3, 13, 18, 19, and 20 of the amendment to the motion). Exception is taken to the failure of the court to state to the jury the defendant's contention in this respect (ground 4).

[3] (2) The court erred in admitting, over defendant's objection, the testimony of certain physicians, to the effect that the death of the plaintiff resulted from the injuries set forth by the plaintiff in her petition (grounds 1, 2, and 19 of the amendment to the motion).

This evidence was admitted, expressly, only "as a circumstance showing the extent of the injuries," and in his charge the judge again plainly so limited its probative value, and expressly confined the measure of damages to the pain and suffering sued for.

[4] (3) The charge was confusing in that it referred to the rule governing liability for both patent and latent defects, without defining these terms, and because there was no evidence to authorize any reference to a patent defect (ground 7).

[5] (4) The court erred in charging the jury as follows:

"If this damage resulted from a mere accident for which nobody would be liable after the city has exercised ordinary and reasonable care and diligence as I have charged you, then the city would not be liable."

This charge, it is alleged, was error, for the reason that it was confusing, and tended to mislead the jury; that, if damage resulted from a mere accident, for which nobody would be liable, the defendant, as a matter of course, would not be liable under any circumstances; that this charge "might well lead to the conclusion in the minds of the jury that for a mere accident the defendant would be liable, unless it had previously exercised all the care and diligence required in case of injury not to the result of the mere accident" (ground 8).

[6] (5) The verdict is not supported by the evidence, and is excessive (grounds 15, 16, and 17). The special contention in this respect is that the evidence showed that the sidewalk was not being used by the plaintiff at the time and place of the injury in an ordinary manner and by herself alone, but that the plaintiff and three other persons were standing upon the grate at the time the defective bar gave way; that the evidence showed that this particular portion of the sidewalk and grate was not in fact constructed by the city, but by the owner of the abutting property, and that the grate was used to ventilate the basement of the building; that the evidence showed that all of the grate bars were sound except the one which gave way, and that the unsound and decayed portion of the defective bar was confined to the under side, and that such rotten condition was not apparent to ordinary inspection, and that the city had neither actual nor constructive notice of the defect; that "the only evidence of actual notice is the testimony of J. A. Davis, a former marshal, that he notified Stephens N. Noble, a councilman, that the grate was in a bad condition, without specifying in what respect the condition was bad, or giving any further notice to the mayor or other councilman, or the owner, and without taking any steps whatever to have the defects removed. This was during the year 1906, and it so happened that Mr. Noble was the only member of council for that year who was dead at the time the evidence of said Davis was taken.

It is not necessary to add anything further to the headnotes.

Judgment affirmed on the main bill of exceptions; cross-bill dismissed.

(132 Va. 681)

JACOBS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Homicide \S 13—Law implies malice from killing with pistol.

Even though the defendant and deceased had been on good terms prior to the shooting, the law implies malice from the fact that defendant had armed himself with a pistol "for use if anything should happen," and that with the pistol he shot deceased in the back and killed him.

2. Homicide \S 43—Provocation does not reduce killing to manslaughter unless it arouses passion.

Provocation will not reduce homicide from murder to manslaughter unless it has so aroused the anger of the assailant as temporarily to affect his reason and self-control, since both provocation and passion must exist.

3. Homicide \S 282—Whether provocation produces passion sufficient to reduce offense to manslaughter is jury question.

When there is room upon the evidence for difference of opinion, the question whether the alleged provocation sufficiently operated on the mind of accused to rebut the presumption of malice arising from the killing, and reduced the grade of the offense to manslaughter, is one for the jury to determine, under instructions from the court as to the nature and extent of provocation.

4. Homicide \S 11, 22(2)—Test of murder is malice; deliberation and premeditation elements of first degree murder.

The test of murder is malice, and every malicious killing is murder in the first or second degree; the former if deliberate and premeditated, and the latter if not.

5. Homicide \S 146, 147, 152—Malice, but not deliberation and premeditation, presumed; every homicide is prima facie second degree murder.

There is a prima facie presumption of malice arising from the mere fact of a homicide, but no presumption of deliberation and premeditation, and every homicide is prima facie murder in the second degree, and the burden is on the accused to reduce and on the commonwealth to elevate the grade of the offense.

6. Criminal law §557—Defendant may rely on extenuations shown by prosecution's evidence.

Defendant may rely upon circumstances of extenuation appearing in the evidence produced by the commonwealth to the same extent as if they were brought out in his evidence in reducing the grade of the homicide.

7. Homicide §269—Existence of malice is generally question for jury.

Whether malice exists in a particular case is usually a question for a jury, and the significance of the words and conduct addresses itself peculiarly to the consideration of the jury; but in perfectly clear cases the evidence may be held not to show malice though the jury found its existence.

8. Homicide §271—Sufficiency of provocation is question of law, and its existence a question of fact.

The sufficiency of provocation to excuse or extenuate murder is generally a question of law, but whether such provocation exists in a particular case is a question of fact.

9. Homicide §48 — Assault on defendant's mother is sufficient provocation to reduce killing to manslaughter.

An assault by deceased upon defendant's mother, in which he struck her with his fist and knocked her down, is ample provocation for passion on the part of accused which would reduce the killing from murder to manslaughter.

10. Homicide §239—Evidence held to sustain finding killing was malicious, and not caused by provocation.

In a prosecution for homicide, committed after deceased had knocked defendant's mother down, where defendant did not claim to have acted in sudden passion produced by the assault on his mother, but falsely testified deceased was threatening his mother with a pistol, and that he fired the first shot to defend his mother, and the other shots to defend himself, evidence held to sustain a finding that the provocation did not produce passion on the part of defendant.

Burks, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Northampton County.

James Jacobs was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he brings error. Affirmed.

J. Brooks Mapp, of Keller, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. Upon an indictment for the murder of Harvey Palmer, James Jacobs was found guilty and sentenced to a term of 10 years in the penitentiary.

The defendant excepted to the giving of a number of instructions, and also to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, but the sole contention presented to us is that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a conviction of murder in the second degree.

All of the parties involved were colored persons. The killing occurred about 2 o'clock on the morning of August 5, 1920, at the home of the prisoner and his mother, Ellen Carpenter. Beginning earlier in the night there was a drinking and dancing party at the house, those present having been invited there by Ellen Carpenter and her niece, Leah Douglas. Some 30 or 40 guests were in attendance. Ellen Carpenter sold food from one table and Leah Douglas sold whisky from another table in the same room. This was a continuous performance, and the drinking was rather general. Both the prisoner and the deceased were among those who bought and drank whisky. Most of the guests had left the place before the shooting occurred. Some trouble arose between the deceased and his wife. Ellen Carpenter interceded in an apparently inoffensive way, saying to Harvey Palmer, the deceased, "Your wife has not done anything, let her alone," whereupon he struck Ellen Carpenter with his fist, knocking her down, and Leah Douglas exclaimed, "Lord, he has killed Aunt Ellen."

There is an irreconcilable conflict of evidence in some of the particulars of the shooting. Upon the testimony of the commonwealth the jury might have believed, and from their verdict evidently did believe, that before Jacobs opened fire Ellen Carpenter was getting up on her feet; that Buck Palmer, without making further demonstration or exhibiting any weapon, had turned and was walking away, having gone a distance variously estimated by the witnesses at from a few feet to five or six yards, when Jacobs stepped forward and said, "Buck, you are not going to hit my mother like that," at the same time firing three shots at Palmer, two of which took effect. It is conceded that the deceased was shot in the back.

On the other hand, according to the testimony of the prisoner and some of his witnesses, the deceased was leaning over the prostrate form of Ellen Carpenter, with a pistol in his hand, and the prisoner, after exclaiming, "Don't you kill my mother," fired the first time for the purpose of defending his mother, and continued to fire because he feared for his own life. He does not claim to have acted in hot blood, or under the propulsion of a sudden fit of anger.

The conflict in the evidence was, of course, to be settled by the jury, and it is pertinent to observe that the testimony for the defense was materially discredited in several respects, particularly by the admitted fact that the witnesses for the accused who had previously testified at the coroner's inquest on the day after the shooting did not at that time say anything about a pistol in the hands of the deceased.

[1] It is true that the prisoner and the deceased seem to have been on good terms prior to the shooting, but the prisoner was armed with a pistol which he said he put in his pocket that night "for use if anything should happen." With this deadly weapon he shot the deceased in the back and killed him. From these facts the law implies malice, and the jury was warranted in finding that he did not sustain the burden of rebutting the presumption thus arising against him.

[2, 3] In the brief of counsel for the defendant it is insisted that he acted under great provocation. It must be remembered, however, that provocation cannot be relied upon to reduce murder in the second degree to manslaughter unless the provocation has so aroused the anger of the assailant as to temporarily affect his reason and self-control. The authorities for this familiar proposition are cited hereafter. In this case the defendant does not claim to have been thus affected. He expressly negatives any such defense by claiming that he shot the deceased because he thought that action necessary to save his mother and himself, and he does not in his testimony rely upon provocation as a defense. When there is room upon the evidence for a difference of opinion, the question whether the alleged provocation sufficiently operated on the mind of the accused to repel the presumption of malice arising from the killing, and thus reduce the grade of the offense, is one for the jury to determine. In every such case it is the province of the court to instruct the jury as to the nature and extent of the provocation sufficient to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter, but it is the province of the jury to determine whether, under the facts of the particular case, the alleged provocation rather than a malicious purpose actuated the perpetrator.

[4-6] The test of murder is malice. Every malicious killing is murder, either in the first or second degree—the former if deliberate and premeditated, and the latter if not. Furthermore, there is a prima facie presumption of malice arising from the mere fact of a homicide, but there is no presumption therefrom of deliberation and premeditation. This is merely another way of stating the familiar rule of law that every homicide is prima facie murder in the second degree, and that the burden is on the accused to reduce, and on the commonwealth to elevate, the grade of the offense. Hill's Case, 2 Grat. (43 Va.) 595; Potts' Case, 113 Va. 732, 73 S. E. 470; Bryan's Case, 131 Va. —, 109 S. E. 477, 478. This, of course, does not mean that the accused may not rely upon circumstances of extenuation appearing in the evidence produced by the commonwealth with the same effect as if brought out in evidence offered by him.

[7] Whether malice exists in a particular case is usually a question for the jury. We have held in perfectly clear cases that the evidence was not sufficient to show malice even where the jury had found to the contrary, but malice is a subjective condition of mind, discoverable only by words and conduct, and the significance of the words and conduct of an accused person, wherever there can be doubt about such significance, addresses itself peculiarly to the consideration of the jury.

"The determination of the grade or degree of homicide is a question for the jury." 2 Michie on Homicide, p. 1388.

[8] "The sufficiency of the provocation to excuse or extenuate murder is generally a question of law. Whether such provocation existed in the particular case is a question of fact." 21 Cyc. 1028, and cases cited in note 67.

In State v. Morrison, 49 W. Va. 211, 38 S. E. 481, the defendant, Morrison, upon a sudden quarrel struck the deceased with a heavy stick, and claimed to have acted in self-defense. He was indicted for murder and convicted of that offense in the second degree. The defendant and a man named Dempsey were the only eyewitnesses to the tragedy. They both testified, and their testimony, which was practically identical, constituted the only evidence upon which the state could rely for a conviction. There was room under this evidence to claim that the accused acted in hot blood, and still, as stated above, he relied upon self-defense. The opinion of the court by Judge Poffenbarger dealt with the law of the case in both aspects as follows:

"The instrument with which the wound was inflicted is proved by the result to have been a deadly weapon. It was for the jury to say whether the act was done in the heat of blood, and therefore amounted in law to manslaughter only, or in self-defense, and justifiable. They have failed to find, as matters of fact, that the act was done as the result of passion and heat of blood, or in self-defense, but on the contrary, that the blow was administered with a deadly weapon, and with the intent, at least, to do severe bodily harm, and from it death resulted; and there is evidence to support each of these findings. From these facts the jury might rightfully infer that the act was done maliciously."

See, also, Bryan's Case, supra; State v. Dillard, 59 W. Va. 197, 53 S. E. 117; Maher v. People, 10 Mich. 212, 81 Am. Dec. 781; State v. Hoyt, 13 Minn. 132, 147 (Gil. 125) Seals v. State, 3 Bart. (Tenn.) 459.

In the light of the foregoing principles and authorities, it would seem that the language of the West Virginia Supreme Court in State v. Beatty, 51 W. Va. 232, 41 S. E. 434, is peculiarly applicable here. In that case the accused was convicted of murder in the first degree, and one of the questions involved was whether the killing was the result of passion. The court said:

"If, in any case the finding of a jury on this peculiar question might be set aside by the court, it cannot be done in this instance."

[8] To be sure there was ample evidence of provocation in the case at bar. The deceased had just made a violent attack on the mother of the accused, and that was legal ground for anger on his part (Davis' Crim. Law, 84). But we must not lose sight of the fact that the effect of the provocation on the defendant's state of mind was the material and decisive question.

In Davis' Crim. Law, p. 84, it is said:

"The indulgence shown to the first transport of passion, in these cases, is plainly a condescension to the frailty of human nature, to the temporary madness which, while the frenzy lasts, renders the man deaf to the voice of reason. And therefore the provocation which extenuates in the case of homicide must be something which the man is conscious of, which he feels and resents at the instant the act which he would extenuate is committed; not what time or accident may afterwards bring to light. Passion arising from sufficient provocation is evidence of the absence of malice, and reduces homicide to manslaughter; but passion without provocation, or provocation without passion, is not entitled to this indulgence; and where there are both provocation and passion, the provocation must be sufficient."

In Minor's Synopsis of Criminal Law, p. 46, it is said that the provocation, in order to extenuate homicide to manslaughter, must be such as to have—

"actually excited strong passion, so as to have temporarily unsettled the reason. Adequate provocation and ungovernable passion must concur"—citing several Virginia cases.

In Read's Case, 22 Grat. (63 Va.) 924, 938, it is said:

"It is not only necessary in such a case and for such an effect that a reasonable provocation should be received, but it is also necessary that the provocation should have the effect of producing sudden passion under the influence of which alone the offense is committed. It must be a sudden transport of passion, which the law calls furor brevis. If a person on receiving the gravest provocation, is unmoved by passion, but wantonly and willfully and wickedly kills his adversary otherwise than in self-defense, he is guilty of murder. The law mitigates the offense to manslaughter, only as an indulgence to the infirmity of human nature. Provocation without passion or passion without provocation will not do; both must concur to reduce the offense to the grade of manslaughter."

In State v. Ellis, 74 Mo. at page 218, the court said:

"It is to be observed, also, that it is the state of mind, when produced by lawful provocation and not the provocation itself, which makes the killing manslaughter, for, although there may have been what is denominated lawful provocation, yet if such provocation did not, in fact, produce the state of mind above described * * * the killing would be murder at common law, and, under our statute, murder in the first degree."

[10] No doubt the accused was mad, but anger and malice frequently accompany each other, and neither he nor any other witness in this case testified to any overpowering passion on his part. On the contrary, his effort and the effort of his mother and his cousin, Leah Douglas, were to prove that he shot purely to save his mother's life and his own. This was the only theory which his testimony and that of his witnesses seemed designed to establish. The jury evidently believed, as they might well have done under the evidence, that the assault on his mother had ended, and that he was in no danger. Their verdict concluded that question. The case, therefore, comes to us as one in which, at an unlawful drinking and dancing party, sponsored by his mother, the accused armed himself with a pistol for use "if anything should happen," and used it to kill a man on a false pretext. The evidence which he himself adduced, if it does not preclude the question entirely, certainly brought about such a state of facts as that the question of whether the provocation produced the state of mind necessary to extenuate the killing to manslaughter clearly rested with the jury.

For the reasons stated we are of opinion that the judgment complained of was free from error, and that the same must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BURKS, J. (dissenting). I concur with the majority of the court in saying that the plaintiff in error did not kill the deceased in order to protect his mother, or in self-defense. His whole tale on this subject is a fabrication, whether from fright or other cause I do not know. He had not previously given an account of the shooting to any one else. He did not kill to protect his mother, but because he was mad, and justly and lawfully mad. Just as he came around the corner of the house he saw the deceased knock his mother down, and heard the exclamation, "Lord, he has killed aunt Ellen." He rushed up at once and began firing at such close range that there were powder marks on the clothing of the deceased. It is wholly immaterial that the deceased was retreating. It is inconceivable to me that there was no passion arising from the transaction. In such case—

"passion arising from sufficient provocation is evidence of the absence of malice, and reduces homicide to manslaughter." Davis Cr. Law, 84.

This is one of the few cases in which the law recognizes the frailty of human nature and reduces the crime from murder to manslaughter.

The author just cited says at pages 83, 84:

"The provocation that will be allowed to extenuate the guilt of voluntary homicide must be of a nature which, regarding man as he is, might reasonably and naturally have excited his passions beyond the power of his reason to control his conduct. Thus, if a man were to find another in the act of adultery with his wife, and thereupon to kill him in the first transport of passion, he would only be guilty of manslaughter, and that of the lowest degree, because there could not be a greater provocation. Thus, also, any assault made with violence or circumstances of indignity upon a man's person, as by pulling him by the nose, if it be resented immediately by the death of the aggressor, and it appears that the party acted upon the heat of blood upon that provocation, will reduce the crime to manslaughter. * * *

"The indulgence shown in the first transport of passion, in these cases, is plainly a condescension to the frailty of human nature, to the temporary madness which, while the frenzy lasts, renders the man deaf to the voice of reason. And therefore the provocation which extenuates in the case of homicide must be something which the man is conscious of, which he feels and resents at the instant the act which he would extenuate is committed; not what time or accident may afterwards bring to light. Passion arising from sufficient provocation is evidence of malice, and reduces homicide to manslaughter; but passion without provocation, or provocation without passion, is not entitled to this indulgence; and where there are both provocation and passion, the provocation must be sufficient. * * *

"Between persons nearly connected by natural or civil ties, the law admits the force of a provocation given to one to be felt by the other. Therefore homicide committed by the husband or wife, parent or child, master or servant, of the person injured, is entitled to the same construction as if such injury had been done to the person resenting it."

Under the circumstances, I think the offense of the plaintiff in error was manslaughter, and not murder.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

WILLIAMS v. MARINE BANK OF NORFOLK.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 5, 1922.)

1. Contracts \S 189—Promise to "settle" contract with bank held not unconditional promise to pay contract price.

A promise by an owner, indorsed on a contract for the construction of a house, to "settle the above contract" with a bank, which was a transfer by the contractor of the owner's obligation, does not unconditionally promise to pay the full amount of the contract price to the bank, since the meaning of the word "settle" depends on the context in which it is used and upon the subject-matter and the circumstances surrounding its use.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Settle—Settlement.]

2. Contracts \S 189—Owner held required to pay bank, on assignment of contract, only amount due contractor after potential liens were discharged.

A promise, indorsed by an owner on the contract for construction of buildings, to settle the contract with the bank which advanced money to the contractor, requires the owner to pay the bank only the amount due contractor after potential liens against the building which the contractor could not, under Code 1904, \S 2482a, defeat by any transfer or assignment.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the Marine Bank of Norfolk against H. A. Williams, Jr. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Thos. H. Willcox, Jas. G. Martin, and H. B. G. Galt, all of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.
Tomlin & Maupin, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. The Marine Bank recovered a judgment against Williams for $5,120 in an action of assumpsit on a contract dated August 25, 1917. The errors relied on for the reversal are the refusal of the trial court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence, and errors committed in granting and refusing instructions.

On August 25, 1917, Bundick & Carner, building contractors, entered into a written contract with Williams to furnish the materials and build for him two bungalows in the city of Norfolk for the price of $5,120, which amount Williams agreed to pay as follows: $200 when the houses were framed and raised, $200 when the roofs were on, and the balance in 10 days after the completion of the buildings. No time was fixed for the completion. This contract was signed C. A. Bundick and C. V. Carner, contractors and H. A. Williams, owner. Immediately under the signature is the following made at the request of the contractors: "Will settle above contract with the Marine Bank. H. A. Williams, Jr." This was a transfer by the contractors of Williams' obligation to pay. The buildings were completed and delivered to Williams, and accepted by him some time in the summer of 1918. The exact date at which the above addition was made to the contract does not appear, but it appears to have been made in the summer of 1918, on the request of Bundick & Carner. These contractors were building a number of houses for Williams, as well as for other persons, and had a line of credit with the Marine Bank for probably something like $18,000, and they asked Williams to make the addition above mentioned for the purpose of raising money at the Marine Bank. They then took the contract to the bank and executed a collateral note, using the contract as collateral, and borrowed money to pay lumber bills and pay rolls for the Williams houses and others. The amount of this collateral note does not appear, but the lumber bills amounted to $1,200 or $1,500. The collateral note was in the usual form and made the collateral bound, not only for that note, but for any other indebtedness of Bundick & Carner to the bank. Williams states that he did not know of the physical delivery of this contract to the bank until about four months before he testified in this case, and, when brought to his attention by the president of the bank, stated that he had forgotten all about it. The president of the bank states that he brought it to Williams' attention about a year previous but we do not regard that point as material. On June 28, 1918, Williams negotiated a loan on these houses to be secured by a deed of trust thereon. In order to get this loan he had to pay off the bills for the materials that went into the houses, and he accordingly paid them, amounting to a large sum. During the progress of the work, he also executed notes to Bundick & Carner for different amounts, which showed that they were executed on account of these houses, and which were discounted by the Marine Bank. Williams claims that he was compelled to pay for the material and labor used about the construction of his houses, in order to perfect the title to his property, as they were potential liens thereon, and that he should have credit therefor on the contract aforesaid; while the bank contends that it was a tripartite agreement between the parties and that he is not entitled to any such credit. It is not distinctly stated in the record, but the case seems to have proceeded on the concession that Bundick & Carner are insolvent, and that at the time Williams paid for the materials the parties could have docketed liens therefor, but had not done so.

after the completion of the buildings, and this was manifestly the view of the trial court. If it erred in this respect, then the verdict should have been set aside as contrary to the law and evidence. The word "settle" is one of equivocal meaning, depending not only on the context in which it is used, but upon the subject-matter and the facts and circumstances surrounding its use. In the case at bar, the bank had not only the imputed knowledge of the right of materialmen to docket liens for supplies, but, from its location in a populous city where such liens were frequently acquired, it must have had actual knowledge of the existence of such right, and the inability of a general contractor by transfer or assignment to defeat it except by paying the bills. Williams, too, who was building many houses at this time, could hardly have been supposed to have been willing to contract to pay unconditionally the full price for building the houses, and leave unpaid all bills for labor, materials, and supplies, with the right on the part of these persons to docket liens on his property. Furthermore, the parties themselves do not appear to have put that construction on the contract. When the contract was delivered to the bank, it was not accepted by it as a direct and unconditional contract to pay to it $5,120, but was taken as collateral, and, instead of relying upon the promise to settle in the addendum, it took a collateral note, with the promise therein contained, and the contract as collateral. The president of the bank testified that the bank "took it as usual on a collateral note." It is manifest also that the bank expected some adjustment of differences between the builders and Williams, some ascertainment and agreement as to the amount due by Williams, some "settlement" between them before there would be anything coming to the bank. This appears from the testimony of the president of the bank, who was the only witness examined by it on this feature of the case. He testified, amongst other things, as follows:

"Q. Did you ever make any inquiries about the houses?

"A. I asked them (Bundick & Carner) constantly how Williams was getting along. They were building houses for him and could not get a settlement, and, as far as I knew, they couldn't get a settlement at all, they tell me. * * *

"Q. What advice did you receive regarding the completion of the houses?

"A. That they had not been settled for. * * *

"Q. How much money did you give them?

"A. * * * I knew they were building a great many houses for Mr. Williams, and as they got through building those houses they were getting pay rolls every day, and I couldn't tell what they were building, and I asked them from time to time what about these houses that the contracts had not been settled, so I considered that as a contract of Williams to pay me for whatever went into his houses. * * *

"Q. Did you advance any money that went into these two houses, so far as you know?

"A. Paid for that lumber that went into these two houses, as far as I know. As far as I know, I thought it all went into those houses; but it seems it didn't. That contract was regarded by the bank officials as security for $5,100 in Williams' houses. It said, 'I promise to settle with the bank,' and it means they are going to come to the bank and settle, and I understand he has not finished settlement with them yet."

[2] While Williams admits he had forgotten his promise to settle with the bank, that could not subject him to any greater liability than if he had not forgotten it. It seems fairly clear that the promise to "settle," as used in this case, was not a promise to pay the contract price for building the houses. The president of the bank does not so claim in his testimony. On the contrary, he "considered that as a contract of Williams to pay me for whatever went into his houses." We think that the fair deduction from the testimony is that the addendum to the contract was not given or received as an unconditional promise to pay to the Marine Bank $5,120 ten days after the completion of the buildings, but was an undertaking on the part of Williams to make his settlement with the Marine Bank instead of with Bundick & Carner, and that whatever was coming to the latter should be paid to the bank, that the addendum to the contract was never given as an original undertaking to pay any greater sum, that the bills for materials that went into the houses were potential liens on such houses, which the general contractors could not defeat by any transfer or assignment (Code 1904, § 2482a), and that as against the bank Williams had the right to pay them off and use them as credits in his settlement under the contract, although no liens had at the time of payment of said bills been docketed against Williams' property. The instructions given by the trial court were to the contrary and were, therefore, erroneous, and resulted in an erroneous verdict which will be set aside as plainly contrary to the law and evidence. We cannot tell from the record what judgment would be right and just. The verdict of the jury will therefore be set aside and the judgment of the trial court reversed, and the case be remanded to the trial court for a new trial to be had in conformity to the views hereinbefore expressed.

Reversed.

WILSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Disorderly house ⇨17—Evidence sustaining conviction for keeping house of prostitution.

In a prosecution for keeping a house of prostitution, evidence held to sustain conviction.

2. Disorderly house ⇨17—Proof of general reputation held unnecessary.

In a prosecution under Code 1887, § 3790 (Code 1919, § 4548), prohibiting any person to keep "a house of ill fame resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness," the commonwealth need not prove the general reputation of the place as a bawdyhouse, but it is sufficient to show that it was such in fact.

3. Disorderly house ⇨2—"Bawdyhouse" and "house of ill fame" synonymous.

"Bawdyhouse" and a "house of ill fame," as used in law, are convertible and synonymous terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bawdyhouse; House of Ill Fame.]

4. Disorderly house ⇨16—Proof of general reputation inadmissible in absence of statute.

In prosecution for keeping a bawdyhouse, proof of the general reputation of the house is inadmissible unless expressly made so by statute.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Norfolk.

Bessie Wilson was convicted of keeping a house of ill fame, and she appeals. Affirmed.

James S. Barron, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazille, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. The defendant, Bessie Wilson, was convicted in the police court of the city of Norfolk on a warrant charging her with keeping "a house of ill fame resorted to for the purpose of prostitution and lewdness." On appeal to the corporation court she was tried by a jury and again found guilty, and the sentence pronounced upon her by that court is before us for review.

The only ground upon which we are asked to interfere with the sentence is that the evidence did not warrant the verdict.

The statute upon which this prosecution rests is as follows:

"If any person keep a house of ill fame, resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness, he shall be confined in jail not exceeding one year and fined not exceeding two hundred dollars; and, in a prosecution for this offense, the general character of such house may be proved." Code 1887, § 8790; Code 1919, § 4548.

The contention of the defendant is that to sustain a conviction under the foregoing statute the commonwealth must prove two things: First, that the house in question was in fact a bawdyhouse or brothel; and, second, that it had a general reputation as such.

With respect to the first proposition embraced in this contention, we shall not go into the details of the evidence. The defendant introduced no testimony. The commonwealth's evidence as to the actual character of the house consists of the testimony of four men who appear to have visited the place at the instance of the police to investigate conditions and procure evidence. They did not while there personally witness or personally indulge in any unlawful acts, but they evidently allowed the defendant and another woman who was in the house at the time to suppose that they had come for immoral purposes. There were some unimportant and circumstantial conflicts in the testimony of these four men, but otherwise their credibility was not shaken or even questioned, except by the effect of such caution as should be used in giving credence to evidence obtained under representations which are not true. Their respective narratives are reasonable and consistent, and are in a measure corroborated by the entries in a book or register kept by the defendant and introduced at the trial. Moreover, the question of the weight and credibility of their evidence was one for the jury to determine.

[1] Attaching to the evidence of the commonwealth the weight which, under familiar rules, it must be accorded in this court, there is no room to doubt that the defendant was keeping a house resorted to for purposes of lewdness and prostitution. The arrangement of the house and its furnishings, the large number of alleged guests whose names appeared on her register, the method of keeping the register, together with her explanation of that method, the overtures which she and the other woman in the house made to the four men who testified, her declarations and admissions to them as to her ability to procure more women if desired, and her assurances that there would be no danger of detection, made it perfectly plain that she was then, and had been for some time prior thereto, plying her nefarious trade on a large scale.

[2] The second proposition, namely, that it was incumbent upon the commonwealth to prove that the general reputation of the place was that of a bawdyhouse, appears to be the one mainly relied upon by the defendant, but in our opinion is without merit.

It is, of course, in a sense true that a house of ill fame is a house with a bad name, but the offense aimed at by the statute is the keeping of such a house, and not the establishment of its bad reputation.

Some apparent support for the defendant's contention that there must be proof of both the character and the reputation of the house may be found in the fact that the statute, after using the expression "house of ill fame," also adds the words "resorted to for purposes of prostitution or lewdness." It seems plausible to argue that it was not necessary to use both of these expressions if the fame of the house was not a material part of the offense. This argument, however, is satisfactorily repelled both by the language of the statute as a whole, and by the prevailing current of authority. The concluding sentence of the statute expressly provides that, "in a prosecution for this offense, the general character of such house may be proved." The words "general character" are evidently used here in the sense of "general reputation," because it is universally held that before there can be a conviction for keeping a house of ill fame there must be proof that it was in fact a house of bad character; that is to say, a house actually resorted to for immoral purposes. The language of the statute, quoted last above, was manifestly intended to make it clear that the general reputation of the house could be used as evidence tending to show that it was in fact a bad house. This being true, it necessarily follows that the gist of the offense aimed at was the keeping of such a house, and not its reputation. The right to prove its reputation as tending to establish the offense was inserted for the express purpose of allowing the commonwealth to use evidence which otherwise might be excluded as immaterial and irrelevant, on the ground that the fame of the place is no part of the offense. This is illustrated by the case of State v. Plant, infra, wherein it was held that proof of general reputation was irrelevant and improper.

There is no Virginia case in point, and the decisions elsewhere are not entirely in accord upon the question under consideration. This may be, and doubtless is, in some measure due to varying provisions of the several statutes on the subject. We are satisfied, however, that when proper effect is given to the language of the Virginia statute, the decided weight of both authority and reason supports the view we have adopted.

[3] It seems clear that if our statute had used the term "bawdyhouse" instead of "house of ill fame," there would be no room whatever to contend that the fame or reputation of the house must be proved in order to sustain the conviction. If this proposition be conceded, as we think it must be, it follows that there is no force at all in the defendant's position. "Bawdyhouse" and "house of ill fame," as used in law, are convertible and synonymous terms. 1 Bouv Law Dict. 193; Webster's New International Dictionary, 194; Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. 119, 618; State v. Lee, 80 Iowa, 75, 45 N. W. 545, 20 Am. St. Rep. 401, 405; Henson v. State, 62 Md. 231, 50 Am. Rep. 204; State v. Smith, 29 Minn. 193, 12 N. W. 524; State v. Boardman, 64 Me. 523; Cotton v. City of Atlanta, 10 Ga. App. 397, 73 S. E. 683, 684.

In State v. Lee, supra, the court was dealing with a statute similar to ours. The act prohibited was the keeping of "a house of ill fame resorted to for the purposes of prostitution or lewdness" (Code 1873, § 4013), and the statute permitted proof of the general reputation of the place "for the purpose of establishing the character of the house" (Laws 1884, c. 142, § 4). Referring to the latter provision, the court said:

"In our opinion, this section was not designed to add to the ingredients of the crime, by requiring that the house should be generally reputed to be a house of ill fame, but to enlarge the means of proving its true character."

And the court specifically held that a conviction under the Iowa statute did not require proof that the house was in fact one of bad repute.

In State v. Smith, supra, the court said:

"The term 'house of ill fame' is no doubt a mere synonym for 'bawdyhouse,' having no reference to the fame of the place, but denoting the fact."

The gist of the offense is the keeping of the house for purposes of prostitution and lewdness, and not its reputation.

In 18 Corpus Juris, pp. 1241, 1242, § 24(e), it is said:

"Ordinarily it is not necessary that a house or place have the reputation of being a bawdyhouse or house of ill fame to make it such a house. But some statutes prohibiting the keeping of a house of ill fame have been construed as requiring the house to have the reputation of a house of ill fame. Where the statute merely declares that evidence of the reputation of the house is admissible, it does not thereby make its reputation an element of the offense of keeping such a house."

In State v. Plant, 67 Vt. 454, 458, 32 Atl. 237, 48 Am. St. Rep. 821, 823, 824, the statute involved appears to have been exactly like ours, except that it did not provide for proof of the general reputation of the house. In that case the court said:

"The statute makes penal the keeping of 'a house of ill fame, resorted to for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness.' In some of the states similar statutes are construed to require proof that the house had an ill fame in order to convict. That construction has prevailed to some extent in this state at nisi prius; but we regard it as illogical and unsound. It amounts to saying that however bad the house is in point of fact, it is no offense under the statute to keep it if it has not an ill fame. * * * The words 'ill fame' are used in the statute to give name and character to the house, and do not refer to its reputation. Both at common law and in common parlance, the words 'house of ill fame' mean a house resorted to for the purpose of prostitution. * * * The gist of the offense is the keeping of the house, irrespective of its fame. The statute aims at the fact, not the fame; at the substance, not the shadow.

"It follows, therefore, ill fame of the house not being an element of the offense, that it was not only unnecessary to prove it, but that evidence of it was irrelevant to any issue involved, for all the cases hold that the character of the house cannot be shown by proof of its reputation; for that purpose the testimony is mere hearsay.

"It is unnecessary to refer at length to the authorities on this question. We think the weight of judicial opinion sustains the view we take. A pretty full discussion of the subject will be found in Henson v. State, 62 Md. 231, 50 Am. Rep. 204, and note, and in State v. Lee, 80 Iowa, 75, 20 Am. St. Rep. 401. * * *

See, also, State v. Foley, 45 N. H. 466; Toney v. State, 60 Ala. 97; State v. Brunell, 29 Wis. 435.

The cases of Cadwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 472, State v. Blakesley, 38 Conn. 523, 524, People v. Gastro, 75 Mich. 127, 42 N. W. 938, People v. Pinkerton, 79 Mich. 110, 44 N. W. 180, Drake v. State, 14 Neb. 535, 17 N. W. 117, and King v. State, 17 Fla. 183, 191, cited and relied on by the defendant, support the general proposition that there must be proof of the bad name of the place to sustain a conviction upon the charge of keeping a house of ill fame. These cases are out of line with the current of authority, and, moreover, would undoubtedly have been decided differently if the statutes in Connecticut, Michigan, Nebraska and Florida had provided, as ours does, for the proof of general reputation for the purpose of establishing the charge.

[4] Indeed, according to much respectable authority, no proof of general reputation of the house is admissible at all on such a charge unless expressly made so by statute. State v. Plant, supra; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) p. 532, and cases cited in note 1.

We find no error in the judgment complained of, and it must be affirmed.

GORDON METAL CO. v. KINGAN & CO., Limited, et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)Railroads ⇨ 81.—“Reserve” from operation of deed held equivalent to exception.

A railway company's deed was made subject to reservation of rights belonging to a railway company for maintenance of its tracks upon the land and the rights growing out of an agreement with a manufacturer for use of the side track passing through the land conveyed. Held, under Code 1919, §§ 5149, 5512, that by use of “reserve” the grantor intended to withhold something from the grantee, and by reserving from the operation of the deed the rights of the railway and lessee the grantor intended to except from the deed and retain to itself the rights in relation to the contracts.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the Gordon Metal Company against Kingan & Co., Limited, and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

S. A. Anderson and Smith & Gordon, all of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

Geo. Bryan, A. W. Patterson, and Thos. B. Gay, all of Richmond, for defendants in error.

PRENTIS, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer, wherein the Gordon Metal Company was plaintiff and Kingan & Co., Limited, and the Southern Railway Company were the defendants. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants.

The facts are that by agreement under seal, dated July 1, 1891, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, hereinafter called the C. & O., granted to Kingan & Co., Limited, hereinafter called Kingan, the right to construct or cause to be constructed a railroad track across the basin (or upper dock) of the C. & O. in the city of Richmond, beginning on the line of Fourteenth street and running by a curved line to Dock street, opposite to the end of Fifteenth street. This agreement requires such track to be maintained at all times in good order by the grantee, Kingan, and the space occupied thereby to be only such as is reasonably necessary for its construction and maintenance. It also provides for the occupancy and use of the land occupied by the track for 10 years, subject to certain qualifications which it is unnecessary at present to recite, and thereafter until one year's notice in writing from either party to the other, and Kingan agreed to remove the track upon receiving notice from the C. & O. so to do. It was further agreed that Kingan might arrange with the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company to construct, maintain, and operate the track, which company was bound to observe all of the requirements of the agreement binding on Kingan, and Kingan agreed that, all things being equal, it would route its business for Virginia points, and such business as went south via Virginia Junction by the C. & O. Pursuant to such agreement Kingan and the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company entered into an agreement under seal dated July 31, 1891, whereby the railway company undertook to construct and operate such track and agreed to observe all of the covenants of Kingan under the agreement of July 1, 1891, with the C. & O. Pursuant to these agreements the curved track or switch across the property of the C. & O. was constructed, and since has been used as a private siding for the accommodation of Kingan's business, and occasionally, apparently by consent, for other business. The Southern Railway Company, hereinafter called the Southern, became the successor in title of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company as to the rights here involved. By the thirteenth clause of an agreement of November 2, 1890, between the Southern and the C. & O., the fourth clause of the agreement of July 1, 1891, between the C. & O. and Kingan as to the routing of the Kingan business was modified in the interest of the Southern.

By deed dated January 25, 1905, the C. & O. conveyed to the plaintiff (Gordon Metal Company) a certain parcel of land in the city, which included a portion of the strip occupied by this Kingan side track, the remaining portion of such strip being the land of the Richmond Properties Corporation, which side track was continuous, and crossed in a curved line both the property of the plaintiff and that of the Richmond Properties Corporation. This deed of January 25, 1905, to the plaintiff conveyed the land with general warranty, and this language was used therein:

“Together with all the right, title, interest and estate of the said the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company in and to the said land up to the east line of Fourteenth street, subject, however, to all the rights which the Mayo Bridge & Land Company, or other owner, may have acquired in the strip of land on the northwest corner of said lot above described, now occupied by a row of small brick buildings.”

The C. & O. also covenanted that it had the right to convey, and for further assurance of the land. The deed also contains this language:

“And whereas the said the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company has sold the property hereinbefore described to the party of the second part, the said property being no longer necessary or expedient to be retained for use in connection with said railway, and now requires, in accordance with the resolution hereinabove recited, the trustees in the several deeds of trust or mortgage hereinafter referred to to release said property from the lien thereof in order to give perfect title to the purchaser. * * * It is further expressly understood, covenanted and agreed that this conveyance of the said piece or parcel of land is made subject to the following terms and conditions, to-wit:

"1. The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company reserves from the operation of this deed all the existing rights of whatever nature belonging to the Southern Railway Company for the maintenance and operation of its track, or tracks, and structures upon, along, or near the piece or parcel of land hereinbefore described.

"2. The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company further reserves from the operation of this deed all the rights of the Kingan Company, growing out of or in any way connected with the agreement bearing date the 1st day of July, 1891, and recorded in the chancery court of the city of Richmond, Virginia, clerk's office, in Deed Book 144C, page 359, for the maintenance, use and operation of the side track which passes through the northwestern portion of the lot hereby conveyed, and this conveyance is made subject to all the rights of entry and transit of Kingan & Co. and of the Southern Railway Company for the maintenance, use and operation of said side track and trestles connected therewith."

On October 10, 1913, the plaintiff notified the defendants to remove the said side track from its land on or before November 15, 1914, thus giving one year's notice in accordance with the agreement of July 1, 1891, between the C. & O. and Kingan. The defendants refused to vacate the premises, and thereupon this action was instituted to recover possession of the strip of land occupied by the said side track.

The court construing the contract gave an instruction requiring the jury to find for the defendants, and refused an instruction presenting the contrary view of the plaintiff.

Several errors are assigned, but it is perfectly apparent that the decisive question which was presented to the trial court, and now to be determined here, is whether or not the deed of January 25, 1905, conveying the property, should be construed to grant to the Gordon Metal Company the right to terminate the agreement of July 1, 1891, between the C. & O. and Kingan, under which the side track was constructed and has ever since been operated. Whether the trial court erred in the admission or rejection of evidence has become entirely immaterial, for, whether admitted or rejected, the merits of the controversy are fully presented and must be determined by a construction of this conveyance of the C. & O. to the plaintiff.

The case has been thoroughly argued and many propositions of law relating to the construction of written instruments have been presented and supported by authorities.

These well-established doctrines are all helpful, but no one of them appears to us to be conclusive, for all discussions of the questions involved lead back to the provisions of the conveyance, which must determine this doubtful controversy.

It certainly cannot be doubted, and this is urged by the plaintiff, that the grantee in a deed for land conveyed without any words of limitation usually succeeds to every right of his grantor therein, or, as expressed in Virginia statutes, such a deed passes the fee simple or whole estate or interest which the grantor had power to dispose of, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the conveyance. Code 1919, § 5149. It is likewise true that, under Code 1919, § 5512:

"A grantee or assignee of any land let to lease, or of the reversion thereof, and his heirs, personal representative or assigns shall enjoy against the lessee, his personal representative or assigns, the like advantage, by action or entry for any forfeiture, or by action upon any covenant or promise in the lease, which the grantor, assignor, or lessor, or his heirs, might have enjoyed."

So that this deed passes every right of the C. & O. to the plaintiff unless a contrary intention is expressed therein. It is necessary, therefore, to consider and determine whether or not there was any intention on the part of the C. & O. to reserve its right to terminate the Kingan agreement, and to withhold from the plaintiff any such right, which was sufficiently expressed to be effective.

Reverting, then, to the clause which we have quoted from the conveyance to the plaintiff, and bearing in mind the then existing facts, we observe that it was not necessary in that instrument for the protection of the existing rights of Kingan and the Southern to refer to the switch or side track. These had been fully secured, defined, and limited by the agreement of July 1, 1891, which had been duly recorded. It is also observed that, if the intention of the conveyance was simply to give the plaintiff specific notice of Kingan's contract, this precaution was taken, as is shown by the concluding language in the clause under scrutiny, namely, that—

"This conveyance is made subject to all of the rights of entry and transit of Kingan & Co. and of the Southern Railway Company for the maintenance, use and operation of the said side track and trestle connected therewith."

When it is borne in mind that this deed was drawn and accepted under the advice of counsel, it seems to us at least suggestive that the grantor was not content merely to use language clearly sufficient to convey the property subject only to Kingan's rights. There are other words in the same clause of the conveyance, the meaning of which we must determine, for it is fundamental that, in construing written instruments, all the language used must be considered and its true meaning determined if possible. What, then, is the significance of this other language—that is, that “the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company further reserves from the operation of this deed all the rights of the Kingan Company, growing out of or in any way connected with the agreement bearing date the first day of July, 1891, for the maintenance, use and operation of the side track”—and why was it necessary to enumerate this among the conditions for the performance of which the plaintiff was required to sign the deed and expressly covenant that the conveyance was subject to certain terms and conditions? It is frequently helpful in determining the meaning of obscure and doubtful language to consider the surrounding circumstances and the probable motives of the parties, and, pursuing this inquiry, we find that the side track here involved is a small part of a continuous track leading from the lines of the Southern, and while the C. & O. has now no property interest either in the track or in the land upon which it is located, it was and is substantially interested in the business of Kingan & Co. They are large shippers over the lines of the C. & O. from the west into the city of Richmond, who receive and dispatch substantial quantities of freight, whereby the business and revenues of the C. & O. are greatly augmented. This supplies a motive to the C. & O. in making the conveyance, for desiring the continued maintenance of the side track, because to destroy it will injuriously affect its own business. It is possible that this injury might be only temporary, but this does not change the fact that the C. & O. had a substantial motive for desiring the continued operation of this side track.

Then consider the use of the word “reserve.” While that is an appropriate word when given its obvious and technical meaning to indicate that the grantor (C. & O.) intended thereby to withhold something from the grantee (plaintiff), it is quite inappropriate and unnecessary if intended merely to preserve the existing rights of Kingan which were already otherwise fully safeguarded. Then observe further that the C. & O. reserves something “from the operation” of the deed. That language seems to us to be most significant, for, if the deed was intended not to operate in favor of the plaintiffs upon the rights of Kingan & Co. under the side track agreement, it leaves those rights just as they existed before the conveyance was made, and, while the land upon which the track is located belongs to the plaintiff, it has no right to terminate an agreement upon which its deed was not to operate. To reserve from the operation of a deed appears to be the equivalent of excepting therefrom and retaining in the grantor some right, title, or interest in the subject-matter which, but for such reservation, would pass thereunder to the grantee. To hold otherwise here would be to ignore the language used, to attach no significance thereto, and to construe the conveyance just as if it had been omitted. Express notice of the existing contract with Kingan was thereby given to the grantee, and by excepting it from the operation of the deed the right to change the existing status by the independent action of the grantee was apparently withheld.

We do not feel that any further elaboration of the question presented can clarify its manifest obscurities and difficulties, but, giving it our best thought and attention, our judgment accords with that of the learned judge of the trial court.

JENKINS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law \S 308, 351 (3), 552 (1)—Flight raises no presumption of guilt, but may be considered by jury and given such weight as they deem proper.

In a prosecution for maiming, where the evidence showed that immediately after the shooting accused ran away to another county, an instruction that the flight of a person after the commission of a crime raised a presumption of guilt was incorrect, as such flight is merely evidence, tending to show guilt, to be considered by the jury, and given such weight as they deem proper in connection with other facts and circumstances.

2. Criminal law \S 741 (6), 782 (4)—Defendant's explanation of flight a jury question; and court should instruct on manner of weighing evidence of flight.

In a prosecution for maiming, defendant was entitled to have the jury pass on his explanation as to why he fled to another county, and it was important that the jury be properly instructed as to the manner in which they should consider and weigh evidence of flight.

3. Criminal law \S 823 (9)—Error in instruction on flight as presumption of guilt not cured by instruction on presumption of innocence.

Error in an instruction that flight raised a presumption of guilt was not cured by an instruction that accused is presumed innocent till proven guilty.

Error to Circuit Court, Rappahannock County.

Ray Jenkins was convicted under the maiming statute (Code 1919, § 4402), and he brings error. Reversed.

Grimsley & Miller, of Culpeper, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. Upon indictment under what is known as the maiming statute (Code, § 4402) the defendant, Ray Jenkins, was found guilty of feloniously shooting one Walter G. Miller, and sentenced to a term in the penitentiary. Thereupon the case was brought here by writ of error.

[1, 2] The shooting occurred on a dark night in the village of Washington, Rappahannock county. There were several persons in the immediate vicinity from which the shot was fired, and the evidence is in serious conflict as to the identity of the person who did the shooting. The defendant, after testifying that he did not even have a pistol on that occasion, stated that his brother did the shooting, and he was corroborated by the latter in that statement. After Miller was shot the defendant and his brother ran away to Madison county, where after a month or more they were arrested and brought thence to Rappahannock county, where the defendant was tried. He explains his flight by saying that he was afraid he would be arrested for shooting in town. This explanation does not seem very satisfactory in view of the fact that he denied having done any shooting, and yet, when it is recalled that he and his brother were together at the time, it does not seem unreasonable that he should have feared that they would both be involved in a charge of shooting on the street. At any rate, he was entitled to have the jury pass upon his explanation. The pertinency of this comment upon his flight and his explanation thereof will be apparent when we consider, as we shall proceed to do, the first assignment of error, which is based upon the allegation that the court erred in giving commonwealth's instruction No. 2 as follows:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that the flight of a person after the commission of a crime raises a presumption of guilt; and if they believe from the evidence that the prisoner, Ray Jenkins, did immediately after the shooting of Walter G. Miller, flee from the place where said Miller was shot to the county of Madison, Va., you may take this fact into consideration in determining his guilt or innocence, which question of flight you may consider, together with all the other facts and circumstances introduced in determining the guilt or innocence of the prisoner."

This instruction starts out with an erroneous proposition of law, namely, "that the flight of a person after the commission of a crime raises a presumption of guilt." So far as we have found, and so far as the Attorney General's office appears to have found, the only authority for this proposition appears in certain of the Missouri cases, wherein it is held that the flight from a charge of crime raises a presumption of guilt which may be rebutted and overcome by proof that the flight was occasioned by other causes than consciousness of guilt. See State v. King, 78 Mo. 555; State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 542, 583, 5 S. W. 257, 330; State v. Lewkowitz, 265 Mo. 613, 178 S. W. 58.

The better doctrine, supported by the clear weight of authority, is that such flight as is described in the instruction under review does not measure up to the standard of presumptive evidence of guilt, but is merely evidence tending to show guilt, to be considered by the jury and given such weight as they deem proper in connection with other pertinent and material facts and circumstances in the case. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d. Ed.) 1265; 12 Cyc. 395; 9 R. C. L. p. 192, § 188; Hickory v. U. S., 160 U. S. 408, 16 Sup. Ct. 327, 40 L. Ed. 474; Alberty v. United States, 162 U. S. 499, 16 Sup. Ct. 864, 40 L. Ed. 1051; Wharton's Crim. Ev. §§ 750, 751.

Upon principle it would seem manifest that the only safe and just rule upon the subject is as last above announced, because the circumstances surrounding the flight of a person after the commission of a crime will vary greatly in individual cases. In this connection, the language of Mr. Justice Brown, in Alberty v. U. S., supra, is in point. He said:

"While there is no objection to that part of the charge which permits the jury to take into consideration the defendant's flight from the country as evidence bearing upon the question of his guilt, it is not universally true that a man, who is conscious that he has done a wrong, 'will pursue a certain course not in harmony with the conduct of a man who is conscious of having done an act which is innocent, right and proper;' since it is a matter of common knowledge that men who are entirely innocent do sometimes fly from the scene of a crime through fear of being apprehended as the guilty parties, or from an unwillingness to appear as witnesses. Nor is it true as an accepted axiom of criminal law that 'the wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are as bold as a lion.' Innocent men sometimes hesitate to confront a jury—not necessarily because they fear that the jury will not protect them, but because they do not wish their names to appear in connection with criminal acts, are humiliated at being obliged to incur the popular odium of an arrest and trial, or because they do not wish to be put to the annoyance or expense of defending themselves. The criticism to be made upon this charge is, that it lays too much stress upon the fact of flight, and allows the jury to infer that this fact alone is sufficient to create a presumption of guilt."

The precise question before us in this case does not appear to have been passed upon in this state, this court not having heretofore had occasion to decide whether the flight of a person accused of crime, or in a position rendering it likely that he would be accused thereof, could be said to raise a presumption of his guilt. There are, however, cases in which this court has held that proof of the flight is a circumstance to be considered by the jury. Williams v. Commonwealth, 85 Va. 607, 613, 8 S. E. 470; Anderson v. Commonwealth, 100 Va. 860, 863, 42 S. E. 865. In the latter case Judge Cardwell, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"When a suspected person attempts to escape or evade a threatened prosecution, it may be argued that he does so from consciousness of guilt; and though the inference is by no means strong enough by itself to warrant a conviction, yet it may become one of a series of circumstances from which guilt may be inferred. An attempt to escape or evade prosecution is not to be regarded as a part of the res gestae, but only as a circumstance to be considered by the jury along with other facts and circumstances tending to establish the guilt of the accused. The nearer, however, to the commission of the crime committed, the more cogent would be the circumstance that the suspected person attempted to escape, or to evade prosecution, but it should be cautiously considered, because it may be attributable to a number of other reasons, than consciousness of guilt"—citing Wharton's Crim. Ev., secs. 750, 751. (Italics added.)

It was error to tell the jury, as was done in instruction No. 2, that the flight of a person after the commission of a crime "raises a presumption of guilt"; and we are unable to say upon evidence before us that this error did not operate to the prejudice of the prisoner. The case is not one in which we can say that no other verdict could have been properly found. It is not for us to say that the defendant was, or that he was not, guilty as charged, but the case was peculiarly one to be settled by the verdict of the jury upon correct instructions. Two persons other than the prisoner had the opportunity to do the shooting with which he was charged. He testified that one of these, his brother Hubert Jenkins, fired the shots, and the latter corroborated him in this statement. The other person, one Willie Sisk, was arrested just after the shooting, and at that time denied any knowledge as to who did it, but later on, while in jail and after being admonished by the attorney for the commonwealth that the Jenkins brothers, if arrested, "might frame up the shooting on him," changed his story, and said, as he afterwards testified in court, that he was present and knew that Ray Jenkins did the shooting.

In this state of the evidence it was of especial importance to the prisoner that the jury should be properly instructed as to the manner in which they should consider and weigh the evidence of his flight.

It is true that the instruction complained of, after announcing the erroneous proposition pointed out above, proceeded to tell the jury that they might take the fact of the defendant's flight "into consideration in determining his guilt or innocence, * * * together with all the other facts or circumstances introduced." But how were they likely to consider and weigh this fact? They had just been plainly told that the fact itself raised a presumption of guilt, and this meant that they could convict on that presumption alone. Was it not highly probable that they would be misled by the opening sentence of the instruction into the conclusion that they must approach the consideration of this feature of the evidence with the understanding that the burden was on the defendant to show that he was not guilty? If they followed the first part of the instruction, they could hardly have come to any other conclusion. While we do not consider the error in the instruction under review as glaring or as plainly prejudicial to the prisoner as the instruction which was condemned by the United States Supreme Court in Hickory v. U. S., supra, one of the comments of the court in that case appears to us to be pertinent here. After pointing out that the instruction in that case erroneously told the jury "that flight raised a presumption of guilt," the court said:

"It is true, the charge thus given was apparently afterwards qualified by the statement that the jury had a right to take the fact of flight into consideration, but these words did not correct the illegal charge already given. Indeed, taking the instruction that flight created a legal presumption of guilt with the qualifying words subsequently used, they were both equivalent to saying to the jury that they were, in considering the facts, to give them the weight which, as a matter of law, the court declared they were entitled to have; that is, as creating a legal presumption so well settled as to amount virtually to a conclusive proof of guilt."

[3] There was an instruction given in the instant case at the request of the defendant by which the jury were told that he was presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, and that the presumption of innocence followed him throughout the case, but we do not think this instruction, any more than the qualification or modification appearing in the commonwealth's instruction No. 2, cured the error in the latter. There was either a conflict between the two propositions as thus announced to the jury, or such a confusion of the rules of evidence as would tend to mislead them. If they gave full force and effect to the instruction which told them that the defendant was presumed to be innocent until proved guilty, they would still be confronted with the other proposition, as announced by instruction No. 2, that he was in fact proved guilty by proof of his flight, and they might thus have felt bound to find that the presumption of his guilt arising from his flight was sufficient to overcome the presumption of his innocence announced in the defendant's instruction.

Being of opinion that there was error in the commonwealth's instruction No. 2, and being unable to say that such error was without prejudice to the defendant, the judgment complained of must be reversed.

As the case must be sent back to the circuit court for a new trial, we do not pass on the assignment of error questioning the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict.

There were several other assignments, but they involve questions which are not likely to arise at the next trial, and therefore need not be considered.

Reversed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

LEHIGH PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. VIRGINIA S. S. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 183—Bill of particulars and notice of motion for judgment on claim for breach of shipping contract held sufficient.

In a steamship company's action for breach of a contract for the shipment of 40,000 barrels of cement, a bill of particulars claiming the balance due for transporting the whole 40,000 barrels, and, without waiving plaintiff's right to rely thereon, giving, in additional items, the loss suffered while the steamship was lying idle waiting for shipments, the salaries paid during such time, the reasonable return on the investment, the approximate loss by diverting the steamship from a different route, the reasonable amount of profits on earnings on the contract, and the pecuniary value of the portion of the contract not performed, held sufficiently full, especially where the notice of motion for judgment contained a detailed statement of the claim.

2. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 183—Remedy for insufficient bill of particulars is to move to reject evidence of matters not sufficiently described.

If a bill of particulars was insufficient, defendant might have moved to reject any evidence offered by plaintiff touching any matter not described in the notice of its motion for judgment or other pleading so plainly as to give notice of its character.

3. Shipping \Leftrightarrow 108—Evidence of damages from idleness while waiting for goods to be transported admissible in action for breach of contract.

In an action for breach of contract for the shipment of 40,000 barrels of cement to be unloaded by the carrier, a steamship company, from the cars as they arrived at the shipping point and carried to destination, by failing to furnish the full quantity, where it appeared that after the steamship company was informed that there were still six to ten cars to be shipped, it received only a few shipments during a period of several months, evidence of the damages suffered by reason of the idleness of its boat was admissible.

4. Shipping \Leftrightarrow 108—Performance of shipping contract not excused because contract on which cement was being used was canceled by government.

Where a contract for the shipment of 40,000 barrels of cement by steamship was unqualified, nonperformance by the shipper was not excused because the government canceled the contract on which the consignee was using the cement as permitted by its contract with the consignee.

5. Shipping \Leftrightarrow 104—Jury authorized to find company taking up contract, making payments, etc., assumed obligations of party to contract.

Where a cement company contracted to ship cement by steamship, and another cement company, acting through its own officers, took up the contract, conducted correspondence in its own name, made payments under the contract at the rates therein stated, and when a claim was made for a breach failed to suggest that the liability was that of the contracting company, the jury was warranted in finding that it had assumed its obligations.

6. Shipping \Leftrightarrow 108—Government's cancellation of contract held not frustration of adventure excusing further performance of contract for transportation of cement purchased by contractor.

Where one selling cement to a government contractor contracted for the transportation of the cement with a steamship company which had no knowledge of the terms of the contract between the government and the contractor, the continuance of the work on the government contract to final completion was not the basis and implied condition on which the liability of the parties to the shipping contract rested, and the government's cancellation of the contract did not cause such impossibility of performance or frustration of adventure as excused further performance.

7. Shipping \Leftrightarrow 108—Verdict for breach of contract for shipment of cement not excessive.

In a steamship company's action for breach of contract to ship 40,000 barrels of cement, where it saved only about $307 in fuel and oil by keeping its boat idle while waiting for the cement, and the jury deducted over $1,100 from the amount of its claim, damages held not excessive.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the Virginia Steamship Company against the Lehigh Portland Cement Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The action was instituted by filing notice of a motion for judgment which stated the items of plaintiff's claim, the credits thereon, and the balance due as follows:

Aug. 11, 1919—To amount of cement contracted to be hauled from West Point, Va., to Yorktown, Va., aggregating 40,000 barrels, weighing 15,300,000 pounds, at 16½ cents per cwt.....	$25,460 00
Aug. 11, 1919—By amount paid for carrying 25,025 barrels cement weighing 9,839,500 pounds, at 16½ cents per cwt.....	16,564 91
Aug. 11, 1919—By balance of contract price of residue of quantity of cement contracted to be carried, but not hauled, through your default, amounting to 12,975 barrels, weighing 5,810,500 pounds, at the rate of 16½ cents per cwt., now due us	8,895 09
To amount brought forward.....	$ 8,895 00
Nov. 4, 1919—By amount paid for carrying 3,196 bags of cement since August 11, 1919	541 09
Nov. 4, 1919—By amount of balance now due on above contract.....	$ 8,354 00

In response to an order requiring plaintiff to file the particulars of its claim it filed the following bill of particulars:

(1) The entire amount sued for, to wit, $8,354.00 and interest is due to the plaintiff by the defendant, because it is balance due the plaintiff by the defendant, which the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff for carrying 40,000 barrels of cement, as set forth in the notice of motion for judgment.

Without waiving its right to rely on the above solely and to claim the above amount for the breach of the contract and promise to pay, as aforesaid, in addition thereto the plaintiff sets forth the following items as also constituting its damage and loss:

(2) Loss suffered by the plaintiff by having its steamship lying idle 80 days awaiting orders and shipment from the defendant at $200 per day.

(3) Salaries paid officers and crew and employees generally and other expenses of the company during the time the plaintiff was ready and willing and awaiting to carry the cement per orders of the defendant company and defendant failed to ship, $8,500.

Reasonable return on investment in equipment of plaintiff that was held idle awaiting orders from the defendant as per contract, $2,000.

(5) Approximate loss of the plaintiff by diverting its steamship from the usual schedule from West Point to Pointer's, Va., and loss of freight and trade it otherwise would have carried, all of which was done in order to be in readiness to carry the cement the defendant contracted to ship, $8,500.

(6) Reasonable amount of profits or earnings on contract had plaintiff been allowed to fulfill its part, $8,354.

(7) Plaintiff claims the pecuniary value of that portion of the contract it was not permitted to perform through the default of the defendant was $8,354, with interest, and it has suffered loss to that extent.

Frank T. Sutton, Jr., of Richmond, for defendant in error.

WEST, J. The Virginia Steamship Company, hereafter called steamship company, recovered a judgment against the Lehigh Portland Cement Company for $7,854, and the defendant thereupon obtained a writ of error.

The material facts and circumstances out of which the litigation arose are substantially as follows:

On the 24th day of June, 1918, the United States government entered into a contract with F. W. Mark Construction Company, Inc., to construct and complete at the fuel oil station at Yorktown, Va., 12 reinforced concrete oil reservoirs, which contract contained a clause permitting the United States government to curtail the amount of the work under the contract, under certain conditions. The F. W. Mark Construction Company entered into a contract with the Virginia Portland Cement Company (the predecessor of the Lehigh Portland Cement Company) to furnish it cement for this work. The steamship company had no knowledge of the terms of this contract. Afterwards the Virginia Portland Cement Company made a contract with the steamship company to transport the cement from West Point, Va., to Yorktown, Va., the contract providing that the steamship company should unload the cars at West Point, and that the cement company was to furnish labor to unload the steamer at Yorktown.

The original contract was for the carriage of 10,000 barrels of cement, which was afterwards increased to 40,000 barrels. The freight charge agreed upon was 16½ cents per 100 pounds. This contract appears from certain letters and telegrams filed as evidence in the case, being consummated in the letter from the steamship company to the Virginia Portland Cement Company, dated November 5, 1918.

The Virginia Portland Cement Company began the shipment of cement, and the steamship company transported it, in accordance with the terms of the contract.

In its letter of April 22, 1919, the Lehigh Portland Cement Company, acting through the same officers who had acted for the Virginia Portland Cement Company, approved a bill in favor of the steamship company and promised to send check, and from that time on made the shipments of the cement and conducted all correspondence in regard to the movement of the cement and payments for same, and made payments as per the original contract.

These officers acted for the Lehigh Portland Cement Company without explanation, and in July, 1919, wrote that they were unable to advise as to when balance of cement would be shipped, but stated that Mark Construction Company would need six to ten cars more to complete the work.

The steamship company wrote the Lehigh Portland Cement Company on July 28, 1919, that it had been informed that the shipment of the residue of the 40,000 barrels of cement to Yorktown would be discontinued, and advised it that under the terms of the contract with its predecessor (Virginia Portland Cement Company) it had a definite contract to transport 40,000 barrels, and informing the cement company that the steamship company would make claim against the Lehigh Portland Cement Company for freight on approximately 15,000 barrels which had not been hauled, 26,924 barrels having been hauled and paid for. The Lehigh Portland Cement Company replied to this letter, but did not deny that it was the successor of the Virginia Portland Cement Company, nor deny its liability for freight on the cement which had not been shipped. Its letter stated that it was not fully informed as to the suspension of the construction at Yorktown and would go into the situation in detail and communicate with the steamship company further at an early date. They failed to communicate further with the steamship company until November 4, 1919, and the last few shipments were scattered through a period of about four months—from July to November, 1919.

The assignments of error involve the action of the trial court in overruling the defendant's motion to reject the plaintiff's bill of particulars of its claim, in giving and refusing instructions, in refusing to strike out certain evidence, and in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury and award a new trial on the ground of misdirection of the jury by the court, that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and that the damages are excessive.

[1, 2] Not only is the bill of particulars full enough to give the defendant notice of every item of its claim, but the notice of motion also contained a detailed statement of the plaintiff's claim. If the bill of particulars was insufficient, the defendant might have moved the court to reject any evidence offered by the steamship company touching any matter not described in its notice or other pleading so plainly as to give notice of its character. This it did not do, and it is manifest that the matters in evidence were plainly described in the notice of motion and bill of particulars. There is no merit in this assignment of error.

[3] At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant moved the court to strike out all of the evidence in the cause, which was introduced over its objection tending to show any damage to the plaintiff by reason of the idleness of its boat subsequent to July 25, 1919. The action of the court in overruling this motion is also excepted to by the plaintiff in error.

The contract between the cement company and the steamship company required the latter to transport 40,000 barrels of cement from West Point to Yorktown and to unload same from the cars and take it to Yorktown whenever the shipments arrived at West Point. The Lehigh Portland Cement Company had informed the steamship company that there were six to ten more cars to come forward to complete the work, and these shipments were scattered through a period of several months. The steamship company was kept in idleness waiting for the arrival of these cars. If the cement company did not desire the steamship company to hold itself in readiness to unload and transport to Yorktown the remaining six to ten cars of cement immediately upon its arrival at West Point, in accordance with the terms of the contract, it should have so informed the steamship company, and discharged it from liability under the contract. We think the evidence was clearly admissible.

The defendant's main ground of defense is that—

"Even though the contract were entered into and assumed by the Lehigh Portland Cement Company, the parties, and particularly the defendant, were, prior to the institution of this suit, and are now discharged and excused from performance of the same, because of supervening impossibility of performance and frustration of adventure by the act of the United States government in canceling its contract with the F. W. Mark Construction Company and prohibiting the further construction of the government work thereunder."

This contention will be disposed of in the consideration of the remaining assignments of error.

The following instructions were granted by the court:

"1. (Requested by the plaintiff.) "The court instructs the jury that the letters and telegrams that passed between the plaintiff and the Virginia Portland Cement Company mentioned in the notice of motion and introduced in evidence contain the terms of the original contract involved in this suit; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the Lehigh Portland Cement Company afterwards succeeded to the business of the Virginia Portland Cement Company and continued to ship cement to the F. W. Mark Construction Company at Yorktown to be carried by the plaintiff company from West Point, Va., to Yorktown, Va., and continued to pay the plaintiff for carrying the same at the same rates the Virginia Portland Cement Company had been paying, and treated said contract as its own, then the defendant company by such conduct undertook and assumed the obligations originally undertaken by the Virginia Portland Cement Company and became bound thereby to ship the full amount and pay the price therefor agreed upon in the original contract."

2. (Requested by plaintiff, amended by court.) "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff made a contract with the Virginia Portland Cement Company to carry for said company 40,000 barrels of cement at 16½ cents per cwt., as charged in the notice of motion, and that subsequently the Lehigh Portland Cement Company succeeded to the business of the Virginia Portland Cement Company and assumed and undertook to carry out said contract, but failed to carry out its part by delivering to the plaintiff for carriage by it all of the 40,000 barrels of cement and failed to pay the plaintiff all of the sum of \$25,460, the entire contract price for such carriage, then the defendant was guilty of a violation of its contract to the extent it did not deliver to the plaintiff for carriage from West Point, Va., to Yorktown, Va., the 40,000 barrels of cement, and to the extent that it did not pay therefor at the rate of 16 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents per cwt. Provided you shall further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was always ready and willing to perform its part of said contract."

3. (Requested by plaintiff, amended by court.) "The court instructs the jury that, should they believe from the evidence there was such a contract and breach thereof, causing damage as charged in the notice of motion for judgment in this cause, it nevertheless became incumbent upon the plaintiff to make reasonable efforts to minimize the damage done it by such breach. But this duty did not arise and become incumbent upon the plaintiff until notified by the defendant company or it was reliably informed from other reliable sources that it would not carry out its said contract, and, so long as the defendant company allowed the plaintiff to remain in doubt as to whether the defendant company would continue to ship cement as per its contract, there was no duty upon the plaintiff company to seek similar employment from other sources in order to minimize, unless you shall believe from the evidence that as a matter of fact the plaintiff from other reliable sources knew that the defendant would not carry out its contract."

4. (Requested by plaintiff.) "The court instructs the jury that there is no evidence in this case that either the government of the United States or the F. W. Mark Construction Company was a party to the contract; and, although the jury may believe from the evidence that the United States government canceled its contract with the F. W. Mark Construction Company, yet that fact did not release the defendant company from its contract made with the plaintiff."

5. (Requested by defendant.) "The court instructs the jury that the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff in this case to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the contract alleged by it, the alleged breach by the defendant, and to establish with reasonable certainty the amount of the damages actually suffered by it by reason of the alleged breach."

6. (Given by the court.) "The court instructs the jury that in case of breach of contract the broad general rule is that the party injured is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained by reason of the breach of contract; that this rule is subject to but two conditions: The damages must be such as may fairly be supposed to have entered into contemplation of the parties when they made the contract—that is, must be such as may naturally be expected to follow its violation—and they must be certain both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed.

"The court further instructs the jury, if they should find for the plaintiff in this case, the measure of damages is the value of the bargain to the plaintiff or the loss which the fulfillment would have prevented or which the breach has entailed. The intent of the law is to put the injured party so far as can be done by money in the same position as if the contract had been performed; therefore the measure of damages for the breach of such a contract as that sued upon in this case is the difference between the contract price remaining unpaid and the cost of delivery."

The following instructions were refused by the court:

"Certificate No. II.

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that at the time this contract was entered into both parties thereto assumed under all the circumstances and conditions then existing, as the basis of their agreement, even though not expressly provided in their contract, the continuance of the government work at Yorktown for which the cement was to be furnished, and that it may be fairly implied that both parties assumed that the performance of their contract was based upon the continued existence of this government work, and that this work was discontinued by the government without fault on the part of the defendant, then the court instructs the jury that there has been no breach of this contract for which the defendant is liable to the plaintiff and they should find for the defendant.

"Certificate No. III.

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the defendant in this case violated the contract existing between it and the plaintiff without excuse for so doing, as is explained in instruction No. —, they must find for the plaintiff, and that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price remaining unpaid, to wit, $8,354, and the cost the plaintiff would have been put to in performing the contract, and that in estimating this cost they must take into consideration the length of time it would have required the plaintiffs to haul the cement remaining undelivered under the terms of the contract, the costs and expenses of operating the boat during this time, including the salaries of officers, the wages of the crew, the cost of feeding the crew, fuel, sundry expenses, insurance, interest charges, loss, and damage and taxes, but in so doing the jury are instructed that they must apportion such expenses between the transportation of the unshipped cement and the other business done by the plaintiff during the said period.

"The court further instructs the jury that the evidence of the said costs and expenses during the period in which the plaintiff was engaged from September 1, 1918, to July 23, 1919, in hauling the cement delivered to it under the contract, may be considered by it in arriving at the plaintiff's costs and expenses in transporting the undelivered portion of the cement.

"Certificate No. IV.

"The court instructs the jury that, should they find for the plaintiff, then the measure of its damages is the difference between the contract price for carrying the cement remaining unpaid and the additional cost it would have been put to had it actually carried the cement, instead of lying at the wharf ready and waiting to carry, provided you shall believe from the evidence that such was the case."

In L. R. A. 1916F, at page 48, it is said:

"The rule appears to be that if one undertakes unconditionally to perform an act which is not inherently impossible, but merely requires the acquiescence or consent of a third party, or the performance of a preceding act by the latter, nonperformance is not ordinarily excused by the fact that it subsequently proves impossible for the promisor to comply with his contract, because of the refusal of the third party to give his consent or perform the act; in other words, the contract will not, merely from the fact that acquiescence in or performance of an act by a third party must precede compliance therewith, be construed as conditional upon such acquiescence or performance. Thus it has been held that one contracting to construct a canal on certain lands is not excused from performance by inability to obtain from the landowners the right to construct the canal on their lands."

"This is simply a case of the appellant's undertaking to do a perfectly lawful thing which he was unable to perform. Such contracts, in the absence of fraud, are enforceable. In 2 Parsons on Contracts, p. 673, it is said: 'If one, for a valid consideration, promises another to do that which is, in fact, impossible, but the promise is not obtained by actual or constructive fraud and is not on its face obviously impossible, there seems no reason why the promisor should not be held to pay damages for the breach of the contract; not, in fact, for not doing what cannot be done, but for undertaking and promising to do it. [Cases cited.] So, if it becomes impossible by contingencies which should have been foreseen and provided against in the contract, and still more, if they might have been prevented, the promisor should be held answerable. So, if the impossibility applies to the promisor personally, there being no natural impossibility in the thing, this will not be a sufficient excuse.' Such contracts, when fairly and honestly made, are enforceable."

In L. R. A. 1916F, 31, it is said:

"It is well settled, as a general rule, that if performance is rendered merely difficult or burdensome or unprofitable, the promisor is not excused; and the same is true generally if the impossibility is personal to the promisor, and does not inhere in the nature of the act to be performed. On the latter point, it was said in Oregon case [Reid v. Alaska Packing Co., 43 Or. 429]: 'It is no excuse for the non-performance of a contract that it is impossible for the obligor to fulfill it, if the performance be in its nature impossible. * * * There is a marked distinction, not to be overlooked in this connection, between a mere disability or inability of a party to perform a contract and the absolute and inherent impossibility of performance in the true sense. * * * Unless an act is inherently impossible within itself, a contract to do it is binding, although the performance may be improbable, or even impossible, to the promisor. To excuse performance, the impossibility must be simply more than merely a great inconvenience, hardship, or even impracticability."

See American Towing & Lightering Co. v. Baker-Whiteley Coal Co. (1912) 117 Md. 660, 84 Atl. 182, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 146; Ward v. Haren (1909) 139 Mo. App. 8, 119 S. W. 446; Howell v. National Portland Cement Co., 9 Northampton Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 108; Jenkins v. Wheeler (1867) 42 N. Y. 645.

In 6 Ruling Case Law, p. 1000, we find this statement:

"Where performance is thus rendered impossible the inquiry naturally arises whether there was a purpose to covenant against such an extraordinary, and therefore presumably unapprehended event, the happening of which it was not within the power of the covenantor to prevent. In other words, there can be no doubt that a man may, by an absolute contract, bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or to pay damages for the nonperformance; and this construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking where the event which caused the impossibility was or might have been anticipated and guarded against in the contract. * * *"

In 6 Ruling Case Law, p. 1014, § 875, we find this:

"Act of Third Party.—Generally speaking, it may be said that, where a party undertakes expressly for the performance of some act, his positive engagement casts upon him a duty, the discharge of which cannot be excused by showing his inability by reason of the lawful interference of some third person. By neglecting to qualify his contract, so as to make such an excuse available, he waives it as a defense against a recovery of damages for non-performance. * * * A promise may, of course, be conditioned upon the act or consent of a third person. But the performance of an absolute promise is not excused by the fact that a third person refuses or fails to take action essential to performance. * * * The nonperformance of a contract ordinarily is not excused by the mere fact that the promisor has no control over the third person."

In the case of Alleghany Iron Co. v. Teaford, 96 Va. 378, 31 S. E. 525, it is held that a plaintiff may recover damages sustained by him for loss resulting from unreasonable delay on the part of the defendant in permitting him to perform his contract, and, when he has been prevented by the defendant from completely performing his contract, he may also recover the profit he would have realized if he had been permitted to perform fully.

This is not a double recovery. The object of the law in awarding damages is to make amends or reparations by putting the party injured in the same position, as far as money can do it, as he would have been if the contract had been performed.

The plaintiff in error relies with great earnestness upon the principles of law enunciated in the case of Virginia Iron Co. v. Graham, 124 Va. 700 et seq., 98 S. E. 859, as being applicable to the facts in the instant case. But this case is easily distinguishable from the case under consideration.

In the Graham Case, which involved a mining contract, the foundation of the contract was the existence of sufficient iron ore to justify the operations of the mines for 40 years, and both parties assumed its existence and contracted with reference thereto.

When it appeared that the ore did not exist, it was clear that each party had entered into the contract under a mistake of fact which affected the substance of the contract, and the contract became inoperative for a failure of the consideration, and the lessee was plainly entitled to be relieved from the payment of the royalty provided for in the lease.

[4] In the instant case the basis of the contract was the transportation of 40,000 barrels of cement. The cement was in existence, and the cement company had agreed to ship and the steamship company had agreed to carry it from West Point to Yorktown; and the cement company cannot be excused from the performance of its contract because of the lawful interference of a third party. It should have qualified its contract so as to make this excuse available.

In view of the foregoing authorities, we find no error in the action of the court in granting or refusing instructions, of which the plaintiff in error can complain.

[5] We cannot sustain the contention of the plaintiff in error that there is no evidence to prove the assumption of the original contract by that company. The conduct of its own officers in taking up the contract where the Virginia Portland Cement Company left it, and conducting all correspondence in its own name, and the payment by it of amounts due under the contract at rates therein stated, and failure to suggest, when the claim sued on was asserted against it by the steamship company, that the liability, if any, was against the Virginia Portland Cement Company, was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in holding that the Lehigh Portland Cement Company had assumed the obligations of the contract of the Virginia Portland Cement Company.

[6] Nor can we sustain the defense of the plaintiff in error that it was and is now discharged and excused from performance of the contract because of supervening impossibility of performance and frustration of adventure by the act of the United States government in canceling its contract with F. W. Mark Construction Company, Inc.

The government was not a party to the contract sued on, and its action in curtailing the work at Yorktown simply destroyed the demand for cement at that place, without making the transportation of the cement impossible.

The steamship company having no knowledge of the terms of the contract between the government and the F. W. Mark Construction Company, it is apparent that the continuance of the work upon the cement reservoirs at Yorktown to final completion was not the basis and implied condition upon which the liability of the parties to perform the contract sued on rested.

[7] Are the damages assessed by the jury excessive? It appears from the record that from July to November the steamship company was forced to keep its boat idle two-thirds of the time, waiting the arrival of the last six to ten cars of cement at West Point, during which time the company paid out for overhead expenses more than it would have paid for overhead expenses in transporting the residue of the 40,000 barrels of cement to Yorktown.

The failure of the cement company to release it from the contract prevented the steamship company from seeking other business.

Only fuel and oil were saved while the boat was idle, and it is in evidence that the fuel and oil used in making the 20 round trips necessary to haul the remaining 13,200 barrels of cement would have cost approximately $307.

The plaintiff's claim was for $8,354, with interest from August 11, 1919, making a total claim of $9,019.54, the day the verdict was rendered, while the jury returned a verdict for only $7,854, without interest, showing they deducted for expenses over $1,100.

In view of the evidence, we cannot say the damages are excessive.

For the foregoing reasons, we find no error in the rulings of the trial court, or in the judgment under review, and the case will be affirmed.

GARRETT v. RAHILY et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 18, 1922.)Trial \Rightarrow 253(5)—Instruction excluding issue of innocent purchase of automobile held erroneous.

An automobile was sold and delivered, with title reserved by recorded contract of conditional sale, to be resold by vendee, and was purchased and paid for by defendant. Held, error to instruct that, if jury found that the automobile purchased was the same car mentioned in the contract of sale, they should find for the plaintiffs, as excluding the question of whether or not defendant was an innocent purchaser for value and without notice.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action of detinue by Daniel Rahily and James R. Martin, trading as Rahily & Martin, against W. F. Garrett, for an automobile. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. Johnston Ackiss, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

S. M. Brandt and Moses Ehrenworth, both of Norfolk, for defendants in error.

PRENTIS, J. W. F. Garrett, defendant, complains of an adverse judgment entered in favor of Daniel Rahily and James R. Martin, partners trading as Rahily & Martin, plaintiffs, in an action of detinue for a Jackson touring automobile.

The pertinent facts are that the plaintiffs, who lived in Petersburg, were the general agents of the Jackson Motor Corporation, of Jackson, Mich., and on or about the 16th of March, 1920, appointed one L. N. Crawford, an automobile dealer in Norfolk, Va., their subagent for the sale of such automobiles. This agency contract required Crawford to purchase the machines directly from the manufacturers in Michigan, and to pay them therefor. On March 31, 1920, the plaintiff sold and delivered the automobile here involved in Petersburg to their subagent, Crawford, knowing that Crawford would take it to Norfolk for use in connection with his business, as they say, however, for demonstration purposes only. They reserved title thereto by a contract of conditional sale, which was recorded in the city of Petersburg April 5, 1920, and thereafter, before its recordation in Norfolk, following negotiations opened by one of Crawford's clerks April 17, 1920, this automobile was sold by Crawford to Garrett, defendant, April 22, 1920, and according to his testimony fully paid for.

Crawford, his vendor, had a place of business in Norfolk, and advertised Jackson automobiles for sale in his front window as well as in a local newspaper.

Under these circumstances, as is stated in the brief of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, it was a question for the jury to determine whether or not the defendant was a purchaser for value without notice, and they insist that the jury has properly found that he was not such an innocent purchaser. That it was a question for the jury is undoubtedly true, and if they had been permitted by the trial court to consider this question, which is fairly raised by the evidence, this court would not have disturbed the verdict. It appears, however, that the trial court refused all of the instructions which were asked for, except one, which was granted at the instance of the plaintiffs, in this language:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the car in the possession of the defendant, Garrett, is the same car mentioned in the contract of March 31, 1920, then they should find for the plaintiffs."

This instruction takes away from the jury the determination of every question involved in the case save the identity of the automobile with the car referred to in the conditional sale contract. Under the evidence in this case, the jury should have been instructed that, if the vendee was an innocent purchaser of the car for value and without notice, they should find in his favor, for the very elect might have been deceived into believing that Crawford, the dealer, owned it, while the wayfaring man, whether wise or unwise, would have been his easy mark.

The case is controlled by the doctrines so recently announced in the cases of O'Neil v. Cheatwood, 127 Va. 96, 102 S. E. 596; Boice v. Finance & Guaranty Corp., 127 Va. 563, 102 S. E. 591, 10 A. L. R. 654; General Securities Co., Inc. v. Driscoll (C. C. A.) 271 Fed. 295.

DALEY v. COMMONWEALTH.MALES v. SAME.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §1092(4), 1144(17)—Bills of exceptions must be tendered for signature within 60 days; judgment presumed correct.

Code 1919, § 6252, is mandatory, and court properly refused to sign bills of exceptions not tendered within 60 days from the date of final judgment, and, there being no exceptions in the record and no reversible error on the face thereof, the judgment of the trial court was presumed to be correct in every respect.

2. Criminal law §1092(9)—Failure to enter order in common-law order book did not extend time for presentation of bills of exceptions.

The fact that order was not actually spread upon the common-law order book of the court, but only a memorandum thereof was made by the clerk in the minute book regularly kept by him in which to note the daily proceedings of the court, did not extend time for the preparation and presentation of bills of exceptions, in view of Code 1919, § 5962.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. [1] John Daley and A. P. Males have each been convicted of selling ardent spirits in violation of the statute. There are six errors assigned in the petition, but they are each based upon bills of exception which are not signed by the judge of the trial court. He refused to sign them because they were not tendered within 60 days from the date of the final judgment.

The statute (Code 1919, § 6252) is mandatory, and, there being no exceptions in the record before this court, and no reversible error on the face of the record, the judgment of the trial court is presumed to be correct in every respect (Bragg v. Justis, 129 Va. 354, 106 S. E. 385; Harley v. Commonwealth, 131 Va. —, 108 S. E. 648).

[2] There is a memorandum made by the judge to the effect that on the date of such final judgment the order was not actually spread upon the common-law order book of the court, but only a memorandum thereof made by the clerk in the minute book regularly kept by him in which to note the daily proceedings of the court. The fact that the order was not entered on the order book and signed by the judge on the date of the judgment does not extend the time for the preparation and presentation of the bills of exception. It is not the practice in this state, and indeed it would be physically impossible for the clerk to record all of the orders on the order book immediately, or for the judge forthwith to sign them. The universal practice is that the clerk extends the orders upon the permanent record of the court just as soon as possible, and they are thereafter read in open court and signed as orders of the date when the judgments were pronounced. This practice is recognized by Code 1919, § 5962, which provides, among other things, that—

"The proceedings of each day shall be drawn up at large, and read in open court, by the clerk thereof, at the next session of the said court, except those of the last day of a term, which shall be drawn up and read the same day. After being corrected where it is necessary, the record shall be signed by the presiding judge."

2. Criminal law §829(18)—Instructions covered by other instructions held properly refused.

Instructions on reasonable doubt, covered by instructions given, were properly refused.

3. Indictment and information §159(4)—Changing name of accused in indictment during trial held proper.

Under Code 1919, §§ 4875, 4878, as to misnomer and amendment, the court, during the trial, properly permitted the attorney for the commonwealth to change the name of accused in an indictment for rape from "R. A." to "Ira" K.; the identity of accused not being at any time questioned or doubted.

Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. The accused has been found guilty of rape, and is here assigning four errors.

[1] 1. The facts which the jury were justified in finding from the evidence of the commonwealth are that the crime was committed upon a female child under the age of 15 years. The physical condition of the child, who was examined by a physician on the night of the occurrence, showed beyond peradventure that some one had committed the alleged offense, and her testimony that the prisoner ravished her is clear, positive, and distinct. While the accused denied every incriminating fact, this issue was determined by the jury, and will not be disturbed here; so that the motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence was properly overruled.

[2] 2. Two other errors were assigned—one the refusal of the court to give two instructions offered by the defendant, and the other the giving of two instructions offered by the commonwealth. It is unnecessary to say anything as to those which were refused, both of which were to the effect that the prisoner's guilt must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, except that, as the court gave six other instructions which emphasized with unnecessary repetition the same rule, the refusal to give these was justified. The prisoner objects to the giving of two of the instructions offered by the commonwealth, but no reason is suggested in support of the assignment, except the assertion that there was no credible evidence of the crime. As to this, what we have already said as to the evidence is sufficient, in our opinion, to justify the instructions, as they fully safeguard every right of the accused.

[3] 3. The other error assigned is that during the progress of the trial the court permitted the attorney for the commonwealth to change the name in the indictment from R. A. Kitchen to Ira Kitchen. The identity of the accused was never at any time questioned or doubted, and the action of the court is fully authorized by Code 1919, § 4875, which, among other things, provides that no indictment shall be abated for any misnomer of the accused, but the court may, in case of misnomer, appearing before or in the course of a trial, forthwith cause the indictment or accusation to be amended according to the fact; and Code 1919, § 4878, provides for amending indictments, provided the amendment does not change the nature of the offense charged, with the right to the defendant to have a continuance of the case if the amendment operates as a surprise to him.

We find no reversible error.

BROWN v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. Homicide §314—Jury cannot fix less punishment on convict for murdering guard than electrocution.

Under Code 1919, § 5051, the jury cannot fix any less punishment of a convict for murdering his guard than electrocution.

2. Homicide §144—In prosecution for murdering guard, commonwealth must prove accused was convict.

In a prosecution of a convict for murdering his guard, under Code 1919, § 5051, the commonwealth must prove that at the time of the homicide accused was a convict.

3. Criminal law §448—Certified copy of judgment and order of condemnation held sufficient to identify defendant as convict.

In a prosecution of a convict, under Code 1919, § 5051, for murdering his guard, a certified copy of the judgment and order of condemnation of defendant for a felony, for which the indictment charged he had been sentenced to a penitentiary term, which he was serving as a member of the convict road force, held sufficient to identify defendant as such convict.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen. and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. [1-3] The plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the accused, was a penitentiary convict, and murdered the guard who had him in custody. He was convicted of the offense and sentenced to be electrocuted, which is the only punishment provided by statute. The jury had no option to fix any less punishment. Code, § 5051. It was essential for the commonwealth, in a proceeding for this offense, to prove that, at the time of the homicide, the accused was a convict; and the only error assigned is that the record does not show that he is the same Ernest Brown as the Ernest Brown who was convicted of a felony in Surry county, and sentenced to a term of years in the penitentiary. The assignment of error is without merit. The accused was indicted as Ernest Brown, alias "Fern," and the indictment charged that he had been previously convicted of a felony in the circuit court for the county of Surry, and sentenced to a term of five years in the penitentiary, and that, at the time of the homicide, he was undergoing his punishment as a member of the state convict road force, at the camp in Orange county. In support of the charge of such conviction, the commonwealth introduced a certified copy of the judgment and order of condemnation of "Ernest Brown, alias 'Fern'" from the circuit court of Surry county. The trial court certified the facts, not merely the evidence, established in the case, and, among them, "that Ernest Brown was, on the 1st day of March, 1921, in the custody of Walter E. Snow and D. N. Kyger, guards of the penitentiary of Virginia, working at a stone quarry in Orange county, Va.," and that the certified copy of the order of the circuit court of Surry county above referred to was "the paper under which the said Ernest Brown was held in the said custody, and under which he was received into said camp as a convict." This abundantly identifies the accused as the convict under the judgment aforesaid of Surry county. The murder was fully proved, and is not here denied. It is plain that the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

PRENTIS, J. The plaintiff in error, who has been convicted under the statute (Laws 1918, c. 888) prohibiting the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits, is here assigning one error—that is, that the court erred in overruling the motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence.

It is unnecessary to recite all of the evidence because it appears from the evidence introduced on behalf of the commonwealth that the federal prohibition agents and the county police had located a distillery in Halifax county; that the accused and another were seen and recognized by two of these officials, who saw the accused filling up fruit jars with whisky which he was dipping out of a tub at the distillery; that they had filled up 11 fruit jars and were about to fill another when, having evidently seen some of the officers, they ran away; that another witness saw them running through the woods from the direction of the distillery; that they took an automobile which had been waiting; and that they were arrested in that automobile a few minutes afterwards by another one of the officers. The defendant introduced evidence tending to contradict all of these incriminating circumstances, but as the jury heard and saw all of the witnesses, and credited the evidence which so clearly indicates the guilt of the accused, their finding is conclusive. The attorney for the accused appears to realize that this result is inevitable, and undertakes to escape it by stating in his petition that the "officers testified falsely against the petitioner, * * * and that they were actuated so to do solely through malice." It is sufficient to say as to this that there is nothing in the record to justify this imputation against the witnesses for the commonwealth. Affirmed.

TRENT v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Larceny §55—Evidence sufficient to support conviction.

On trial for larceny of a diamond ring intrusted to defendant and claimed by him to have been lost while he was intoxicated, evidence held sufficient to make a case for the jury and support a verdict of guilty.

2. Criminal law §1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed when evidence sufficient, if believed, to support it.

Though the testimony is conflicting and not altogether satisfying as it appears in print, where the evidence to support the commonwealth's theory is sufficient, if believed, to warrant the verdict, the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the testimony is for the jury, and an appellate court is not warranted in interfering with their finding.

3. Embezzlement §48(1)—Modified instruction as to concealment of ring, lost while intoxicated and subsequently found, not erroneous.

Under Code 1919, § 4451, relative to the embezzlement of property lawfully coming into one's possession, the modification of an instruction as to loss of a diamond ring while intoxicated by adding that, if defendant, after regaining consciousness, discovered the ring and concealed or aided and abetted another to conceal it with intent to deprive the owner thereof, he would be guilty of larceny, was not erroneous.

4. Criminal law §806(1)—Instructions similar to instructions given on defendant's motion not subject to criticism.

An instruction, which simply repeated in substance part of similar instructions given on defendant's motion, was not subject to criticism.

Error to Corporation Court of Roanoke.

C. E. Trent was convicted of grand larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Hairston & Hopkins and Hoge & Darnall, all of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. The accused has been convicted of grand larceny, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for 18 months in accordance with the verdict.

[1] The pertinent facts relied upon by the prosecution are these: One Nolan received from a pawnbroker in the city of Roanoke a diamond ring which he contemplated purchasing. The price named was $900. He borrowed it with permission to have the ring examined by an expert in order to enable him to estimate its value. The jeweler whose estimate he desired not being at his place of business, he was told to return at a later time. Nolan then went to a pool room, where he met the accused and several others, who began drinking together, and then they went to a baseball game played by negroes. Nolan asked the accused to take the ring and wear it, as it did not fit his (Nolan's) finger. The ring was exhibited to a number of people by being handed around for examination. The accused did not return after the ballgame with Nolan, but in a different automobile. He was very much intoxicated when he reached home, and his doctor found him in an unconscious condition and critically ill. Nolan followed him quickly, and sought to recover the ring, but could not find it either on his hand or on his person, and he was too drunk then to give any explanation of its disappearance. A woman of bad reputation, who was in the habit of using some stupefying drug, testified that she was an inmate of the house of the accused as a servant; that she discovered the ring hidden in the refrigerator, and reported the matter to the wife of the accused, who told the witness not to say anything about it; that when the accused and his wife on one occasion had an altercation, when he started to leave his home, his wife told him to take the ring and take it over to his mother's home; that they could do as much with her for concealing goods as with him. She also testified that she saw the accused take the ring out of the refrigerator. All of this incriminating evidence is flatly contradicted by the accused and his witnesses.

[2] One of the assignments of error is that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict of guilty, and that the trial court erred in refusing to set it aside. Questions similar to this have been so frequently discussed by the courts that we do not deem it necessary to do more than repeat a recent expression of this court in Harris v. Commonwealth, 129 Va. 751, 105 S. E. 541:

"Of this it is sufficient to say that we have carefully considered the record; and, while the testimony is involved in conflict, and is not altogether satisfying as it appears in print, the evidence tending to support the theory of the commonwealth was sufficient, if believed by the jury, to warrant the verdict. The question of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the testimony was peculiarly for the jury, and we would not be warranted in interfering with their finding."

[3] The other assignment of error is that the court erred in an addition made to instruction No. 5. The first clause of the instruction reads as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, Trent, came into the possession of the ring in question fairly and legally, and that at the time of coming into such possession he entertained no criminal intent to commit larceny thereof, and that thereafter he became so much under the influence of ardent spirits as to have been incapable of forming and entertaining criminal intent, and that while under such influence, and without the knowledge of what he was doing, he lost the ring, or misplaced it, or allowed it to get out of his possession, then he would not be guilty of the larceny thereof."

The addition thereto reads:

"You are further instructed, however, that if after regaining consciousness he discovered the said ring or its whereabouts and concealed the same, or aided and abetted another in its concealment, with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof permanently, then he would be guilty of the larceny thereof."

This assignment is based upon the statute (Code 1919, § 4451), relating to the embezzlement or appropriation of property to one's own use which came lawfully into his possession. The pertinent language of the statute relied on reads thus:

"If any person wrongfully and fraudulently use, dispose of, conceal, or embezzle * * * personal property, tangible or intangible, which he shall have received for another, or for his employer, principal, or bailor * * * or which shall have been intrusted or delivered to him by another * * * he shall be deemed guilty of larceny thereof, and may be indicted as for simple larceny. * * *

[4] There were four other instructions which fully and repeatedly cautioned the jury that there was a presumption of innocence, which followed the accused throughout the case, that he could not be convicted until the commonwealth overcame that presumption beyond a reasonable doubt by clear, distinct, and reliable evidence, and that he could not be convicted of larceny unless it was shown beyond all doubt by clear, distinct, and reliable evidence, that after the ring was given to him he disposed of it for his own use, or fraudulently and unlawfully concealed the ring for the purpose of converting it to his own use. Wadley v. Commonwealth, 98 Va. 808, 35 S. E. 452, cited in support of this assignment, has no application to the facts of this case. There it was held error to refuse an instruction which was supported by evidence, to the effect that unless the act was done with criminal intent, and that if the conversion was made under an honest belief of the accused that he has a bona fide claim of right to do so, the jury could not convict. There is no evidence here that the accused ever made any claim to the ring. On the contrary, he admitted that he received it from Nolan, and only claimed that because of his insensibility from drunkenness he did not know what had become of it. The criticism of the instruction is without justification, for it simply repeated in substance a part of similar instructions which had been given to the jury upon the motion of the accused.

We find no reversible error.

Affirmed.

DICKERSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 16, 1922.)

Criminal law §720(9)—Statement of commonwealth's attorney in murder case held unsupported by evidence.

In a prosecution for murder, a statement of the prosecuting attorney that deceased was killed at a certain point and was carried by accused to the place where his body was found, after having put on another person's shoes, held unsupported by evidence.

Error to Circuit Court, Halifax County.

George Dickerson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and brings error. Reversed, and new trial granted.

The verdict in this case found the accused guilty of murder in the second degree, and fixed his punishment at 10 years in the penitentiary. The judgment under review was entered accordingly.

The deceased, a white man, named Will Rickman, was murdered on the night of Saturday, March 19, 1921, in a most brutal manner. There were two wounds, both of which, according to the testimony for the commonwealth, were mortal wounds, if inflicted while Rickman was living—one consisting of a fracture of the skull about 1¼ inches in length on the right side of the head above the ear, and the other consisting of the fracture of the spine on a level with the hip bones, the skin being scraped off at this place in the center of the back, making an abrasion underneath the clothing of the size of a half dollar. In addition to these wounds there was laceration about the lips, the right corner of the mouth was cut; there were marks of the teeth on the inner surfaces of the lower and top lips, one tooth broken, one missing; there was laceration back of the right ear, about half an inch in length; and there were a number of bruises on the forehead about an inch long, some distance apart, running up and down the forehead. The testimony of the physician, who examined the body as a member of the coroner's jury on the next day after the murder, concerning the appearance of the wounds, is to the effect that of those on the head and face "some looked like they were caused by a blunt instrument and some with an instrument that had a sharp point to it;" that the wounds on the face and head could have been caused by a pistol such as the pistol in evidence belonging to the accused; that the bruises on the forehead might have been made by the butt-end of that pistol, and the fracture above the ear could have been made by the hammer of the pistol; and that the wound in the back causing the fracture of the spine could have been caused by a blunt instrument, such as the club in evidence, which was found at the place at which, according to the theory of the commonwealth, the murder was committed. This witness testified further, however, that he could not say that the wounds on the face and head were made by the pistol; that there was nothing about these wounds that indicated to the mind of the witness that they were made by the pistol; that they could have been made by some other instrument; and that he could not say that the lick which fractured the spine was hit by the club in evidence. And the evidence fails to disclose that there was any blood stain on the pistol or club, or other evidence that either of them was an instrument used by the murderer.

The body of the deceased was found lying in the public road "right across one of the tracks made by vehicles." The witness for the commonwealth, who testified to first seeing the body, was in an automobile, with some young ladies, returning from a dance. One of the young ladies was driving the car. This witness, as the car passed along the road, saw in the road what afterwards proved to be the body of the deceased. As to the time of night when this occurred this witness testified as follows:

"Q. Will you please state to the jury what hour that was that you saw that body?

"A. It was about quarter after 12.

"Q. That was 15 minutes after 12 o'clock?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. State to the jury how you arrive at that.

"A. I left down the road about four miles, at Mr. Tracey's, about 12 o'clock, and I think it took about 15 minutes to drive it.

"Q. It certainly would not take over 15 minutes to drive it?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. It is good gray soil road?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And no hills between the two points?

"A. No, sir."

Cross-examination:

"Q. Did you look at your watch when you left Mr. Tracey's?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. After you left or before?

"A. I got in the automobile and looked at my watch. * * *

"Q. One of the young ladies was driving?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And she was driving it slowly?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. She was not an experienced driver?

"A. I think she was.

"Q. She was not driving fast?

"A. She was not speeding."

Redirect examination:

"Q. You are satisfied that it was not later than 12:15 when you reached that point?

"A. Yes, sir."

Another witness for the commonwealth testified that, traveling in an automobile, he passed what afterwards proved to be the body of the deceased lying in the road, between 12:15 and 12:20 o'clock of the night of the murder; that he did not recognize it at the time as the body of any person, and did not stop, but saw something in the road, which afterwards proved to be the body of the deceased.

Another witness for the commonwealth on cross-examination, but without objection on the part of the commonwealth's attorney, testified that he had a conversation with one John Medley the next morning after the murder, and that Medley said that he thought he (Medley) ran over the body of the deceased the night before, and thought at the time that he (Medley) had killed the deceased.

It appears from Medley's testimony, who was a witness for the accused, that Medley was traveling in an automobile truck that night, and left the home of Jim Coleman, presently to be mentioned, which was about a mile from the place in the road where the body was found, not earlier than 12:15 o'clock, so that if his automobile struck the body of the deceased as it lay in the road this must have been some time not earlier than about 12:30 o'clock of such night. Medley, however, was not asked any question about running over the body of the deceased, and did not testify on that subject.

The coroner's inquest was held the morning following the murder, which was Sunday, at the place in the road where the body was found, the inquest beginning about 10 o'clock that morning. Before the coroner's jury met, however, the news of the murder and of the finding of the body had gone abroad in the neighborhood, and a considerable crowd gathered about the place where the body lay in the road, and around about the body. There is no direct evidence on the subject of whether the body was or was not moved by any one during the morning before the coroner's jury convened.

When the coroner's jury met the body was lying in the road, as aforesaid, on the back, the right arm being flexed and partially across the chest. A tooth and an empty pistol cartridge were found near the body. A bottle of extract of pineapple was lying on the chest of the body and a pint bottle of whisky about two-thirds full, was setting up under the right arm of the body. There was no blood in the road near the body, except that, when the coroner's jury raised the head in their examination of the body, some bloody serum ran out of the nostril on the same side on which the skull was fractured. And the testimony for the commonwealth was to the effect that one of the wounds was near an artery which ordinarily would have bled considerably, and that if the deceased had been killed where the body was found in the road there would have been evidence of blood in the road from the wounds on the head.

The dwelling house of Jim Coleman, a colored man is located on the south side of the public road above mentioned, about 75 yards off from the public road. This dwelling house is about one mile east of the place where the body was found.

On the Saturday night of the murder there was a dance, and what the colored people call "a party," at the house of Jim Coleman, and a large gathering of colored people were there, of men and women, beginning about 8:30 or 9 o'clock that evening and breaking up about 1 o'clock that night. There was the selling of food and drink, and, according to the testimony for the commonwealth, the accused, who occupied a room in Coleman's house, as a lodger, was selling intoxicating liquor that night, sometimes in one of the rooms of the house and at other times in the yard at the rear of the house. Jim Coleman, assisted by others, was selling food from time to time. The house could not hold the crowd, and many were on the outside of the house, here and there in the rear, on the sides, and in front of the house, while the party was going on.

The testimony for the commonwealth is to the effect that about 10:15 o'clock on the night mentioned, the accused was seen in the public road in front of Coleman's house; and that later, about 11 o'clock, the deceased, (the only white person who appears to have been at the house of Coleman that night), was seen to come, in a somewhat drunken condition, from one side of Coleman's house, as if coming from the rear of the house, and, as he walked out toward the front of the house, the accused engaged in conversation with the colored men, Davis and Wood, who were afterwards among the witnesses for the commonwealth, during which conversation the deceased said, "Some one has been meddling with me" according to Wood's testimony), "Some ——— of a ——— is picking at me" (according to Davis' testimony). Neither Wood nor Davis asked, nor did the deceased say, who was "picking at" him or "meddling with" him. Davis assured the deceased that nobody should bother him while he was with him (Davis). The deceased asked Davis if the latter had any whisky. Davis said "No." The deceased then said, "I have some here, and I want to get some to go with it to make it better." Davis said that he did not have a drop. The deceased then said that, "The whisky he had was not any good," but that if Davis would go with him out to the public road he would give Davis a drink, and also extended the same invitation to Wood. On getting out to the public road just in front of Coleman's house, the deceased, Davis and Wood were seen by Harry Crute, a white man, who was passing along the public road at the time in his automobile, going homeward, which was eastward along such road. Crute stopped his car and talked a few minutes with the deceased, Davis, and Wood. Thereupon, two other persons coming up, the deceased, Davis, and Wood, asked Crute's permission to ride down the public road with Crute, and did so, to a point in front of Bethel Church, a distance of some 50 yards east of the entrance to Coleman's house. There the deceased, Davis, and Wood, got out of Crute's automobile, and Crute went on homeward. This occurred, as Crute, a witness for the accused, testified, at "a few minutes past half past 11" o'clock. Crute fixes this time by saying that when he drove up in front of Coleman's house and stopped, as above stated, he looked at his watch, and that it was then 11:30 o'clock; and that it was a few minutes thereafter that he left the deceased, Davis, and Wood in front of the church.

Davis and Wood, witnesses for the commonwealth as aforesaid, testified that on getting out of Crute's automobile in front of the church, the deceased gave them each a drink of whisky. Davis says the deceased gave them their drinks out of a quart bottle, which was about half full of liquor at the time. These witnesses further testified that they and the deceased then walked back along the public road to the entrance to Coleman's house, and that at that place they parted with the deceased, the latter going on westward along the public road in the direction of his home, and of the place where his dead body was seen in the road within a short time afterwards, and Wood and Davis returning to Coleman's house, from which they not long afterwards departed for their own homes. These witnesses also testified that when they parted with the deceased, as last stated, they saw no one else in sight; met no one, saw no one, and heard no one else, and "heard no difficulty" occur, as they went on to Coleman's house. Their testimony as to the time of night when this parting with the deceased occurred is in accord with Crute's testimony, and fixes such parting at about 11:45 o'clock.

The testimony for the commonwealth developed the following among other facts:

When the body of the deceased and its surroundings were being examined at the inquest, a track on the ground, made by the toe of a shoe with nails in it, was noticed just under one of the arms of the dead man. Outside of the trampling in the road of those who had stood or walked around the body tracks were found and followed, which were the same as the track just mentioned. These tracks led from the body to Jim Coleman's house. He was found with shoes on his feet which made the tracks which led from the body to his house. He was asked if he had been to the place where the body was, and he denied that he had been there, and denied all knowledge of the cause of the death of the deceased and of who killed him.

Coleman was thereupon arrested and lodged in jail that same day, Sunday, March 20, 1921, charged with the murder. That night an armed mob attacked the jail, and, not succeeding in breaking in, called to Coleman, and demanded that he tell them who murdered Rickman. Coleman told them that he did not know who committed the crime. The mob then fired a number of shots at or near Coleman, then paused and said to Coleman that they did not believe that he killed Rickman, but that they did believe that he knew who did, and that, if he did not tell them who it was, they would kill him. Thereupon Coleman again declared that he did not know who killed Rickman, and did this repeatedly. The mob then left the jail, and, going to Coleman's dwelling house, burned it to the ground and all of his property there.

Coleman was then, on the next night, being Monday night, removed to the jail at Lynchburg for safe-keeping, and was kept confined there for some time. Subsequently he was brought back to and kept confined in the local jail, where he was still so confined and still charged with the murder at the time he testified on the trial of the accused. Meanwhile a number of other colored men who were at the party at Jim Coleman's or were seen out in the public road on the night of the murder (including the accused, Wood, and Davis, above mentioned, and others) were under arrest, and confined in jail charged with the murder; and the county had a detective employed, who, as well as the commonwealth's attorney and the sheriff, and a Mr. Bailey, in whom Coleman seems to have had especial confidence, had interviews from time to time with Coleman, and also with others under arrest and not under arrest, some of whom were afterwards used as witnesses for the commonwealth, quizzing them on the subject of who committed the murder. The evidence makes it plain that during this time those who were quizzing Coleman repeatedly impressed upon him the predicament in which he stood and would stand when he came to be tried upon the charge against him of having committed the crime of the murder, unless he should, prior to his trial, name some one, other than himself, who wore his shoes which made the tracks aforesaid the night of the murder, and unless he should furnish some proof pointing to some one else as the person who committed the crime. Nevertheless Coleman repeatedly denied to those who quizzed him all knowledge on the subject of who killed the deceased until he (Coleman) was brought back from Lynchburg to the local jail and was being again confined there and the time was approaching when he would be tried for the crime. Coleman then, on April 20, first, either to the Mr. Bailey above referred to, or to the detective (the record leaving it in some doubt to which in the first instance), and afterwards in the presence of the commonwealth's attorney and others, and subsequently upon the witness stand as a witness for the commonwealth on the trial of the accused, made the statement which charged the accused with the crime, the material portions of which statement are as follows:

Coleman said that the shoes which made the tracks aforesaid were his everyday shoes; that on the night of his dance or party he took them off and left them in the shed-room of his house, which was one of the rooms on the first floor of the house; that he wore that night, while the party was going on, another and lighter pair of shoes; that he went into the shedroom between 10 and 12 o'clock that night, and the lamp was burning and the shoes of the accused, George

Dickerson, "were setting with the toes that way" (indicating), and that he Coleman, looked and said, "Uhm, Good Lord!" that the accused's shoes were standing there, and Coleman's shoes were gone; that the next time he, Coleman, saw the accused, the latter came to the front door and said, "Uhm, you-all here dancing," and Coleman said, "Yes"; that thereupon the accused danced "from the door clean into the kitchen, and asked Miss Chappel to have a treat," and also offered Coleman a treat; that "a good while after that" he, Coleman, heard the accused "talking between the stable and the house; that he, Coleman, was then standing in his kitchen door and saw the accused and two other persons whom he did not know standing with their backs to him, Coleman; that he, Coleman, recognized the accused by his voice; that the accused said, "Somebody is dead"; that he, Coleman, said, "What do you say, George; who is that dead?" that the accused said "nothing," and the three walked away. The statement of Coleman as given on the trial of the accused thereupon continued as follows:

"Q. When was the next time you saw (the accused)?

"A. The next time I saw George he came up to the kitchen door. After he said that, he came up to the kitchen door, and I was standing there, and I went and looked. At the kitchen door I stopped, and I said: 'George,' and he looked at me. I said, 'George, who is that you say is dead up the road?' (Italics supplied.) "He didn't say nothing. I said: 'George, who is that dead up the road?' (Italics supplied.) "I said: 'George, what did you wear my shoes for? Didn't you wear my shoes up the road?' (Italics supplied.) "And he said, 'Yes.' I said, 'Who is that dead up the road?' (Italics supplied.) "And he looked in my face, and he said: 'I killed a man.' I said: 'George, Lord, what do you mean? When I had my dance, and you wore my shoes;' and I said: 'What did you want to kill a man for?' and he said: 'Because I am so God damn evil.' * * *

"Q. Did he tell you the name of the man?

"A. No.

"Q. He said, when you asked why he killed the man, because he was so God damn evil?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When did you hear the news of the body being found up there?

"A. Between 2 and 4 o'clock.

"Q. How did you find it out?

"A. Riley Street came back on the mule.

"Q. Did you-all go up there that night?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Who went there?

"A. Myself and George went up there on my buggy with that little roan horse of mine hooked to it.

"Q. You-all went up there where the body was?

"A. Yes, sir; between 8 and 9 o'clock.

"Q. Did you-all have any conversation coming back?

"A. Coming back he spoke: 'Uhm, Uhm; its a pity. That man is dead. I wish I did know who killed him.' I didn't say anything until we got the other side of Mr. Luke Anderson's, and I said: 'George what made you want to wear my shoes off last night?'

"By the Court: Talk a little louder.

"A. I asked him what he wanted to wear my shoes for, and he didn't say a word, but cast his eyes in the foot of the buggy. I said: 'George, it's a pity you wore my shoes last night, and this man got killed last night.' He didn't part his lips, and I didn't part mine. * * *

"Q. Why did you tell people you didn't know when you knew it was George?

"A. Because he told me to keep my mouth shut. * * *

"Q. Did he say anything about wearing your shoes off after you were arrested and in jail?

"A. Yonder in Lynchburg.

"Q. What did he say?

"A. I got to a crack where I could peep in the cell, and I said, 'George,' and he said, 'Huh.' I said, 'George, what did you wear my shoes off the night I had that dance?' and he dropped his head and never said a word, only to keep my damn mouth shut.

"Q. Was there anybody present when he said that?

"A. Yes, sir; Daniel Harris was in the cell with him.

"Q. Did he say anything else to you in this jail about this case?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When was that?

"A. The Sunday he got out on bail he told me everything was all right, to keep my mouth shut; that everything would come out all right.

"Q. When was that?

"A. That was the same Saturday that they brought us back here to Houston from Lynchburg.

"Q. At the time he was turned out of jail, did you see him any more after that?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When was it?

"A. If I am not mistaken he came back on Wednesday from home to Houston.

"Q. Did he go down to the side of the jail?

"A. Yes, sir; he gave me a dollar. * * *

"Q. What did he say then?

"A. He gave me the dollar and told me to keep my mouth shut.

"Q. Did anybody else hear that?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did other people in the jail hear that?

"A. Yes, sir."

On cross-examination Coleman admitted that in talking with his own counsel, prior to his declaration aforesaid, he told his own counsel that the shoes which made the tracks aforesaid sat in his rooms from the time he took them off as he stated, "and hadn't been touched by anybody, until about light, when (he) called for them to go out to get some corn for two men who came there in a wagon," and that, when arrested, on Sunday, March 20, he told the sheriff that the pistol was his, which was introduced in evidence by the commonwealth as belonging to the accused.

Daniel Harris, in his testimony on the trial of the accused, corroborated the statement of Coleman as to his calling to the accused in the cell of the latter in the Lynchburg jail and asking the accused about wearing the shoes, and that the latter made no reply except to tell Coleman to keep his mouth shut. Daniel Harris, however, was one of those under arrest charged with the same crime; and it was shown that he lived with Coleman; and he admitted having at a previous time denied that he knew anything whatever about the case.

The place at which the deceased, Rickman, was killed, according to the theory of the commonwealth's attorney, was about 35 or 40 yards from the public road above mentioned, just in the edge of a body of woods which stood to the west of Coleman's dwelling house. Between this body of woods and Coleman's house there was a strip of open field, about 45 yards wide. And the public road, as it goes on westward from the entrance therefrom to Coleman's house (at which point the public road is about 75 yards from Coleman's house), curves toward the south, so that the spot at which the deceased was killed, according to the theory aforesaid, while within 35 or 40 yards of the public road, was only about 50 yards from Coleman's house. This spot was somewhat nearer the place where the body was found than Coleman's house, but was practically a mile away from the latter place.

The whole of the evidence on which the commonwealth has to rely to sustain the theory that the deceased was killed at the spot last mentioned consists of the testimony of two witnesses, a Mr. Wagstaff, and Ed Rickman, a brother of the deceased. They made an examination of the premises about Coleman's house on Monday afternoon, the second day following the murder. There had been no rain in the meantime. Later on, just when does not appear in evidence, Wagstaff, in company with the commonwealth's attorney and a Mr. Martin, made another examination of the same locality, with the result stated in the quotations from Wagstaff's testimony as to the latter examination presently to be made.

Wagstaff's testimony, just referred to, is as follows:

"Q. (by the commonwealth's attorney) Did you go to that place after the murder and make an examination of the premises?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What day was that?

"A. Monday evening after he was buried. * * *

"Q. State what you found—did you find any evidence of any blood or murder there?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where was it?

"A. It was right over there, I guess 50 yards from the house, or it may be not that far. * * *

"Q. Did you find any tracks?

"A. Yes, sir; there was three or four tracks leading from the back part of Jim Coleman's house coming across the field. * * *

"Q. What kind of tracks were they? Do you think you could identify any of those tracks?

"A. It was a shoe, I suppose No. 5 or 6, or maybe larger than that.

"Q. Was it a small track or a large one?

"A. A small track.

"Q. What size man was Will Rickman?

"A. I reckon he would weigh 130.

"Q. Do you know what size shoe he wore?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. To the best of your knowledge from the size of his shoe, would it correspond with his shoe?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That track came from the rear of Jim Coleman's house across the field to the scene of the murder?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Now could you tell from the tracks that were made whether the man was walking or running?

"A. He was running; it looked like pretty good speed.

"Q. The tracks were far apart were they?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you find at the scene of the murder?

"A. I saw blood there.

"Q. You saw blood on the ground?

"A. I saw blood on the ground.

"Q. What was the condition of the ground?

"A. It was trampled down.

"Q. Evidence of a scuffle?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you later on with Mr. Martin and me when we went down to examine the ground?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were you present when we found this club here (referring to the club in evidence to which reference is above made)?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. See if that is the club?

"A. Yes, sir; that is the club.

"Q. Where was it found?

"A. I don't suppose it was as far as from here to the corner of that table from where I showed you the man was killed.

"Q. What was the condition of the leaves underneath that club?

"A. It looked like it had been laid down [on] a day or so before.

"Q. The leaves were fresh, were they?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You have testified to that, to the best of your knowledge, you identified Will Rickman's track running from the rear of Jim Coleman's house up to this point. Did you find any other tracks?

"A. Yes, sir, there were three or four tracks along there.

"Q. I suppose you could not identify the others?

"A. No, sir; I paid but mighty little attention to them.

"Q. Were they large tracks?

"A. Yes, sir. I called one or two of his brothers when we started across the field.

"Q. Which one of his brothers went there to examine them?

"A. Ed, I think."

The testimony of the brother of the deceased, above referred to, Ed. Rickman, was as follows:

"Q. Did you go with Mr. Fred Wagstaff and examine the premises?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you see the place on the edge of the woods where the struggle occurred?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What evidence did you see?

"A. I saw his track coming from the house.

"Q. Whose track?

"A. My brother's.

"Q. Did you identify that as your brother's track?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What size shoe did your brother wear?

"A. Five.

"Q. A small foot?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He was a small man, wasn't he?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where did the tracks come from?

"A. The west end of the house.

"Q. That is the rear of the house?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And came across the field up to the scene where the struggle appeared to have occurred?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What evidence did you see of a struggle at that place?

"A. I saw a stick there.

"Q. Is that the club there?

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What was the condition of the ground there?

"A. The ground looked like it was trampled up right smart.

"Q. Did you see any blood on the ground there?

"A. Yes, sir."

There was no evidence introduced by the commonwealth which tended to show with any degree of definiteness that the accused was outside of the Coleman house at any time on the night of the murder for as long a period of time as half an hour. The most that such testimony could be said to tend to show is that the accused possibly may have been absent from the house for as long as half an hour during some part of the night between about 11 or 11:15 or 11:30 o'clock and 12:15 or 1 o'clock, but this can scarcely be said to be proved by such evidence as a fact, with any degree of probability; certainly not beyond a reasonable doubt. The testimony for the accused was to the effect that he was seen here and there about the house during the night, from the time the party began until after the murder had been done, at no longer intervals than some 10 minutes from time to time.

M. B. Booker, of Halifax, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., and J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen. for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only evidence there was before the jury to connect the accused with the crime of which he was convicted consisted of (a) the testimony for the commonwealth concerning the instruments with which it is claimed the murder was committed; (b) the testimony of Jim Coleman; and (c) the testimony of other witnesses locating the place of the killing, according to the theory of the commonwealth's attorney, in close proximity to where the accused was shown to be on the night of the murder.

(a) With respect to the instruments with which the crime was committed:

The evidence falls far short of identifying the pistol and club in evidence as having been, beyond a reasonable doubt, the instruments with which the deceased was slain. The evidence leaves it equally probable that the crime was committed with some other instruments.

(b) With respect to the testimony of Coleman:

That testimony, if true, was sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. But it was the testimony of one to whom the physical facts of the tracks of the shoes (owned by and found on his feet when he was arrested) pointed, not merely as an accomplice in the crime, but as the murderer. The narrative of the alleged confession of the accused which such testimony presented to the jury is so inherently improbable and well-nigh incredible in itself, and contains, in its repeated references to the dead body being "up the road," such evidence of knowledge on the part of Coleman of the location of the body, which nothing the accused had then said gave him information about (furnishing, indeed, internal evidence either of the guilt of Coleman of the crime or of other knowledge about it on his part than that derived, as he claimed, from the accused), as to make such narrative doubly unreliable. Moreover, the circumstances of the repeated previous denials by Coleman of all knowledge on the subject (some of such denials made when being shot at by the mob, under threat of instant death if he did not disclose what he knew), make it almost unbelievable that his narrative aforesaid could be true, and that he could have refrained from divulging some portion of it before he did. And further, there are the circumstances that, preceding the telling, Coleman took time to frame the story he told; that he was meanwhile having repeatedly impressed upon him, by the detective and others, the predicament he was in, unless he could lay the crime upon some one else. These considerations convince us that the jury would not have given credence to the testimony of Coleman had they not been satisfied that he was corroborated by other evidence in the case connecting the accused with the commission of the crime.

There was absolutely no evidence before the jury to corroborate the testimony of Coleman, connecting the deceased with the commission of the crime, except the testimony of Daniel Harris, and the testimony with reference to the location of the place at which the deceased was killed.

As to Daniel Harris' testimony, it merely corroborated Coleman in his testimony that while in the Lynchburg jail he asked the accused why the latter wore his, Coleman's, shoes, and that the accused made no reply, except to tell Coleman to shut his mouth. Harris' previous statement to the contrary, and his intimacy with Coleman, and his being himself one of those who had been arrested and charged with the same crime, were circumstances which indicate that the jury would not have given credence to Coleman's testimony upon the mere corroboration afforded by this testimony of Harris.

(c) We come then to the consideration of the testimony with reference to the location of the place at which the deceased was killed.

If the fact was that the deceased was killed at the place within 50 yards of the house of Coleman (the evidence showing that the accused was in and about such house on the night of the murder and about the time the murder was committed), the accused, according to the evidence for the commonwealth, may have been absent from the house, at some time, long enough to have done the killing, and possibly, at another time, long enough to have gone, wearing the shoes of Coleman, and carried the body from such place to the location in the road where the body was found, although the testimony for the commonwealth failed to show affirmatively that the accused was at any time absent from Coleman's house long enough to have so carried the body. That is to say, in such case the evidence would have shown that the accused may have had the opportunity to commit the crime and take the body to the place at which it was found in the road. Whereas, if the fact was that there was no proof of where the killing took place (the evidence showing that the deceased was not killed at the place at which his body was found), there was an absence of evidence to show that the accused had the opportunity to commit the crime and dispose of the body as aforesaid. In such situation the fact that the deceased was killed at the place in close proximity to Coleman's house was an essential link in the chain of the circumstantial evidence relied on by the commonwealth to connect the accused with the commission of the crime.

Accordingly, as appears from one of the bills of exception in the case, the attorney for the commonwealth, in his closing argument before the jury, made the following statement:

"The facts are that George Dickerson was behind that house selling whisky. Rickman went back there and bought whisky from him and accused him of watering it, and they had a row about it. After Rickman left George Dickerson he went back there, and the difficulty was renewed. Of course we do not contend George Dickerson changed his shoes then; he didn't have time; he chased him across that field, killed him, laid him over the fence, and then came back to the house and put on Coleman's shoes, and then carried the body to where it was found in the road."

To such statement of the attorney for the commonwealth the accused by counsel objected, on the ground that it was not supported by the evidence, and that there was no evidence in the case on which to base the statement; that it was an appeal to the prejudice and passion of the jury, and moved the court to tell the jury not to consider this statement; but the court overruled the defendant's objection to said argument, and declined to instruct the jury to disregard the same. This action of the court is made the basis of one of the assignments of error.

We are of opinion that this assignment of error is well taken.

There was before the jury absolutely no evidence of any probative value, even if it had been a civil case, that any human being was killed at the place referred to in the statement of the commonwealth's attorney.

There was no evidence whatever of tracks made by the shoes of Coleman, making the nailprints, or of any other tracks, going from the alleged place of the killing to the place where the body was found in the road. There was no evidence explaining why such vestiges were not apparent on the ground, if they were looked for and were not found; and we find no evidence in the record of the existence of any fence, such as is referred to in the statement of the attorney for the commonwealth.

There was no evidence that the blood seen at this place was human blood, or that the tracks from the house across the open field, made by some person wearing No. 5 shoes, were made by the deceased, rather than by some other person wearing that size shoes. No peculiarity whatever about such tracks was shown in evidence.

Preceding the party, doubtless many fowls, and likely some animals, were killed to provide food which was sold at the party. The whole of the testimony for the commonwealth on the subject under consideration is entirely consistent with the theory that the tracks of the three or four persons seen across the open ground near the house (not merely of two persons, of the deceased and accused, according to the statement of the commonwealth's attorney) were the tracks of some persons chasing a fowl or a pig; that the blood on the ground was the blood of a fowl or of an animal caught and killed there; and that the disturbance of the ground at that place was caused by a no more serious tragedy. And as to the club: There were doubtless many such lying about that and other bodies of woods in the vicinity. There was no evidence that this club had struck across the body of any person or had been handled by human hands recently before it was found. Indeed the evidence fails to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the wound in the back of the deceased was made with any club whatever. This wound may have been made, consistently with all of the evidence, by some other instrument, possibly by some automobile running over the dead body in the road. This hypothesis is consistent with the evidence as it appears in the record.

And the circumstance of the public disappointment which would naturally ensue if all of the many persons suspected of and charged with the crime should escape conviction rendered it peculiarly a case in which the jury were liable to be misled into drawing inferences and reaching conclusions touching the guilt of the accused not warranted by a calm and dispassionate consideration of the evidence.

It seems plain, therefore, that the action of the trial court in overruling the objection to the statement of the commonwealth's attorney and refusing to instruct the jury to disregard such statement misled the jury into erroneously thinking that there was sufficient evidence before them to sustain the theory of the commonwealth's attorney that the killing took place in close proximity to the house in which the accused was, as aforesaid; and that the testimony of Coleman was thus corroborated. And we are convinced by the considerations aforesaid that but for being so misled the jury would not have convicted the accused upon the other evidence in the case.

Because of such action of the trial court the case must be reversed, and a new trial will be granted to the accused.

Reversed and new trial granted.

RENNOLDS v. AVERY.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Sales \S 180(4) — Partial acceptance not based on satisfaction with quality does not imply agreement to accept.

Where the buyer accepts a portion of the goods delivered for a reason which is not inconsistent with a subsequent refusal to accept the balance of the goods, which were of the same quality as those accepted, because of their quality, such partial acceptance does not raise an implied acceptance of all of the goods.

2. Sales \S 182(4) — Evidence held to raise question for jury whether partial acceptance was implied agreement to accept.

Testimony by the buyer's inspector that he accepted a part of the piles delivered by the seller, though they were not merchantable, because he thought the defects were occasioned by delay in inspection, and it was the buyer's policy not to require the seller to stand the loss caused by such delay, raised a question for the jury whether the partial acceptance was an implied agreement to accept all, so that it was error to charge that, if part of the goods were accepted, the buyer could not reject the others, which were of the same quality, because they were not merchantable.

Error to Circuit Court, Charles City County.

Action by J. W. Avery against P. J. Rennolds, doing business under the firm name and style of J. A. Rennolds & Bro. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and new trial awarded.

This action was instituted by J. W. Avery, the defendant in error (who will be hereinafter called plaintiff), against P. J. Rennolds, trading and doing business under the firm name and style of J. A. Rennolds & Bro., the plaintiff in error (who will be hereinafter called defendant). By the action the plaintiff seeks to recover of the defendant damages for the failure and refusal of the latter to accept certain piling delivered by the plaintiff on a certain landing, which the plaintiff claims the defendant agreed to accept and pay for at certain prices when so delivered.

There have been two trials of the case. On the first trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff for $750 damages, which the trial court, on motion of the defendant, set aside. On the second trial there was again a verdict for the plaintiff, this time for the sum of $946.92 damages. The trial court entered judgment in accordance with the last-named verdict, and it is that judgment which is under review.

The defendant is a large dealer in piling, and the plaintiff for a number of years has been selling pine piling to the defendant.

This dealing between the plaintiff and defendant had been going on over a period of about 12 years before the present litigation arose. The dealing proceeded under a general contract or understanding between the parties, in accordance with which no specific quantity of piling to be delivered by the plaintiff, or specific prices to be paid by the defendant, were agreed upon; but it was mutually understood that the defendant would from time to time accept in the usual course of business whatever pine piling the plaintiff delivered, of certain standard sizes and lengths, of merchantable quality and condition, at certain landings, the acceptance of the piling by the defendant to be through its inspector, with the right to reject such piling as did not meet the standard size and length requirements, and as was not of merchantable quality and condition; and the prices to be paid were to be the market prices which the defendant was, at the time and place of each inspection and acceptance, paying to others generally for piling of the particular sizes, lengths, quality, and condition which the piling delivered by the plaintiff might be found to conform to, upon the inspection of it.

The plaintiff claims that, acting under the general contract or understanding mentioned, he, between the latter part of July and November 1, 1917, delivered on Courthouse Creek landing, in Charles City county, 800 sticks or pieces of pine piling, of standard sizes and lengths, and of merchantable quality and condition.

There is a sharp conflict between the testimony before the jury for the plaintiff and that for the defendant, on the subject of the condition of the piling when it was delivered on the landing. The testimony for the defendant is to the effect that it was all more or less worm-eaten, rotten, etc., and that none of it was in merchantable condition when delivered on the landing.

Through its inspector, Hall, the defendant did, however, on September 28, 1917, inspect and accept 214 sticks and on October 13, 1917, 125 sticks, making 339 sticks of the piling on the landing aforesaid which were accepted by the defendant, for which the defendant in due course paid the plaintiff. That, however, left of the said 800 sticks, according to the claim of the plaintiff, 461 sticks of the piling still remaining on the landing as of November 1, 1917, unaccepted and unpaid for. This residue of piling the defendant refused to accept, and it was to recover damages for such refusal of the defendant that the action was brought.

Among the grounds of defense filed by the defendant is the claim that the defendant was justified in his refusal to accept such residue of the piling because all of it was more or less worm-eaten, rotten, etc., and none of it in merchantable condition when it was delivered on the landing. And the testimony for the defendant was to the effect, as aforesaid, that all of the piling the defendant failed and refused to accept was in such condition, and that none of it was in a merchantable condition when delivered on the landing.

It developed, however, from the evidence introduced in the progress of the trial (the last trial, being here referred to), that the piling which the defendant refused to accept and left on the landing was probably in no worse condition than the piling the defendant accepted and paid for. To explain the acceptance of the 339 sticks of piling under such circumstances, Hall, the inspector, and a witness for the defendant testified, in substance, as follows:

That the 339 sticks of piling which were accepted were not in fact in a merchantable condition. That he accepted them, however, under and because of the mistaken impression that they had gotten in that condition while on the landing awaiting inspection, due to the fault of the defendant in not having sent and had them inspected and accepted sooner. That it was the custom of the defendant not to allow any one to lose through his neglect, and that, acting upon that custom, and because of the mistaken impression aforesaid, the witness accepted the 339 sticks as aforesaid. That but for such mistake none of the 339 sticks of piling would have been accepted.

M. H. Barnes, of Providence Forge, and R. E. Peyton, Jr., of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

Henley, Hall, Hall & Peachy, of Williamsburg, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

There are a number of questions raised by the assignments of error, but in the view we take of it we find one of them decisive of the case, and that is this:

(1) Did the court err in giving instruction No. 3 at the request of the plaintiff and in refusing instruction E, asked for by the defendant, on the subject of the effect of the acceptance and appropriation by the defendant of a part of the piling which the plaintiff delivered on the landing and tendered as in performance of the contract on his part?

This question must be answered in the affirmative, in view of the testimony for the defendant on this subject which was taken from the consideration of the jury by this action on the part of the court.

Instruction No. 3, in question, is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they shall believe from the evidence that the defendant had agreed to purchase from the plaintiff 800 sticks of pine piling, and that said plaintiff hauled the said piling to the landing on Court-house creek, ready for delivery, and notified the defendant that said piling was ready for delivery, and if the jury shall further believe from the evidence that the defendant, by his agent, O. C. Hall, inspected and accepted 339 sticks of said piling, and that the piling so accepted by the said defendant, through its agent, was of like quality and condition with the rest of the sticks of pine piling left on said landing, it there and then became the duty of said defendant to accept and pay for the rest and residue of said piling. And if the jury believe from the evidence that 461 sticks of pine piling was left upon said landing of like quality with those accepted by said defendant, and that the said defendant has failed or refused to accept and pay for same, then you must find for the plaintiff and assess his damages at the contract price for said piling, less the price received by the plaintiff for the sale of said piling, provided you shall believe from the evidence that the said plaintiff sold and disposed of said piling to the best advantage and with proper diligence in disposing of said piling."

Instruction E in question is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence there was an acceptance of a part of the piling by the agent, Hall, under the mistaken idea that the piling were injured by the fault of his principal, Rennolds, and he accepted the same according to usual custom, then there was no implied warranty¹ that all the piling were accepted." (Italics supplied.)

[1] The plaintiff relies on Syer & Co. v. Lester, 116 Va. 541, 82 S. E. 122, to sustain instruction No. 3. It is there held that—

"Acceptance and appropriation of a part of a shipment of goods, with full knowledge of deficiency in their quality and quantity, implies an agreement for the acceptance of the whole."

[2] But this rule may need qualification where a single shipment or alleged delivery of goods is involved; and certainly it has no application where more than the partial acceptance is induced by such a reason that there is no inconsistency between such acceptance and the refusal to accept the residue of the goods on the ground that they do not conform to the contract requirements with respect to quality, etc. Such was the character of the reason for the partial acceptance which the defendant claimed in the instant case. The question of fact whether that was the true reason for such partial acceptance should have been left to the decision of the jury upon all the evidence in the case. The defendant had the right to have the jury consider the testimony of Hall on that subject. The refusal of instruction E and the giving of instruction No. 3 in the form in which it was given took that question of fact, and all consideration of Hall's testimony bearing upon it, entirely away from the jury. This was error and harmful error, because of which we feel constrained to reverse the case.

As to the other assignments of error:

As the other assignments of error present no novel question, and as the case will be reversed on the ground above stated, we deem it sufficient to say as to such assignments of error that we find no merit in any of them.

The case will be reversed, and a new trial de novo awarded, to be had in conformity with the views above expressed.
Reversed.

STATE v. McCOY. (No. 4571.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 23, 1922.)

1. Jury \Leftrightarrow 7—Statute held to intend notice to accused before drawing jurors from another county.

Where a statute relating to the trial of criminal cases authorizes the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, if in the opinion of the court or judge qualified jurors not exempt from service can not be found in the county in which the trial is to be had, to cause jurors to be summoned from another county in the manner provided by the statute, but the statute provides for no notice to the accused of such proposed proceeding, the court or judge should adopt such practice or proceeding as will attain the ends of justice and avoid surprise, and give the defendant, if accused of a felony, an opportunity to be present to defend his rights. And in all such cases it will be assumed that notice to the accused was intended by the Legislature.

2. Jury \Leftrightarrow 7—A judgment convicting of a felony on a verdict by a jury drawn from another county without notice to defendant will be reversed for new trial.

Where one charged with a felony has been tried and convicted by a jury drawn from another county upon an order entered in his absence and without notice to him, the judgment on the verdict will be reversed and the prisoner awarded a new trial.

3. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 1134(3)—Where conviction of a felony is reversed for failure to give defendant notice of the drawing of jury from another county, the constitutionality of statute authorizing it not considered.

Where one charged with a felony has been tried and convicted by a jury so drawn from another county, the court will reverse the judgment on this ground without consideration of the constitutionality of the statute, because not necessary to the relief sought.

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County.

J. C. McCoy was convicted of murder in the first degree, sentenced to imprisonment for life, and he brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and new trial awarded.

Harold W. Houston, of Charleston, Thomas West, of Williamson, and Charles J. Van Fleet, of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. A. Blessing and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Attys. Gen., for the State.

MILLER, J. The grand jury of Mingo county, on August 27, 1921, returned an indictment against defendant and two others for the murder of one Staten.

On September 9th following, by an order entered in term, the circuit court, in the absence of defendant, upon the motion of the State, supported by the affidavits of the two jury commissioners and the sheriff of the county, filed, but not in the record, certified that it appeared to the court and that the court was of opinion that qualified jurors not exempt from service could not be conveniently found in the county of Mingo for the trial of the case, and it was thereupon ordered that fifty qualified jurors, not exempt from service, should be drawn and summoned from the county of Monroe, as required by law, to appear at the court house of said Mingo County on the 19th day of September, 1921, for the purpose of the trial of the case, and the clerk was directed to certify an attested copy of the order of the circuit court of said county to the circuit court of Monroe County, or the judge thereof in vacation.

On September 20, 1921, the defendants so jointly indicted, being set to the bar of the court, elected to be tried separately, and the State by the prosecuting attorney elected to try the defendant J. C. McCoy first, and announced that the State was ready for trial.

Whereupon defendant McCoy moved the court to set aside the order of September 9th, and also moved the court to quash the venire facias issued pursuant to said order and to discharge the jurors summoned thereunder and then in attendance upon the court, assigning the following grounds:

First, that the statute, section 21, chapter 116 of the Code, as amended by chapter 69, Acts 1921, contravenes section 14, article 3 of the Constitution of West Virginia, and the sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and is unconstitutional and void;

Second, that said order was entered in his absence, and without notice to or knowledge by him, and at a time when the case was not on trial or called for trial;

Third, that at the time said order was made there were then and still were over three thousand persons in said Mingo County subject to and qualified for jury service, and residents of and domiciled in said Mingo County, and that before said order was entered no examination of any kind had been made of said persons, on their voir dire or otherwise, to determine the necessity of calling jurors from Monroe County;

Fourth, that said order was not made and entered twenty days before the then present term, namely September 5, 1921, nor twenty days before the term began, and that the proceeding relating to the drawing of the said jurors from Monroe County was not certified as required by law.

This motion of the prisoner was overruled, the court reaffirming its opinion that a fair and impartial jury could not be obtained in Mingo County to try the case; and on motion of the prosecuting attorney, it was further ordered that all the prior proceedings and orders relating to the summoning of the jurors from Monroe County be spread upon the record, to which the defendant by counsel objected and excepted.

Defendant thereupon entered his plea of not guilty, on which issue was joined by the State; and the jury was then impaneled and sworn; and the trial was proceeded with, resulting in a verdict of murder in the first degree, and the judgment of the court thereon that defendant be imprisoned in the penitentiary for the remainder of his life.

[1] The evidence was not certified and is not before us for examination of any of the errors assigned relating thereto. Nor can the instructions to the jury, given and refused, though printed in the record, if properly before us, be considered.

The only questions we can consider are those presented by the motions of the defendant pertaining to the summoning of the jury to try the case.

The statute assailed as unconstitutional and void, and pursuant to which the jury was drawn to try the case, is as follows:

"And in any criminal case in any court, if, in the opinion of the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, qualified jurors, not exempt from serving, cannot be conveniently found in the county in which the trial is to be, the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, shall enter an order of record to such effect, and may cause so many of such jurors, as may be necessary, to be summoned from any other county. In said order the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, shall fix a day on which such jurors shall be required to attend, and in such order shall be indicated the county from which such jurors shall be drawn, and the number of such jurors to be drawn. An attested copy of such order shall be certified to the circuit court of the county designated, or to the judge thereof in vacation, and thereupon such circuit court or the judge thereof in vacation, shall, by order, direct that a jury be drawn, in the manner provided by law for the drawing of petit jurors in his county, and proceedings respecting the drawing of such jurors, including the names of the jurors so drawn, shall be certified by the clerk of the circuit court of the county designated to the clerk of the court wherein the trial is to be had. Thereupon, writ of venire facias shall be issued by the clerk of the court wherein the trial is to be, directed to the sheriff of the county wherein such jurors have been drawn, commanding him to summon the jurors so drawn to attend for jury service in the county wherein the trial is to be upon the day named in the writ. Said jurors shall attend for the purpose of the trial, and the jury shall be selected in the manner provided by law."

Section 14, article 3 of the Constitution, relied on, is as follows:

"Trials of crimes, and misdemeanors, unless herein otherwise provided, shall be by a jury of twelve men, public, without unreasonable delay, and in the county where the alleged offence was committed, unless upon petition of the accused, and for good cause shown, it is removed to some other county."

If the defendant was entitled to notice and to be present and heard on the motion of the prosecuting attorney to summon a jury from another county, and before any action of the court thereon pursuant to said statute, a question presented by the second of his grounds assigned for setting aside the order and quashing the venire facias issued pursuant thereto, we need not consider any of the other grounds, for, if well founded, it will be sufficient to reverse the judgment; and the questions presented by the others may never arise, for the court may deny the motion of the prosecutor, and may sustain defendant's objection, in which event the constitutional questions relied on may never arise.

The statute does not in terms require notice to defendant; but in so important and vital a matter as the constitution of the jury or the place of trial, can it be assumed that the Legislature intended that the proceedings authorized should take place without notice to or in the absence of one accused of a felony? If it had been a motion by the prisoner for a change of venue, the State would have been entitled to a hearing and to oppose and even defeat the prisoner's motion unless good cause was shown therefor. In effect the summoning of a jury from another county amounts to a change of venue, and to give the statute a construction that would deprive one accused of crime of the right to be heard thereon, would at once condemn the law as invalid.

We are not wanting in precedents in this State on the question thus presented. In Dixon v. Dixon, 73 W. Va. 7, 9, 79 S. E. 1016, following prior decisions, it is said to be within the power of courts, when administering statutes, to adopt such practice or procedure as will attain the ends of justice, avoid surprise and give the parties opportunity to answer charges seeking to impose liability upon them, and furthermore, that where a statute allows a judicial proceeding to a man's prejudice, though it do not provide for notice, it is understood to intend it, as no judgment can be given under it without process, and process is necessary. So also in B. & O. Railroad Co. v. P., W. & Ky. Railroad Co., 17 W. Va. 812, it was decided that wherever a statute authorizes a legal proceeding against anyone and does not expressly provide for notice to be given, it is implied that an opportunity shall be offered him to appear in defense of his rights unless the contrary appear. In Cooper v. Bennett, 70 W. Va. 110, 73 S. E. 260, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 851, we decided that the summons and proceedings at rules can not be dispensed with by notice of an intention to apply to a court of equity for a final decree.

[2] In this State the rule is firmly established that in felony cases nothing can be done lawfully in the absence of the prisoner affecting his rights, from the inception of the trial upon the indictment to the final judgment inclusive, and that the record must show his presence. State v. Parsons, 39 W. Va. 464, 19 S. E. 876; State v. Grove, 74 W. Va. 702, 82 S. E. 1019. In State v. Sutter, 71 W. Va. 371, 76 S. E. 811, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 399, the fact that the judge and the attorneys on both sides retired to an adjoining room and in the absence of the prisoner heard a motion to strike out the evidence of the State, was regarded such a denial of the prisoner's rights as to call for a new trial, although on discovery of his absence the judge offered to allow him to renew his motion, which he declined to do. In State v. Stevenson, 64 W. Va. 392, 399, 62 S. E. 688, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713, it was held to be error invading the prisoner's rights and calling for reversal, for the court in his absence to call witnesses to be advised as to the character of the offense as to what judgment should be pronounced on the verdict returned by the jury on the trial before a special judge.

It would not be contended for a moment, in the face of our decisions, that the hearing of a motion by the accused for a change of venue could lawfully be conducted in his absence. Such a proceeding would be cause for reversal; and certainly where, as in this case, the motion to summon a jury from another county was by the State, the proceedings should not be allowed to go on in the absence of the prisoner, whereby he might be deprived of the right to trial by a jury of his own county. We can not conceive of a proceeding more vital to the constitutional right of one accused of crime. He has the undoubted right to be present in person and by counsel at every turn in the case, and nothing can be done lawfully in his absence. In the comparatively recent case of State v. Hoke, 76 W. Va. 38, 84 S. E. 1054, the rule just stated was invoked by the prisoner, who claimed that it had been violated by the order of the court made several days after conviction and final judgment, permitting the withdrawal of certain books of original entry which had been used in evidence, and it was properly decided that none of defendant's rights were thereby violated. But that case has no application bearing on the case at bar. The order of the court could have worked no prejudice to the rights of the accused.

[3] As the error in the proceedings by which the jury was drawn from Monroe County is sufficient to call for reversal of the judgment and the award of a new trial, as already stated it will be unnecessary to consider the other grounds of defendant's motion, involving as they do the constitutionality of the statute under which the jury was drawn. In such cases the right of a defendant generally depends upon whether or not there is error in the record aside from the constitutional questions. Edgell v. Conaway, 24 W. Va. 747, 749. As nothing presented here necessarily calls for a decision of the other questions presented, we adhere to the general rule here and everywhere observed, that courts will not pass upon such questions except in cases of necessity. Edgell v. Conaway, supra; Shepherd v. Wheeling, 30 W. Va. 479, 4 S. E. 635; Rutter & Co. v. Sullivan, 25 W. Va. 427; Peyton v. Holley, 72 W. Va. 540, 542, 78 S. E. 666.

Our conclusion is that the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the prisoner be awarded a new trial.

MOORE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Intoxicating Liquors §236(5)—Evidence of finding liquor held to sustain conviction.

Unexplained and uncontradicted evidence that liquor was found on defendant's premises held to sustain conviction for a violation of the Prohibition Law, under section 28.

2. Intoxicating Liquors §236(5)—Finding of liquor on owner's premises prima facie evidence of violation of Prohibition Law, notwithstanding occupancy of premises by others.

Under Prohibition Law, § 28, the finding of intoxicating liquor on defendant's premises is prima facie evidence of the violation of the Prohibition Law, notwithstanding occupancy of premises by others.

Error to Corporation Court of Norfolk.

Edward Moore was convicted of violating the Prohibition Law, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Tomlin & Maupin, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. [1] The accused has been found guilty of a violation of the Prohibition Law (Laws 1918, c. 388), and is here assigning a single error; that is, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the conviction.

It is not necessary to recite all of the testimony, though there is little conflict. It appears that two police officers of the city of Norfolk procured a search warrant, authorizing a search of the premises of the accused for intoxicating liquor. No such liquor was found in the dwelling, but in the back yard, within the curtilage, they found in the garage about one gallon of corn whisky, and in the tool box of the automobile belonging to the accused, then in the garage, a gallon jug about one-half full of corn whisky. As they were about to enter the garage with the accused and his wife, one of the officer's attention was attracted by the wife, who appeared to be making her way to the weeds growing near the side of the garage, and following her he found there a box containing thirteen half-pint bottles and one pint bottle, all filled with corn whisky. They also found two pints of corn whisky concealed in the privy in the yard, and in a chicken coop one gallon of corn whisky, and on the premises a bag partly full of corks and empty pint bottles. These facts were testified to by both of the officers. The accused testified in his own behalf and introduced no other evidence. He denied all knowledge of the whisky, but testified that the automobile was his exclusive property, and that no one else had any right to the possession of the garage or chicken coop; that, while he owned and occupied the premises with his wife and one child, his brother-in-law, a man about 40 years old, and his half-brother, about 26 years old, lived on the premises, renting rooms from him, both of whom were there on the night of the search.

By section 28 of the Prohibition Law (Acts 1918, p. 599), it is provided that—

"Whenever ardent spirits shall be seized in any room, building, boat, car or other place, searched under the provisions of this act, the finding of such ardent spirits * * * in any such place, shall be prima facie evidence of the unlawful manufacturing, selling, keeping and storing for sale, gift, or use, by the person or persons occupying such premises * * * and the proprietor or other person in charge of the premises where such ardent spirits are found" shall be indicted and tried therefor.

It is clear then, under this statute, that the unexplained and uncontradicted facts which we have recited fully justify the conviction.

[2] The mere suggestion that some of the other occupants of the premises may have been also guilty may be true, but this does not warrant the acquittal of the accused. So to construe this statute would be to thwart its manifest design, to suppress the the illicit traffic in ardent spirits, would under the evidence in this case result in the acquittal of all of such occupants and thereby give aid and comfort to all others who contemptuously disregard the law.

Affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

MOORE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Intoxicating liquors \S 236(20)—Evidence held insufficient to prove corpus delicti in prosecution for transporting liquor.

In prosecution for unlawfully transporting intoxicating liquor in excess of one quart, evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction in that it failed to prove the corpus delicti.

2. Criminal law \S 535(2)—Defendant's extrajudicial confession not alone sufficient to establish corpus delicti.

Even a confession by the accused, which is extrajudicial, that he committed the offense with which he is charged, is not, alone and uncorroborated, adequate proof to establish the corpus delicti.

Error to Circuit Court, Scott County.

Robert Moore was convicted of unlawfully transporting intoxicating liquor, and he brings error. Reversed.

The accused was separately indicted, charged with the offense of unlawfully transporting ardent spirits in excess of one quart, to wit, ten gallons, in, on, and by means of a certain automobile. He was tried and convicted of this offense. The verdict of the jury fixed as his punishment a certain fine and confinement in the county jail, and the judgment under review was entered accordingly.

The testimony for the commonwealth, so far as material, was to the following effect:

A county policeman, having received information that "a car was coming up the pike," deputized a number of men to assist him in holding it up and searching it for liquor, but had no warrant authorizing him to do so. They subsequently saw an automobile coming along the public road, with two men in it, the driver, named Wilson, and the accused. Whereupon the policeman halted the occupants of the car, commanding them to "surrender," get out, and let him search the car. Wilson asked the policeman if he had a warrant to search the car. The policeman replied that he did not, but said: "We have you surrounded; surrender and I will treat you nice." Wilson said, "No." The policeman said: "I will treat you nice. Get out and let me search the car." Wilson said: "That may be nice for you, but it will be hell for us." The policeman then stepped up to the car and saw that both men in the car had pistols. Wilson got his pistol from his side; and when he pulled it from under his coat the policeman caught hold of his wrist. Thereupon Wilson said: "I would rather have my brains shot out than my mother know this." The accused had a pistol in his hand. Wilson told the policeman not to enter the car. The policeman again asked to be allowed to search the car. Wilson then turned towards the accused and said: "What about it, old man?" And the accused said: "Hell, no." The officers held up the car for nearly an hour. The curtains were up. The policeman and two of his deputies testified that they saw "two kegs and what looked like another keg in the car." The policeman testified that when he stepped up to the car he "smelt liquor; it smelled like corn whiskey." Two of the deputies testified that they "smelled liquor in the automobile," and one of these said that it "smelled like good liquor." The testimony does not show that the accused said anything except his reply above stated to the question of Wilson addressed to him above mentioned. After the parley and the refusal of Wilson and the accused to let the car be searched without a search warrant, the car was allowed to proceed on its way.

The accused, testifying in his own defense, stated that he was not the owner of the car; that Wilson was the owner of it; that he (the accused) was "only a passenger in it"; that there were no kegs in the car or liquor in it that he knew of; that he did not know any of the parties who held them up; that he thought there were nine of the men engaged in the hold up, with four shotguns and five pistols; that—

"They were strangers, and we did not know what they meant. We asked them if they had any authority, and they said they did not. They wanted to search the automobile, so they said, and Mr. Wilson told them that if they had a warrant they could; but if they did not have a warrant they could not. I had a little bit of money on me, and Mr. Wilson said he had a little too. There was considerable talking and some wrangling, but finally we were permitted to go on."

On cross-examination he further stated:

"* * * I did not know what they meant. I understood them to say they wanted to search the car, but they were strangers and armed, and I did not know their purpose. I was just a passenger in the car; got in at Castlewood.

It was my business where I had been and what I was doing."

Several witnesses for the defense who had as good opportunities to see the kegs in the car as the accused had, so far as disclosed by the evidence, testified that they did not see any kegs in the car.

In the brief of the Attorney General and his two assistants this is said:

"* * * While we will not confess error, we frankly admit that there is doubt in our minds whether the evidence substantiates the charge of transporting whisky."

W. S. Cox, of Gate City, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J. (after stating the facts as above). In our view of the case it will be necessary for us to consider only one of the questions raised by the assignments of error, and that is this:

[1] 1. Was there any evidence before the jury to prove the corpus delicti?

This question must be answered in the negative.

That ardent spirits, in quantity exceeding one quart, was being transported by some one at the time in question, was the allegation of the indictment, and hence was the corpus delicti in the case in judgment. There was absolutely no evidence of any probative value before the jury on this subject. Even if we could consider that the testimony as to the kegs and the smelling of whisky or liquor by the witnesses for the commonwealth warranted the jury in finding the fact that ardent spirits were in the automobile at the time, such evidence falls far short of the character of evidence essential to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the quantity of the liquor exceeded a quart. And having given the utmost effect which can be properly given to the consideration that the jury may have believed that the accused swore falsely in his testimony in his own defense, still no inference which the jury might have been warranted in drawing for that reason could supply that character of proof of the corpus delicti which the law requires in all criminal cases.

[2] Even a confession by the accused, which is extrajudicial, that he committed the offense with which he is charged, is not, alone and uncorroborated, adequate proof to establish the corpus delicti.

The case must therefore be Reversed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

CHRISTIAN v. COMMONWEALTH.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 30, 1922.)1. Indictment and information §75(1)—
Omission of commas not demurrable defect.

Demurrer to indictment under Prohibition Act, § 7, because a comma was omitted after accused's name, as well as after the word "indictment," was properly overruled.

2. Intoxicating liquors §134 — Liquid need not contain alcohol to be "ardent spirits" within Prohibition Act.

Under Prohibition Act, §§ 1, 49, 58, liquids, mixtures, and preparations which will produce intoxication, as defined in the act, are "ardent spirits" condemned by the act whether or not they contain alcohol.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ardent Spirits.]

Error to Circuit Court, Mathews County.

Julian T. Christian was convicted of violating the prohibition act, and brings error. Affirmed.

C. S. Smith, Jr., of Gloucester, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

PRENTIS, J. The accused has been found guilty of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors under the prohibition act (Acts 1918, p. 578), and is here assigning error.

[1] Among the errors assigned is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, which is in the form authorized by section 7 of the act, and the grounds assigned for the demurrer are that a comma is omitted after the defendant's name, as well as after the word "indictment."

"If reasons were as plenty as blackberries," it would be unnecessary to give one to sustain this ruling of the trial court, which is so obviously correct.

The accused was the proprietor of a store at Mathews C. H., and sold to his customers a beverage which the evidence of the commonwealth sufficiently shows produced intoxication in those who drank it, though there is also evidence that the effect resembled the effect produced by narcotics instead of by alcohol. The name chosen for the concoction, "highball," is certainly suggestive of alcohol.

[2] The other errors assigned are one in substance, and require a construction of certain sections of the act. Section 1 reads thus:

"The words ardent spirits, as used in this act, shall be construed to embrace alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, wine, porter, ale, beer, all malt liquors, all malt beverages, absinthe and all compounds or mixtures of any of them; all compounds or mixtures of any of them with any vegetable or other substance; alcoholic bitters, bitters containing alcohol; also all liquids, mixtures or preparations, whether patented or otherwise, which will produce intoxication, fruits preserved in ardent spirits, and all beverages containing more than one-half of one per centum of alcohol by volume, except as herein provided."

The beverage was not analyzed, and the accused contends in support of his motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and of his assignments of error as to the instructions given and refused, that under the act it is essential for the commonwealth to prove that the beverage sold contained alcohol. That the words "ardent spirits" as usually construed designate a liquid containing alcohol cannot be doubted, so that the question presented by this record is whether or not the mixture which was sold by the accused is a beverage condemned by the act and is ardent spirits, the sale of which is thereby prohibited.

It is clear, however, from section 1 that the usual construction of the words "ardent spirits" cannot be adopted, because the act itself construes these words; and, among the beverages defined by the statute as ardent spirits, which definition is separated by a semicolon from the preceding words of the section, which refer altogether to those beverages which contain alcohol, are beverages thus defined, "also all liquids, mixtures or preparations, whether patented or otherwise, which will produce intoxication." So that if a beverage will produce intoxication, its sale is prohibited. Then the act also, in section 49 defines "intoxication" thus:

"Any person who has drunk enough ardent spirits to so affect his manner, disposition, speech, muscular movements, general appearance or behavior, as to be apparent to observation, shall be deemed for the purposes of this act, to be intoxicated. * * *

For the purposes of the act then both ardent spirits and intoxication are defined. It seems to us that a mere recital of these provisions is sufficient to demonstrate that the General Assembly intended to enlarge the meaning of these words, as applied to prosecutions under the act. It therefore follows that liquids, mixtures, and preparations which will produce intoxication, as defined in the act, are clearly condemned whether they contain alcohol or not. We are confirmed in this view by section 58, which reads thus:

"This entire act shall be deemed an exercise of the police power of the state for the protection of the state, for the protection of the public health, peace and morals, and the prevention of the sale and use of ardent spirits, and all of its provisions shall be liberally construed to effect these objects."

It is as clearly within the police power of the state to prohibit the sale of other beverages which produce intoxication and thus affect the public health, peace and morals as it is to prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages which also produce disastrous results when used to excess. The decisive question here presented is whether or not the General Assembly has thus condemned beverages which produce intoxication, although they may not contain alcohol. Construing the words of these statutes according to their clear and generally accepted meaning, it seems to us perfectly apparent, under the evidence in this case, that the liquid mixture which the accused sold to his customers produced intoxication, and hence is within the condemnation of the act. It is not perfectly clear that it contained alcohol. It is thus described: The accused bought on an average of once a month five-gallon cans of a liquid marked "turpentine." This liquid was dispensed either with a soft drink known to the trade as "Green River," or with another known as "Pepsi-Cola." The other mixture labeled "turpentine" was poured into an ordinary glass to about the depth of an inch, and then the glass was filled with "Green River" or "Pepsi-Cola," and the resulting concoction was sold at 25 cents a glass. The medical testimony is that turpentine contains no alcohol, and that, if poured an inch deep in an ordinary glass and used as a beverage, it would probably poison or kill the person who drank it; and that no responsible drug house in the United States would sell narcotics in five-gallon cans. So that we conclude that the designation "turpentine" was chosen for purposes of deception, and the record leaves us ignorant as to just what it was. According to the witnesses, it produced intoxication as defined by the act, and we find no error in the procedure.

Affirmed.

BOWEN v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Jury \S 82(2)—Misdemeanant may waive irregularities in organization and constitution of jury.

Though the guaranty (Const. 1902, \S 8) of the right to a jury trial applies to misdemeanors as well as felonies, one tried for a misdemeanor may waive all irregularities in the organization and constitution of the jury.

2. Criminal law \S 895—Accused may waive anything except jurisdiction.

Accused may waive any matter not relating to the court's jurisdiction.

3. Jury \S 29(5)—Irregularity in trial of misdemeanor before jury of seven waived by failure to object; "impaneled."

Under Code 1919, \S 4895, declaring that no irregularity in impaneling jurors shall be cause for setting aside a verdict unless objection was made before the jury was sworn, any irregularity in trying a misdemeanor case before a jury of seven, instead of five, as required by section 4927, was waived, where defendant made no objection and challenged none of the jurors; a jury being "impaneled" when ready to try the case (quoting Words and Phrases, First Series, Impanel).

Error to Corporation Court of Buena Vista.

W. R. Bowen was convicted of petit larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

John Dabney Smith, of Buena Vista, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. The defendant, W. R. Bowen, was arrested and tried by the mayor of the city of Buena Vista upon a warrant charging him with the larceny of certain brass pipes, valves, and other brass articles, of the value of $35, and was sentenced to serve a term of six months on the state convict road force. From that sentence he appealed to the corporation court, where he was tried by a jury, found guilty, and again sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

The sole ground on which we are asked to reverse the judgment is that the defendant was tried by a jury of seven, instead of five, the latter being the number provided for in such a case by section 4927 of the Code.

The record shows that the court impaneled a jury of seven men, "who, being elected, tried and sworn to well and truly say, and a true verdict render, between the commonwealth and the accused according to law and the evidence," returned the verdict above indicated, and that the defendant moved the court to set the same aside as contrary to the law and the evidence, which motion the court overruled. No grounds whatever for the motion were stated. No exceptions of any kind were noted at the trial. There was no challenge as to any individual juror or as to the jury as a whole. The evidence was not certified, and the foregoing recital contains the substance of the entire record before us.

Section 8 of the Virginia Constitution, so far as material here, provides as follows:

"That in all criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to * * * a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he cannot be found guilty; provided, however, that * * * in a prosecution for an offense not punishable by death, or confinement in the penitentiary, upon a plea of not guilty, with the consent of the accused, given in person, and of the attorney for the commonwealth, both entered of record, the court, in its discretion, may hear and determine the case, without the intervention of a jury; and, that the General Assembly may provide for the trial of offenses not punishable by death or confinement in the penitentiary, by a justice of the peace, without a jury, preserving in all such cases, the right of the accused to an appeal to and trial by jury in the circuit or corporation court; and may also provide for juries consisting of less than twelve, but not less than five, for the trial of offenses not punishable by death, or confinement in the penitentiary, and may classify such cases, and prescribe the number of jurors for each class."

Section 4927 of the Code of 1919 provides, among other things, that—

"Seven jurors shall constitute a panel in the trial of misdemeanors, but the jury therefor shall be composed of five."

Section 4895 of the Code provides that—

"No irregularity in any writ of venire facias, or in the drawing, summoning, returning, or impaneling of jurors * * * shall be cause * * * for setting aside a verdict or granting a new trial, unless objection thereto specifically pointed out, was made before the jury was sworn, and unless it appears that such irregularity, or error, * * * was intentional or such as to probably cause injustice to the Commonwealth or to the accused."

In Brown v. Epps, 91 Va. 726, 21 S. E. 119, 27 L. R. A. 676, this court, overruling Miller v. Commonwealth, 88 Va. 618, 14 S. E. 161, 342, 979, 15 L. R. A. 441, questioned whether the constitutional right to a jury trial was intended to apply to misdemeanors, but, leaving that question open, expressly decided that article 1, § 10, of the Virginia Constitution (Bill of Rights), adopted in 1869, declaring, like section 8 of the present Constitution, "that a man hath a right to a speedy trial by an impartial jury," means that the accused has a legal claim to a jury trial—that such is his privilege—but that the presence of a jury in a criminal trial is not thereby made essential to the jurisdiction of the court, and that the right or privilege thus conferred may be waived. Distinguishing the above-cited section of the Virginia Bill of Rights from article 3, § 2, clause 3 of the United States Constitution, and from the Sixth Amendment thereto, Judge Keith, in Brown v. Epps, supra, said:

"The language of our Bill of Rights differs from each and both of these provisions. It does not declare that 'the trial of all crimes shall be by jury'; it does not declare that 'the accused shall enjoy the right to a trial by an impartial jury,' but its language is 'that a man hath a right to a speedy trial by an impartial jury' that is, he has a legal claim to a trial by a jury. A trial by a jury is his privilege. The existence of the presence of a jury is not made a jurisdictional fact, without which a court is not duly organized for the trial of criminals, as is the case in all courts of the United States."

Both in Miller v. Commonwealth, supra, and Brown v. Epps, supra, it was held that the General Assembly could validly provide for waiver of a jury trial by the accused in a misdemeanor case.

In Schick v. United States, 195 U. S. 65, 72, 24 Sup. Ct. 826, 828, 49 L. Ed. 99, 103 (1 Ann. Cas. 585) Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion of the court said:

"Where there is no constitutional or statutory mandate, and no public policy prohibiting, an accused may waive any privilege which he is given the right to enjoy. Authorities in the state courts are in harmony with this thought. In Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. 80, the defendant in a misdemeanor case waived his right to a full panel and consented to be tried by eleven jurors, and this action was sustained by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Chief Justice Shaw delivering the opinion of the court, said (page 83): 'He may waive any matter of form or substance, excepting only what may relate to the jurisdiction of the court.' The same doctrine was laid down in Murphy v. Commonwealth, 1 Met. (Ky.) 365; Tyra v. Commonwealth, 2 Met. (Ky.) 1; and in State v. Kaufman, 51 Iowa, 578, 33 Am. Rep. 148, 2 N. W. 275. In Connelly v. State, 60 Ala. 89, 31 Am. Rep. 34, a statute authorizing the waiver of a jury was sustained. The same rule was made in State v. Worden, 46 Conn. 349, 33 Am. Rep. 27, which was a case of felony. See, also, People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509, 542."

In the note found in 9 Ann. Cas. 263, citing numerous cases, it is said:

"In jurisdictions wherein it is held that a jury may be waived by the accused, * * * such waiver may be by a failure on the part of the accused to demand a jury."

We have referred to the foregoing authorities, not because we have regarded them, so far as they relate to the waiver of a jury trial, as being directly in point here, but to show how far the courts generally have gone in recognizing the power of a defendant to make, and the power of the trial court to enforce, the waiver of a right or privilege on the part of the accused, when the enjoyment of such right or privilege is not a fact essential to the court's jurisdiction.

[1] It is unquestionably true that under section 8 of the present Constitution in Virginia there can no longer be any doubt that the guaranty of the right to a jury trial applies to misdemeanors as well as to felonies; and it may plausibly be argued that the presence of a jury in any criminal trial in a court of record is now, by reason of the terms of that section, essential to the jurisdiction, unless waived in the precise manner therein prescribed. Whether such an argument be sound, especially where, as here, the case does not originate in a court of record, but is first tried by a magistrate or police justice, we need not decide, because that question is not before us. But there is certainly nothing in the constitutional provision under consideration to warrant the view that a person on trial for a misdemeanor may not waive all irregularities as to the manner in which the jury is organized and constituted, especially where such waiver is provided for by statute.

[2] The reasoning of the above authorities, and the common-sense view of the question, would seem to lead inevitably to this conclusion. The proposition asserted by Chief Justice Shaw quoted by Mr. Justice Brewer in the Schick Case, supra, that the accused "may waive any matter of form or substance, excepting only what may relate to the jurisdiction of the court," is undoubtedly a sensible and sound proposition, supported by the great weight of authority.

[3] The waiver of precisely such an irregularity as the defendant here complains of is provided for by section 4895 of the Code, which expressly declares that—

"No irregularity in * * * impaneling of jurors * * * shall be cause * * * for setting aside a verdict or granting a new trial, unless objection thereto specifically pointed out, was made before the jury was sworn; and unless it appears that such irregularity * * * was intentional or such as to probably cause injustice to the commonwealth or to the accused."

A jury is "impaneled" in a legal sense—certainly in one of the senses in which that term is correctly used in American practice—when it is ready to try the case. Whart. Cr. Law, § 590; 1 Rapalje & Lawrence, Law Dict. 627; 4 Words & Phrases, First Series, p. 3417; State v. Ostrander, 18 Iowa, 446; State v. Hurst, 123 Mo. App. 39, 99 S. W. 820. The irregularity in impaneling the jury in this case was not objected to either specifically or in any way, and there is nothing to indicate the slightest injustice or prejudice to the prisoner. He was tried by a jury of seven instead of five, but, so far as the record shows, the seven were all free from exception, and, in view of this fact, it would seem that, instead of having been prejudiced by a larger number of jurors than the law required, he was presumably given an advantage by the larger number. At common law the right to a jury trial meant the right to be tried by a jury of twelve, and, when the Virginia Constitution reduced the number from twelve to five, the provision was not an enlargement, but a restriction, of the common-law right. It is fair to say, therefore, that instead of getting less the defendant got more than he was entitled to when he was tried by a jury of seven qualified and impartial jurors.

In McCue v. Commonwealth, 103 Va. 870, 1006, 49 S. E. 623, Judge Keith, in an opinion refusing a writ of error to a sentence of death, quoted with approval the following from McKinney v. People, 2 Gilman (Ill.) 540, 43 Am. Dec. 65:

"A prisoner on trial, under our laws, has no right to stand by and suffer irregular proceedings to take place, and then ask to have the proceedings reversed on error, on account of such irregularities. The law, by furnishing him with counsel to defend him, has placed him on the same platform with all other defendants, and if he neglect in proper time to insist on his rights, he waives them."

To award a new trial to this defendant, who brings to us a skeleton record showing no irregularity in his conviction save the fact that he was tried by seven jurors instead of five would be stretching the constitutional and statutory guaranties upon which he relies to an unreasonable extent, and would be little, if any, short of trifling with justice.

No error is shown in the record, and the judgment complained of is affirmed.

Affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

MATHIAS v. HOLLAND et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Waters and water courses §177(1)—Equity may enjoin interference with drainage ditches.

Equity has jurisdiction to entertain suits to enjoin interference with drainage ditches.

2. Injunction §37—If right clear or admitted, no judgment at law necessary.

On application for a permanent injunction, if plaintiff's right is admitted, or, if not admitted, yet on the evidence the court is of opinion that there is no substantial dispute, but that plaintiff's right is clear, the injunction will issue without a preceding judgment at law.

3. Injunction §37—Plaintiff must establish right at law before injunction will be granted if substantial dispute.

When, on an application for an injunction, there is a substantial dispute between the parties, and they have not submitted to have it decided by equity proceedings, the equity court will generally require plaintiff to establish his right at law before granting an injunction.

4. Injunction §37—Plaintiff held required to establish right at law before enjoining interference with drainage ditch.

Where, in a suit to restrain defendant from interfering with a drainage ditch by installing certain pipes and sewers alleged to be too small to carry off the water, and there was a dispute as to whether the long-continued use of the ditch before the drains were put in was adverse or permissive, whether or not a portion of the drain had been in its present condition for more than 15 years, so that plaintiff might be charged with acquiescence, and whether or not the proximate cause of the injuries was the recent diversion of a considerable quantity of water from other lands which did not formerly flow through the drain, there was such a substantial dispute between the parties as to require plaintiff to establish his right at law, before granting a permanent mandatory injunction.

5. Waters and water courses §179(1)—Remaindermen occupying as tenants held entitled to enjoin interference with drain.

Where remaindermen occupy land as tenants from year to year, they have, in either capacity, such a substantial interest in the property and the appurtenant easement of drainage as to entitle them to maintain a suit to enjoin interference with a drainage ditch.

6. Costs §48—Costs properly awarded defendant having no interest in suit.

Where in a suit to enjoin interference with a drainage ditch it appears that defendant before suit had sold the land upon which he was charged with obstructing the drainage, it was proper to dismiss the suit as to him and to award him his costs.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Accomac County.

Suit by William D. Holland and others against J. Stewart Mathias and another. Decree for complainants, and respondent named appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Mapp & Mapp, of Accomac, for appellant. Benj. T. Gunter and Warren Ames, both of Accomac, for appellees.

PRENTIS, J. The appellees (complainants), claiming by prescription the right to drain the surface waters from their land over and through the land of the appellant, Mathias, and one Charles Russell, filed their bill in equity, alleging that their easement had been unlawfully interfered with by certain pipes or sewers which had been placed in the drainage ditch, which were too small to carry off the water; that they had notified Mathias, the appellant, and Russell (defendants) either to remove these drain-pipes entirely or to substitute larger ones which would be sufficient to carry off such water.

The defendants demurred to the bill, and, their demurrer being overruled, they thereupon filed their separate answers thereto. Depositions were taken, and the trial court awarded a peremptory injunction requiring the defendant Mathias to remove the pipes on his land within 30 days, and the questions here presented arise on an appeal from that decree.

[1] There is no error in the decree overruling the demurrer, for the jurisdiction of equity to entertain and determine such cases appears to be perfectly well settled. Sanderlin v. Baxter, 76 Va. 299, 44 Am. Rep. 165; Williams v. Green, 111 Va. 205, 68 S. E. 253; Witt v. Creasey, 117 Va. 872, 86 S. E. 128; Muncy v. Updyke, 119 Va. 636, 89 S. E. 884; Clark v. Reynolds, 125 Va. 626, 100 S. E. 468; Landrum v. Tyler, 126 Va. 600, 101 S. E. 788.

[2, 3] The evidence here, however, discloses some peculiar features which are absent from the cases just cited, and it is suggested that the complainants had no right to an injunction until both the existence of the legal right thus to drain the surface water through the land of the defendant and its disturbance had been established previously in an action at law. Without elaborating this question we adopt the summary found in 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 1963, relating to injunctions to protect easements:

"On application for a permanent injunction, if the plaintiff's right is admitted by the defendant, a judgment at law is not required, as it is obviously unnecessary in such case. So, too, though the defendant denies the plaintiff's right or the fact of a disturbance of it, yet, if, on the evidence before it, the court is of the opinion that there is no substantial dispute, but, indeed that the plaintiff's right is clear, the injunction will issue; the defendant's right to a trial at law at best extends no further than to doubtful questions. And even when the questions in dispute are doubtful, the court of equity will pass on them, if both parties consent or submit to the jurisdiction. When, however, there is a substantial dispute between the parties, and they have not submitted to have it decided by the equity proceedings, the equity court will generally require the plaintiff to establish his right at law before granting an injunction. This rule is one of expediency and policy based on the reluctance of equity to decide purely legal questions, and there is a tendency to disregard it in modern cases, even in the restricted form above stated."

These authorities sustain the proposition that under the circumstances indicated the equity court will generally require a previous trial at law: Rhea v. Forsyth, 37 Pa. 503, 78 Am. Dec. 441; Oswald v. Wolf, 129 Ill. 200, 21 N. E. 839; Perkins v. Foye, 60 N. H. 496; Oppenheim v. Loftus (N. J. Ch.) 50 Atl. 795; Hart v. Leonard, 42 N. J. Eq. 416, 7 Atl. 865; Bailey v. Culver, 84 Mo. 531; Howell Co. v. Pope, etc., Co., 171 Ill. 350, 49 N. E. 497.

It is recognized by Burks, J., in Sanderlin v. Baxter, supra, in this language:

"Ordinarily, where the existence of a nuisance (and in a general sense every violation of an easement may be considered a nuisance, High on Injunctions, c. 12, § 544) is controverted, the party seeking the interference of a court of equity will generally be required first to establish his right at law. But it is said that in cases (like the present) where the plaintiff has been long in the exercise of his right, or where delay would be disastrous, the court will not require the right to be first established at law. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. (11th Ed.) § 925f, and cases cited in note."

[4] Applying these principles to this case, we find certain conflicts in the testimony, and much obscurity. The obscurity grows out of the assumptions of the witnesses that the court is familiar with the locality, boundary lines, various other ditches, and with their courses and distances. The result is that the printed record leaves the mind in a state of doubt and indecision as to the facts of the controversy. There is certainly a substantial dispute, and the complainants' rights are not made clear by the testimony. Among the controverted questions are whether or not the long-continued use of the ditch before the drains were put in was adverse or permissive; whether or not a portion of the drain now complained of has been in its present place and condition for more than 15 years, and another part thereof since 1913, and hence that the plaintiffs may be charged with acquiescence therein; and whether or not the proximate cause of the injuries of which they complain is the recent diversion of a considerable quantity of water from other lands to and upon the lands of the defendant, which did not formerly flow through this drain. It cannot be doubted then that there is a substantial dispute between the parties, the merits of which are not made clear, and the record shows that the appellant has neither waived any of his rights nor submitted them to be decided by the equity court. Under such circumstances, the general rule is that the equity court will require the complainants to establish their right at law before granting a permanent mandatory injunction.

Taking all of the peculiar circumstances of this case under consideration, we are of opinion that the court erred in granting the relief prayed for. The disputable issues of fact involved should first be submitted to a jury in a common-law action, and this suit in equity held to await the establishment or failure to establish the complainants' right. If the right is thus established, the mandatory injunction should be awarded; otherwise the bill should be dismissed.

[5] There are two incidental questions raised. One of these is whether or not these complainants can maintain the suit. It appears that the complainants Julia J. Holland and John H. Gardner, do not own the property in fee simple, as alleged in the bill, but as remaindermen, subject to the life estate of their grandmother, Julia Gardner, and also occupy it as tenants from year to year. This point is without merit. Both as tenants and as remaindermen they have a substantial interest in the land and the alleged easement of drainage appurtenant thereto, and their independent right to institute this suit for its protection cannot be doubted. 19 C. J. 998; 5 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 1974; Balcum v. Johnson, 177 N. C. 213, 98 S. E. 534.

[6] Another question is as to the costs of the suit. The defendant Charles Russell showed that before the suit had been instituted he had sold the land upon which he was charged with obstructing the drainage, and that from that time he had had no further interest therein. There being no dispute about this, the court dismissed the suit as to him and awarded him his costs, and, having decided the case against the other defendant, Mathias, awarded the complainants (appellees) their costs against him. We see no reason for criticism of this adjudication, but the question has become immaterial at this stage of the litigation, because the entire decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, and the judgment for costs will follow the final decree.

Reversed and remanded.

HALE v. COMMONWEALTH.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Indictment and Information \S 121(4)—Bill of particulars not defective for failing to specify kind of liquor sold and to whom sold.

In a prosecution under an omnibus indictment framed under Acts 1918, c. 388, \S 7, for the unlawful sale of ardent spirits, the failure of a bill of particulars given on request by defendant, alleging that the state expected to prove that defendant sold ardent spirits, in view of the fact that "ardent spirits" are defined in section 1 of the act, and section 60, providing that it shall not be necessary to allege a gift or sale of ardent spirits, to state what kind of liquor was sold, did not render it defective.

2. Intoxicating Liquors \S 236(13)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for selling.

In prosecution for illegal sale of ardent spirits under Acts 1918, c. 388, \S 7, evidence as to the nature of the beverage sold held sufficient to support a verdict of guilty.

Error to Circuit Court, Madison County.

John S. Hale was convicted of unlawfully selling ardent spirits, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Will A. Cook, of Madison, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. [1] The plaintiff in error, hereinafter called the accused, was convicted of unlawfully selling ardent spirits, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $50 and to be confined in jail for a term of 30 days. The indictment was framed under section 7 of the Prohibition Act (Acts 1918, c. 388, p. 578), and is what is called an "omnibus indictment." The defendant called for a bill of particulars, and it was given to him in the following language:

"That the commonwealth expected to prove that John S. Hale did, on the 19th of February, 1921, sell ardent spirits as alleged in the indictment."

The accused objected to the bill of particulars on the ground that it was insufficient and was no more definite than the indictment itself. In particular, it objected that the accused should have been informed "what sort of ardent spirits" the commonwealth accused him of selling. The objection is without merit. The prohibition Act itself defines the meaning of the term "ardent spirits" (Acts 1918, c. 388, \S 1), and he is charged with knowledge of such meaning. It was not necessary to be any more specific. Nor was it necessary to state to whom the ardent spirits were sold. Acts 1918, c. 388, \S 60. Clopton v. Commonwealth, 109 Va. 813, 68 S. E. 1022, and cases cited.

[2] It is further objected that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, in that "what was sold was not one of the enumerated beverages mentioned in the statute, nor shown to contain more than one half of one per cent. of alcohol by volume"; that the word "wine," as used in the statute, means one of the commercial brands of wine, and not one of the forms of beverage to which the word "wine" is loosely applied. State v. Dennison, 85 W. Va. 261, 101 S. E. 458. While it is true that the accused testified in his own behalf that what he sold was "parsnip wine," and that, "if you drank enough of it, it might make you feel it," the purchaser testified on behalf of the commonwealth:

That the accused "sold him two glasses of liquor; * * * that he did not know what sort of liquor it was; * * * that he believed it was either corn whisky or apple brandy; that he felt it; that he did not know the smell of corn whisky, or apple brandy; that he did not know anything about white grape wine, dandelion wine, or parsnip wine; he had never drank any; that he was never intoxicated; that the liquor he drank was intoxicating."

This was quite sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury, without inquiring whether the various kinds of domestic concoctions which pass under the designation of "wine" are per se within the term of the statute. The judgment of the trial court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

JAMES v. MCGUIRE.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Lost Instruments \S 8(1)—Grantee claiming that there was a mutual mistake in the deed, and that it had been obtained by fraud, had burden of proof.

In grantee's action to require grantor to re-execute deed which the grantor had obtained possession of and had destroyed, the grantee, claiming that there was a mutual mistake in the deed, and that it had been obtained by deceit and fraud, had the burden of proof on such issues.

2. Lost Instruments \S 8(3)—Evidence held not to prove that there was a mutual mistake in deed, or that it was obtained by fraud.

Where the grantor conveyed land to grantee in consideration of the right to live in the house with grantee, but thereafter procured possession of the deed and destroyed it, evidence in grantee's action to require grantor to re-execute deed held insufficient to sustain grantor's defense that there was a mutual mistake in the deed, and that it had been obtained by deceit and fraud.

3. Lost instruments ¶10—In action to require re-execution of destroyed deed, equity may modify it to express intention.

In grantee's action to require grantor to re-execute deed after he had obtained possession thereof, and had destroyed it, defended on the ground that there was a mutual mistake in the deed, and that it had been obtained by deceit and fraud, equity in requiring grantor to re-execute the deed has the right to modify it so as to more clearly express the intention of the parties.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Lynchburg.

Action by Annie D. McGuire against William R. James. Decree for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Amended and affirmed.

Harrison & Long and S. H. Williams, all of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error.

John D. Easley, of Lynchburg, and William Leigh, Jr., of Halifax, for defendant in error.

PRENTIS, J. The appellant, a man who was then 69 years old, by deed delivered October 2, 1917, under the circumstances to be hereafter stated, conveyed a certain house and lot to the appellee, a woman many years his junior, a divorcee. Thereafter, November 15, 1917, he asked her for the deed, which by agreement between them had not been recorded, so that he might read it over. He took it out of the house in which they were then living, down to his store, and four or five days after that he destroyed it by tearing his signature therefrom. She asked him several times to return the deed, and then in January, 1918, he told her that he had destroyed it. She thereupon promptly instituted this suit, the object of which was to set up the deed and require its re-execution. The trial court granted the prayer of the bill, and entered a decree requiring the appellant to execute and deliver to her, a deed identical with that which he had thus destroyed, and from that decree this appeal was taken.

The appellant seeks to justify his conduct by claiming that there was a mutual mistake in the deed, that it did not properly express the contract, that it had been obtained by deceit and fraud, and by the abuse of his trust and confidence in her, alleging that she occupied a fiduciary relation to him, and that the consideration had failed.

The principles of law governing courts of equity in such cases have been frequently stated, and all of the legal propositions maintained by the learned counsel for the appellant are fully supported by reason and authority; but we find ourselves unable to apply the doctrines for which he contends to the facts of this case. There is conflict upon some material points in the testimony of the parties to the transaction, and, if all of the evidence of the appellee were ignored, and all of that of the appellant were credited, then a fairly debatable question would be presented. When, however, the whole evidence is considered, and the testimony of the appellee given due weight, it seems to us apparent that there is no substantial error in the decree.

Stated briefly, the pertinent facts are that the appellant, who was a childless widower, was so attracted by the attentions of the appellee, first to his deceased wife, with whom she had been friendly for two years, and afterwards to him in his bereavement, decided that it would be most desirable to have her make a home for him. With this idea in mind he voluntarily suggested to her that he make his will in her favor, and he accordingly executed and showed her a copy of his will making her sole beneficiary, he being at the time the owner not only of the lot here referred to, but of other real and personal estate in the city of Lynchburg, as well as his stock of goods as a retail merchant. She was greatly pleased at this prospect of bettering her fortunes, and favorably entertained the suggestion. Shortly after that she went to visit her father and brothers in North Carolina, and when she returned she suggested that the will be put in a different form, and he readily re-executed it, making her the sole beneficiary, with the added provision that, in case she should die before he did, his entire estate should go to her only daughter. They were then living in separate houses, but the plan was that she was to own and move into his home, treat him as a father, and care for him there; that he would eat at her table, but that the expense of maintaining the family would be equitably shared. Thereafter she told him that she had been advised that, as he would have the right to revoke his will, she would be unwise to surrender her own rented home and go to his unless he would make her a deed for the property. When she suggested this to him he at first demurred, and she finally told him positively that she would not move into his house unless he would first convey the property to her. Pursuing their general understanding, she expended some of her own money in repairing and improving the property. Her testimony is to the effect that he told her to prepare the deed—that it was unnecessary to have a lawyer—and he handed her a previous deed which described the property. They discussed together the necessity of having his wife's will admitted to probate, that will being a link in the chain of title. He had this will probated September 20th, and thereafter, on September 25th, as she was moving into the house, she had a notary there, and with a deed which had been prepared by a friend of her family who was a real estate agent. He postponed the execution of this deed, claiming that the time was not opportune, as they were busy moving. At a later date, October 2d, it was again presented to him; he read it over several times, specifically referred to the provision in the deed of which he is now complaining, received, as he says, her construction of it, and thereupon executed, acknowledged, and delivered it. On the same occasion he executed in duplicate an agreement with reference to a lane which was then used in common by the occupants of the property conveyed and the tenant of the adjoining property which also belonged to the appellant. The subject of this conveyance had been frequently discussed between them. There was no undue haste, and according to her testimony there was not the slightest concealment of any material fact, though he claims that she studiously concealed the fact that the deed was drawn by her friend the real estate agent instead of by an attorney in whom he had confidence, and who he thought had prepared the paper.

"* * * And it is further covenanted that the said William R. James is to have a room and to live as one of the family with the said Annie D. McGuire so long as it shall be mutually agreeable."

After such delivery, and when he began to complain that the deed did not express their agreement because it did not give him power enough, according to his testimony she agreed to destroy it, while according to her testimony she agreed to have him substitute therefor another deed which should fully express their joint purpose. Instead of accepting her proposition to substitute another deed which should properly express such purpose, and upon his express or implied promise to return it promptly, he borrowed the deed from her and destroyed it. He was a man in the full possession of all of his faculties, had been a retail merchant in the city of Lynchburg for many years, had apparently accumulated an estate sufficient for his needs, and, unless the courts are to extend their power to relieving parties of their contracts simply because they become dissatisfied, then this complainant is entitled to no relief. The question presented is a question of fact, and the burden is upon the appellant to establish the facts upon which he relies to defeat his contract. He has failed to do so, and, while his disappointment excites sympathy, it affords no ground for the cancellation of his contract.

ly considered. He continued to eat at her table until October, 1918, although this suit was instituted in January of that year, and then ceased to do so without giving her any reason therefor. He continues to occupy his room in the house. His own conduct has been such as to make it impossible for her to carry out in good faith their mutual agreement that she should make a home for him. The objectionable clause of the deed under which the appellant has justified his conduct is not before the court for construction. Equitable considerations, however, under the circumstances require that the clause of the deed objected to, and because of which the appellant has sought to justify his conduct, should be modified so as more clearly to express the intention of the parties. While it is probable that a court would construe this clause as meaning that the appellant retained an absolute right to occupy a room in the house, the room which he has retained, and now occupies, still that question should not be left open for future litigation. Old Dominion Bank v. McVeigh, 32 Grat. (73 Va.) 542; Zirkle v. Allison, 126 Va. 705, 101 S. E. 869, 15 A. L. R. 40. The two subjects of the clause can be easily separated, and, when the expressed motives of both of the parties and the contemporaneous facts are considered, it seems clear that the deed should contain an unequivocal expression of their intention, so that we will here modify the decree, and for the objectionable clause therein appearing will substitute this language:

"And it is further understood and mutually agreed that the said William R. James reserves a room in the dwelling upon the lot hereby conveyed, for and during the term of his natural life with the right to occupy the same and at all times to have ingress thereto and egress therefrom; and it is further understood that he is to live with the grantee, Annie V. McGuire, as one of her family, so long as it shall be mutually agreeable."

With this modification it seems manifest to us that the appellant will have little of which to complain, for, although his plan to secure a home is disappointed, it is not at all likely that he ever desired to remain a member of the family and to eat at her table any longer than it should prove to be mutually agreeable. Such a modification of the deed fairly meets the equities of the case. The appellant, having failed to sustain the burden which is imposed upon him by law, cannot now avoid the consequences of his contract, however great his disappointment in the result.

Amended and affirmed.

TUNING v. TUNING. (No. 4329.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Divorce — 37(13)—Husband held not entitled to divorce on the ground of desertion.

When the husband consents to and aids his wife in removing from the home then provided to another in another county, and agrees to follow her there soon afterwards, and he does go and for a short time lives and cohabits with her at the new place of residence, and where with his consent she has contracted to live and take care of an uncle during his life on condition that he will deed her his property including the house in which she resides, she is not guilty of deserting her husband at the time of such removal, entitling him to a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, or to any relief against her.

2. Divorce — 37(14)—Defendant wife held entitled to divorce for husband's refusal to live with and support her.

On the other hand, if after such removal by the wife, the husband refuses to contribute to his own or the support of his wife and children at the new place of residence, and because she refuses to support him there without such assistance he then leaves her and refuses to live with her, and is guilty of other conduct evidencing such intent, he is guilty of deserting her, entitling her upon a cross-bill showing such facts, to a decree of divorce from bed and board, and for alimony against him.

3. Divorce — 241—Facts held to show wife entitled to alimony in a gross sum, payable in installments, on her divorce from bed and board.

In such case, where it appears that the wife has been obliged to work out for many years to obtain money to suitably maintain and support herself and their children, and to assist and has thereby assisted materially in paying for the farm on which they have lived for many years and for other property, the court on decreeing her a divorce from bed and board may award her a reasonable sum in gross in lieu of alimony, payable in installments, and make the same a lien on the husband's real and personal estate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by F. R. Tuning against Ida M. Tuning for divorce. From a decree therein, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. & E. L. Maxwell, of Elkins, for appellant.

H. G. Kump, of Elkins, for appellee.

MILLER, J. On the bill of plaintiff and cross-bill answer of defendant, replied to specially, the court below by the decree complained of denied plaintiff a divorce a vinculo as prayed for, and granted defendant, as prayed for by her, a divorce from bed and board against the plaintiff, and further adjudged that he pay her as alimony the sum of $1,500.00, in three installments of five hundred dollars ($500.00) each, the first within ninety days, the second on or before one year, and the third on or before two years, from the date of the decree, with interest on each installment at the rate of six per centum, and that the same constitute a lien on all his property, both real and personal, and that in default of payment she should have the right by execution, or by such other process as might be efficacious in the premises, to enforce the same, and that she also recover her costs incurred in this suit.

The ground of divorce alleged and relied on by the plaintiff in his bill is that the defendant wilfully and without reasonable cause deserted and abandoned him on the 1st day of October, 1915, and thereafter wholly refused to live and cohabit with him as his wife. The bill was sworn to by plaintiff; but it is conceded by his counsel that the proof wholly fails to sustain any desertion on October 1, 1915. Indeed plaintiff admits that he not only consented to, but aided the defendant in removing herself and their two children from their residence on the farm near Pickens, in Randolph County, to the village of Frenchton, in Upshur County, where defendant had contracted to move into the house then owned by one Hull, an uncle, and take care of him for the rest of his life, on his agreement to convey her his property, and with the understanding with plaintiff, that as soon as he could sell or lease the home farm in Randolph County, he should also come and reside with her and their children in Upshur County. The plaintiff, after this evidence and his admissions, did not amend his bill as to the time and place of defendant's alleged desertion, but on this hearing, and apparently in the circuit court, he relied wholly on her supposed desertion of him on November 11 and 12, 1917, at which time at his request she had gone to Pickens to execute with him a deed for a part of their land in Randolph County. Plaintiff makes no allegation, however, that on this occasion there had been any resumption of residence in Randolph County. True, they occupied the same room, as both admit, in a hotel where he was staying, but simply as guests of the hotel.

In her cross-bill answer defendant denies desertion as alleged in the bill, and as grounds of divorce from bed and board against plaintiff, she alleges non-support or inadequate support of herself and children for many years; that in order to provide such support and to get suitable clothing for herself and children, she was obliged to work out as a domestic servant in the homes of neighbors; and that in this way she also contributed largely to the payment for the farm near Pickens purchased shortly after their marriage. She further alleges that she provided practically all the furniture for the house, and he practically nothing; that some time before they moved to Frenchton plaintiff whipped their son inhumanly with a pair of check lines, and that she told him about the time of going to Frenchton that she could no longer endure his treatment of herself and children, and if she was to be required to clothe herself and them, she would have to go to her own people, and that it was then that the agreement was made that they should remove to Frenchton, and that he should remain on the farm until the following July, 1916, when he might dispose of the stock and property thereon, and lease or rent the farm and himself come to Frenchton; that accordingly they did move to Frenchton, but that plaintiff failed to come in the spring as agreed, but remained at Pickens until the fall of 1916, when he disposed of the personal property on the farm and did go to Frenchton and resided and cohabited there with her for a short time, when she told him if he remained he would have to assist in providing the home and maintaining her and her daughter, that she could not support him, and that he would have to pay his board, which he refused to do; that she is now without any means of support except such as she derives from her own efforts in keeping a boarding house, and by her own labors and the assistance she receives from her uncle; that in the fall of 1917, plaintiff represented to her that he was in need of money and induced her to join in a deed for the farm, which she agreed to do on condition that he would pay her one-third of the purchase money, to which he agreed, but after obtaining her signature refused to do; that since then plaintiff has refused to live with her; and that she has never at any time received any of the purchase money or other money from him, but on the contrary he has appropriated all of said money, and has been selling off the personal property on the farm, and has sold timber, or is about to do so, on the remaining land at $2,500.00, all of which defendant assisted him in acquiring, with the object of depriving her of her portion thereof.

[1] Has plaintiff made out a case for divorce? He does not pretend to have requested defendant in November, 1917, to return to Randolph County, or to have provided her a place of residence there. The most that appears in the record on this question is that some two years after they moved to Frenchton and the defendant had been at work there keeping a hotel and working out her contract with Hull, he may have requested her by letter to return to Randolph County, but he admits he consented to her going to Frenchton and entering into the contract with her uncle, and that they should reside there; and she says, and she is corroborated by her son and daughter, that he only visited them occasionally at longer or shorter periods and never contributed anything to their support; and that all that he was requested to do when he came to them at Frenchton was to pay his board, which he declined to do, and was told she would not support him there, but that he must contribute to their support to that extent. His contention is that she drove him away and would not allow him to stay, "board or no board."

We think it clear that there was no desertion of plaintiff by defendant in Randolph County or elsewhere, and that the court was clearly right in denying him any relief. Their removal to Frenchton with plaintiff's consent, and where he lived and cohabited with her for a time at least, precludes him from obtaining a divorce from her on that ground. McCoy v. McCoy, 74 W. Va. 64, 81 S. E. 562, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 367. And that there was no subsequent desertion of him by her in Randolph County is quite manifest from the evidence already referred to. With his consent they had established a residence in Upshur County. She had the right to remain there, certainly until he provided her with another home and requested her to go there. There is no evidence that he did this. His pretenses that he wrote her to return, without providing a place, if true in fact, we think must be regarded as feigned and not sincere, for he knew she was under contract to say in Upshur County and would lose the property contracted for there unless she fulfilled the contract, entered into with his consent.

[2] The next question is, can the decree in her favor be sustained? We think the question is a close one. Desertion implies intent to desert. It is agreed by both parties that they lived and cohabited as man and wife in Upshur County, and that when they moved there in October, 1915, it was with the understanding that they should take up their residence in Frenchton. The plaintiff was there on a number of occasions, but did not go at the time originally contemplated, as she alleges, nor did he remain there for any considerable length of time; and barring a few farm provisions furnished shortly after going there, plaintiff never contributed anything to the support of his family. His going or remaining away under the circumstances, and his failure and refusal to contribute anything to the support of the family, though professing his ability to do so, even to the extent of paying his board, is a circumstance, we think, which may be considered on this question of desertion. The least that could have been expected of him was that he should pay his board. He could not have expected his wife, under the circumstances, to work and support him, and that in comparative idleness, while living with her in the hotel or boarding house. He testified that he earned about seventy-five dollars a month by his labor when at work, not including his income from the farm and money invested. If he had provoked the wife to order him away unless he paid his board, he could have adopted no better way than to go home and refuse to aid her in any way in the maintenance of the family.

Besides this conduct and his remaining away for the greater part of the time, and the fact which we think augurs intent to desert, is the fact that he has been disposing of his real and personal property and converting it into money, manifestly for the purpose of putting it beyond her reach or depriving her of any of the benefits thereof. He pretends that he provided clothing and provisions for the family while residing on the farm, but his evidence is not specific as to any actual expenditures on that account. He acknowledged that his wife and children were supported by her a large part of this time by labor at the home of one Pickens, from whom they purchased the farm, and that in that way defendant contributed to the payment for the farm and the maintenance of the children.

On this evidence the court below has decreed defendant a divorce from bed and board. We can not say that the decree is not based on sufficient evidence of intent to actually abandon her. He has not returned to the home in Frenchton since he went away after being requested to contribute to the support of his family by paying board. He was obliged to pay for his keeping some place. His wife he would not pay for the same service when she was providing the home and means of living. Where the court below has found from the evidence the facts constituting good grounds for divorce, the evidence tending strongly to support such finding, the decree will not be reversed on the question of fact. Deusenberry v. Deusenberry, 82 W. Va. 135, 95 S. E. 665.

[3] The next question is, can the decree for a gross sum in lieu of alimony be sustained? Generally, it is conceded, alimony should be in periodical payments, of reasonable sums, out of the husband's income, and that gross sums or particular property should not be decreed. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 68 W. Va. 15, 69 S. E. 381, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 889; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 129; 1 R. C. L. 926, §§ 74, 75. But as noted in Reynolds v. Reynolds, supra, there are exceptions to this rule, as where the property was obtained with the wife's money or by the help of her exertions and labor. Is the case here presented one for the application of the exception to the general rule? Our statute, section 11, chapter 64 (sec. 3646) of the Code, is quite broad. It says that in decreeing a divorce a vinculo or a mensa et thoro "the court may make such further decree as it shall deem expedient, concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties, or either of them," etc. As said in Reynolds v. Reynolds supra, reviewing the history of the statute, the power to provide alimony did not originate with the statute, but existed independently of the statute, and is based on the legal obligation of the husband, as incident to the marriage, to maintain and support his wife. Manifestly, the court was persuaded to decree a gross sum to the wife in this case on the ground that she contributed largely by her labors outside of the family home, in the acquisition of the land and personal estate which the evidence showed, or tended strongly to show, the plaintiff was disposing of and converting into money with some purpose, and not unlikely to put it beyond the reach of his wife. He refused, after obtaining her signature to the deed for a large part of the land, to fulfill his promise to pay her one-third of the purchase money. And without doubt he was endeavoring to sell his other property and convert it into money. What was to prevent him from going beyond the court's jurisdiction, or from squandering or disposing of the money, so as to deprive defendant of all interest therein? The record shows that he had personal estate consisting of notes and United States bonds and lands and coal interests, amounting in all to $4,000 to $5,000, and that of these he had convertible cash assets amounting to at least $3,000, and that he was earning about $75 per month.

Sums in gross for alimony have been allowed under such circumstances in other jurisdictions. It was done in Illinois, where the statute is substantially the same as ours. Plaster v. Plaster, 47 Ill. 290, where it was held that such decree would preclude the wife from thereafter having the decree so modified as to give her any sum additional for the support of herself or children. In California the statute (Civ. Code, § 139) said:

"Where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, the court may compel him [1] to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and [2] to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support, [a] during her life or [b] for a shorter period, as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively; and the court may, from time to time, modify its orders in these respects."

The Supreme Court of that state held that the court had the power under this section to require a gross sum to be paid the wife. Robinson v. Robinson, 79 Cal. 511, 21 Pac. 1095. In Iowa there is a similar holding under a statute no broader than ours, in which case specific property was set aside as alimony. Twine v. O'Meara, 59 Iowa, 326, 13 N. W. 321. So also in Wisconsin we find that a decree for a gross sum in lieu of alimony was sustained under a similar statute. Hooper v. Hooper, 102 Wis. 598, 78 N. W. 753, 44 L. R. A. 725. And in North Dakota, the statute, though not specifically authorizing it, was held broad enough to justify a decree for a gross sum for the support and maintenance of the wife. De Roche v. De Roche, 12 N. D. 17, 94 N. W. 767, 1 Ann. Cas. 221. See also the note to this case at page 224, citing many cases, both from states with statutes like New York authorizing such decree, and from other states, including those cited here, with statutes like or similar to our own, held broad enough to justify such decree.

Our conclusion, under all the facts and circumstances of this case, is that the decree below should be affirmed.

LAWRENCE v. KENNEDY et al.
(No. 4365.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 7, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 4, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Equity §168—Plea in bar of separate claim properly allowed.

Ordinarily a plea in equity, to be good, must constitute a complete bar to the relief prayed for, but where the bill is based upon two or more claims for relief, separate and distinct in themselves, a plea which constitutes an absolute bar to one of such separate and distinct claims is properly allowed to be filed.

2. Judgment §585(1)—To constitute res judicata, matter in second suit must have been actually in issue in the first.

To render a decree res judicata in a subsequent suit about the same subject-matter involved in the suit in which such decree was entered not mere matter of defense thereto, the matter relied upon for relief in such second suit must have been actually in issue in the first.

3. Judgment §585(3)—Decree denying enforcement of contract held not a bar to subsequent suit against purchaser of interest pending suit.

A decree entered in a suit brought by several plaintiffs for the purpose of enforcing the specific execution of a contract for the sale of real estate, dismissing the bill and denying right to enforce such contract, is not a bar to a subsequent suit by the same plaintiffs against one who it is claimed was jointly interested with them in the subject-matter of the first suit, to have such party declared a trustee for the benefit of all the joint owners, upon the ground that he purchased the interest sought to be secured in the specific performance suit while it was pending, even though he was a defendant to the first suit and the bill therein alleged that he had made such purchase in the name of some of the other defendants; no relief being asked in the former suit except the specific execution of the contract relied upon.

4. Judgment §590(4)—Decree held no bar to subsequent suit against one defendant on ground of estoppel.

A decree entered in a suit brought by several plaintiffs, for the purpose of enforcing specific execution of a contract for the sale of real estate, dismissing the bill and denying the right to enforce such a contract, is not a bar to a subsequent suit by the same plaintiffs against one who it is claimed purchased an interest in the subject-matter of such first suit from them, to have the purchase of such third party of an outstanding interest declared to be for their benefit, upon the ground that such purchaser is estopped to set up title adverse to that acquired from his vendors, even though he was a defendant in the first suit; no relief being sought therein except the specific execution of the contract relied upon.

5. Vendor and purchaser §190—Purchaser held estopped to assert outstanding title against vendor without restoration of possession.

One who purchases real estate, or an interest in real estate, and is placed in possession thereof, is estopped to assert against his vendor an outstanding title or interest acquired therein by him, unless he restores to such vendor the possession and all rights acquired by him under the contract and repudiates the same before making such purchase.

6. Tenancy in common §44—Purchaser of undivided interest held estopped to set up adverse interest against title of vendor.

The purchaser of an undivided interest in real estate who is placed in possession thereof by the vendor, who subsequently purchases another interest in the same property adverse to the claims of his vendor, is estopped to set the same up against the title of his first vendor, but such subsequent purchase will be for the benefit of his first vendor, provided he takes advantage thereof by paying the consideration paid therefor.

7. Tenancy in common §44—Vendor purchasing adverse interest entitled to benefit thereof on payment of entire consideration.

In such case, in order to have the benefit of such subsequent purchase, the vendor must pay the entire consideration paid therefor in good faith by the purchaser.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Bill by A. C. Lawrence against W. A. Kennedy, C. J. Van Fleet, and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant last named appeals. Reversed and remanded.

M. F. Stiles, J. F. Cork, and J. W. Kennedy, all of Charleston, for appellant.

Berkeley Minor, Jr., and Henry S. Cato, both of Charleston, for appellee.

RITZ, J. The plaintiff, Lawrence, filed his bill for the purpose of settling the interests of the various parties in the oil derived from a tract of about one acre of land known as the Ramsey lease.

It appears that in the month of July, 1918, Samuel H. Meyers and H. F. Martin were the owners of a lease upon a tract of land, the oil from which is in controversy in this suit, by the terms of which they were authorized to develop the same for oil and gas. At that time considerable development had been begun in the neighborhood, and it was contemplated that this would prove to be a valuable oil-bearing lease. The defendants Kennedy and Van Fleet purchased the half interest of Martin in this lease, and at the same time entered into a contract with Meyers by which they were to secure his half interest upon certain terms and under certain conditions; one of such terms being that he was to have a certain interest in a corporation to be formed by them for the purpose of developing the property, and another that they should contribute a sufficient amount of money to drill one well upon the property. They organized a voluntary association for the purpose of carrying on operations on the lease and offered Meyers the proportion of stock therein which he was to get under his contract, which they claimed was a compliance with the terms of the contract upon their part. Meyers then, according to their contention, agreed to sell them his interest in the concern thus formed for the sum of \$2,250, but when this amount was offered to him in satisfaction of his accepted offer he declined it, and conveyed his interest to the defendant Stage, who in turn conveyed it to the defendant Burns. Kennedy and Van Fleet in the meantime had entered into a contract with the plaintiff, Lawrence, by which Lawrence agreed to drill a well upon the premises at his own expense for the consideration that he be given an $\frac{11}{32}$ interest therein, the cost of such well to be subsequently refunded to him by the whole enterprise, should it turn out to be a producing one. Lawrence went upon the premises in accordance with his contract and drilled a well, which turned out to be a substantial producer.

Upon the refusal of Meyers to convey his half interest in the lease to Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates, in accordance with what they claim to be the terms of his contracts, they brought a suit against the defendants Meyers, Stage, and Burns for the purpose of compelling specific execution of those contracts. The plaintiff, Lawrence, was also made a party defendant to this bill, and it was alleged therein that, while he was jointly interested with Kennedy and Van Fleet in the enterprise, he was acting adversely to them, and that the purchase by Stage from Meyers and by Burns from Stage of the Meyers one-half interest was really a purchase by Lawrence, and that Burns and Stage were holding this interest for his benefit. The bill alleged that Stage and Burns had full notice of the contracts and arrangements between Kennedy and Van Fleet on the one part, and Meyers on the other. The prayer of the bill was that the contracts between Kennedy and Van Fleet on the one part, and Meyers on the other, be specifically executed, and the defendants Stage and Burns be compelled to convey the title to this one-half Meyers interest to the plaintiffs, or that the same be conveyed to them by a special commissioner, should they refuse to do so. Lawrence answered this bill and denied that he had any interest in the Meyers half interest, or any connection with the purchase by Stage from Meyers and by Burns from Stage. Stage and Burns both answered, asserting that they purchased for themselves alone, admitting that they knew at the time of the contracts between Meyers and Kennedy and Van Fleet, but denied that they were valid contracts, or that the plaintiffs were entitled to have them enforced. Evidence was taken, and upon a hearing had in the court of common pleas a decree was entered adjudicating the right of Kennedy and Van Fleet to have specific execution of the contract, and compelling Meyers, Stage, and Burns to convey this half interest to Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates upon the payment of the sum of $2,250, provided for in the contract. From this decree an appeal was prosecuted to the circuit court of Kanawha county, and that court, upon a hearing, reversed the court of common pleas, and held that upon the showing made Kennedy and Van Fleet were not entitled to have specific execution of their contracts in regard to the Meyers half interest, and dismissed their bill. This decree was affirmed by this court. Kennedy v. Burns, 84 W. Va. 701, 101 S. E. 156.

Pending that litigation arrangements were entered into by the parties under which the property could be developed and the oil saved. It appears that operations were conducted on either side of this Ramsey lease, and in very close proximity thereto, which would have extracted all of the oil thereunder, unless it was drilled simultaneously with the operation on these other tracts. In order to secure such operation Kennedy and his associates, being the undisputed owners of the Martin half interest, and claiming the Meyers half interest, entered into a contract with the Ring Oil Company, which had been formed by Lawrence for the purpose of carrying on drilling operations, by which they agreed that the Ring Oil Company should further develop the property, and that the oil produced by such development should be sold by one John O. Malone and the proceeds thereof used to pay the expenses of drilling, so far as was necessary for that purpose, upon bills approved by a certain committee representing the different claimants to the property. Stage and Burns entered into a like contract with the Ring Oil Company. Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates also at the same time entered into a contract with Malone under which he agreed to market the oil, to pay the expenses of operations, upon bills approved as above indicated, and retain the residue for later distribution. Stage and Burns entered into a like contract with Malone. Under this arrangement the Ring Oil Company drilled two additional wells upon the property, making three in all, and from the oil produced from these wells there had been realized the sum of about $100,000 at the time Malone filed his answer herein, at which time the said wells were still being pumped and were substantial producers. Of this sum of $100,000 Malone had paid out about $70,000 for the expenses of operation in accordance with the contracts above referred to. The representative of Kennedy and Van Fleet refused to approve the bills for the operation of the property according to the allegation of the bill in this case, and the Ring Oil Company notified the parties that unless it was paid its bills for pumping and operating the property it would shut down the operations. Lawrence thereupon filed this bill, alleging substantially the facts above recited, and further averring that if operations upon said lease were suspended he would be seriously injured and damaged, by reason of the fact that the oil which might be produced from this lease, by proper operation of the wells, would be discharged through the wells on adjoining leases which were then being operated, and asked that a receiver be appointed to carry on the operations pending the litigation, that the rights of the parties be established, and the money already on hand be divided among them in proportion to their respective interests. All of the parties assented to the appointment of a receiver under the circumstances, and operations have since been conducted by a receiver appointed by the court.

Various pleadings have been filed in the case, but for the purpose of the question we have here it is necessary to notice only some of them. To Lawrence's bill setting up his interest, Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates filed an answer and cross-bill. In this answer and cross-bill the interest of the parties in the Martin one-half of the land is denied to be as contended for by Lawrence, and certain contracts and deeds in relation thereto are asked to be set aside, and others to be construed differently from the interpretation given to them by Lawrence in the bill. With this Martin one-half interest, however, we are not now concerned. As to the Meyers half interest, the defendants allege in their cross-bill that they are entitled to practically the whole thereof. They aver that the purchase thereof by Stage and Burns was in the interest of Lawrence; that Lawrence was the real purchaser, and that the purchase of this interest, which conflicted with the interest asserted by them in the former suit, under their contract with Meyers, inured to the benefit of all of the joint adventurers; that they are entitled to have the interest so acquired by Stage and Burns in behalf of Lawrence adjudged to be for the joint benefit of all of those jointly interested in the Martin interest, inasmuch as the purchase was made by Lawrence through Stage and Burns during the time the controversy was pending over this Meyers interest; and, further, that Lawrence, as a purchaser from them, is estopped to claim an interest adverse to that which they sold him, while he is still relying upon and holding under his contract with them. They filed an amended cross-bill in which the allegations in regard to the Meyers half interest were somewhat elaborated. Subsequently it appeared from answers filed by Stage and Burns that Lawrence had acquired all of the interests held by Meyers, Stage, and Burns in the Meyers half interest, and was the owner of all thereof, and Kennedy and Van Fleet contended that the conveyance to Lawrence of these interests by Stage and Burns and Meyers was simply turning over to him what he had actually purchased during the time the litigation in regard thereto was pending. Lawrence filed a special plea, termed a plea of res judicata. In this plea he set up the former litigation and its termination, as above indicated. He averred in this plea that he was in no wise interested in the transactions between Meyers and Stage and Burns in regard to the Meyers half interest at the time the same were made, or until long after the termination of the litigation settling the claims of Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates thereto; that recently he had purchased from Meyers, Stage, and Burns their interests in the Meyers half interest, and that he now held the same; but insisted that the determination of the former litigation was a bar to Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates asserting any interest therein against him, because of the fact that he was a party defendant to the former suit, in which allegations were made against him that he was the real purchaser of the interests conveyed to Stage and Burns. Objection was made to the filing of this plea, which being overruled, Kennedy and Van Fleet tendered what they called a special replication and amended cross-bill, but the court, upon objection, refused to allow the same to be filed, and entered a decree holding that Kennedy, Van Fleet, and their associates were barred by the decree in the former suit from asserting any claim to the Meyers half interest against Lawrence, and it is from this decree that this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] The first question naturally is, Is the plea good as a plea in equity? Ordinarily the rule is that a plea in equity, to be good, must bar the right to recover in the suit, but it seems that, where separate and distinct matters upon which the right of recovery is based are set up, a plea which is effective to bar one of these separate and distinct rights and claims will be held to be a good plea. Story's Equity Pleadings, § 647.

[2-4] It only remains, therefore, for us to determine whether the matter set up in the plea furnishes a complete bar to the claims asserted by Kennedy and Van Fleet to the Meyers half interest. It will be borne in mind that this plea relies upon the adjudication in the former suit to defeat Kennedy and Van Fleet from recovering any interest in the Meyers part of the lease from Lawrence, but, in addition to setting up the proceeding in that suit, it further avers that Lawrence never acquired any interest in the Meyers claim until long after the determination of the suit of Kennedy against Burns. One of the theories upon which Kennedy and Van Fleet claim to be interested in the Meyers half of the lease is that Lawrence, while he was jointly interested with them in the venture, purchased this outstanding claim. They insist in their pleading that, while they were in good faith claiming for themselves and Lawrence this Meyers interest, Lawrence, through his agents, Stage and Burns, went out and purchased the same, and now attempts to hold it adversely to them. Their contention is that, because this purchase was made while they were asserting their claim to the whole lease in behalf of themselves and Lawrence, it was for their common benefit, and that they are entitled to have Lawrence decreed to be a trustee holding it for the benefit of all engaged in the common enterprise. They further contend that, because of the relationship of vendor and purchaser existing between them and Lawrence, he is estopped to claim an interest in the property purchased by him from them adverse to such interest while he is still holding the same under his contract of purchase. The court below held that these contentions were barred by the former adjudication. With this conclusion we do not agree. An examination of the record in the suit of Kennedy against Burns discloses that the only relief sought was the enforcement of the contracts set up between Kennedy and Van Fleet on the one hand, and Meyers on the other, and the only adjudication in that case was that these contracts were not enforceable, and that Kennedy and Van Fleet were not entitled to have this half interest conveyed to them by Meyers or his grantees. While it is true that bill makes Lawrence a party defendant thereto, no relief is asked against him. It may be that the plaintiffs in that suit could have asserted that Lawrence was the real purchaser, and that his purchase inured to their benefit, and that the same was held by him simply as a trustee for the benefit of all the joint adventurers, and relied upon this as a ground for relief. This they did not do.

The rule of res judicata, when applied to the plaintiff in a suit, is somewhat different in its effect than when applied to a defendant. Ordinarily a defendant, when he is sued, must set up every matter which exists that would defeat the claim asserted against him, and the adjudication in the suit ordinarily determines, not only every matter of defense which is actually set up, but also such matters as might pertinently be used as a defense. This is not the rule, however, in regard to a plaintiff. The adjudication in that case only settles the claims and grounds for relief actually set up and relied upon by the plaintiff. He may have another ground upon which to base a claim for relief in the particular case not set up, and not relied upon, in which event the adjudication will not bar him from subsequently relying thereon in another suit. State v. McEl-downey, 54 W. Va. 695, 47 S. E. 850; Perdue v. Ward, 88 W. Va. 371, 106 S. E. 874, 14 A. L. R. 539. We are therefore clearly of the opinion that the adjudication in the former suit (Kennedy v. Burns, 84 W. Va. 701, 101 S. E. 156), did not bar Kennedy and Van Fleet from setting up as a ground for relief against Lawrence, so far as the Meyers half interest is concerned, the facts now relied upon.

But this does not necessarily conclude the question. Lawrence's plea goes further than simply setting up the former adjudication and relying thereon. It traverses the allegation in the cross-bill that the purchase by Stage and Burns was for his benefit, and that they acted in his interest, and asserts that he never acquired any interest whatever in this Meyers half interest until after it was determined that Kennedy and Van Fleet and their associates had no claim of any kind thereto. Does this make any difference? It may be true that if Lawrence did not stand in the relation of purchaser to Kennedy and Van Fleet he would be in a position to acquire for his own benefit the Meyers half interest from Stage and Burns at the time he says he did. We must not, however, lose sight of the fact that not only is Lawrence, by reason of his purchase, jointly interested with Kennedy and Van Fleet, but he is a purchaser from them of an undivided interest in the whole property. He claims in the bill filed in this case this interest under that contract of purchase, and insists that he is entitled to it. It clearly appears that he was put in possession of the property and began and continued operations thereon under that contract of purchase, and that the Ring Oil Company, organized by him for the purpose of carrying on these operations, retained possession and control of the property until, upon his motion, it was taken possession of by a receiver of the court, and the possession of this receiver is, of course, but the possession of the owners.

[5-7] It is very well established that a purchaser of real estate, or an interest in real estate, who is put in possession thereof by his vendor, cannot acquire an adverse interest so long as he holds the same, and if he does acquire such interest it will inure to the benefit of his vendor, if he desires to have the advantage thereof, upon payment of the purchase price thereof. 27 R. C. L. title "Vendor and Purchaser," § 283; Warvelle on Vendors, § 703; Buffalo Coal & Coke Co. v. Vance, 71 W. Va. 148, 76 S. E. 177; Smith v. Boyer, 72 W. Va. 632, 78 S. E. 787, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 209; Roller v. Effinger, 88 Va. 641, 14 S. E. 337; Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet. 264, 9 L. Ed. 1079; Bush v. Marshall, 6 How. 284, 12 L. Ed. 440; Mizamore v. Berglin, 197 Ala. 111, 72 South. 347, L. R. A. 1916F, 1024; Page v. Bradford-Kennedy Co., 19 Idaho, 685, 115 Pac. 694, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 402; Frink v. Thomas, 20 Or. 265, 25 Pac. 717, 12 L. R. A. 239; Petroski v. Minzgoehr, 144 Mich. 358, 108 N. W. 77, 115 Am. St. Rep. 450; Lake v. Hancock, 38 Fla. 53, 20 South. 811, 56 Am. St. Rep. 159; Greeno v. Munson, 9 Vt. 37, 31 Am. Dec. 605; Harle v. McCoy, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 318, 23 Am. Dec. 407; Meadows v. Hopkins, Meigs (Tenn.) 181, 33 Am. Dec. 140. The fact that Lawrence's purchase from Kennedy and Van Fleet was not of the whole property cannot change his relationship to them. He purchased an undivided interest in the whole. He was put in possession under that purchase, and he is, in this suit, setting up the same and insisting thereon. He is in the position of claiming an undivided interest in the whole property under Kennedy and Van Fleet and another undivided interest in the whole property adverse to Kennedy and Van Fleet. This he cannot do. His acquisition of the Meyers half interest while he was holding under Kennedy and Van Fleet inures to their benefit. He is estopped to set it up adversely to them. Of course, however, in order to have the advantage of it, they will have to pay him the cost of securing the same, instead of only a part of the cost, as is argued by counsel. Their obligation to Lawrence was to sell him an undivided $\frac{11}{32}$ of the whole property. They purported to own the whole property, and he dealt with them on the basis of their ownership of the whole, and it is their duty to make good the title to the whole property. Lawrence is under no obligation to make good such title by the acquisition of an outstanding interest. He has fully paid for his $\frac{11}{32}$, and if he would have to pay $\frac{11}{32}$ of the cost of purchasing the outstanding interest he would be paying twice for part of the interest acquired by him.

We are of opinion that the plea filed by Lawrence sets up no defense to the cross-bill, and that the court should have sustained the objection to the filing of the same. We will therefore reverse the decree, sustain the objection to the plea, and remand the cause for further proceedings.

STATE ex rel. WRIGHT v. BENNETT.
(No. 4017.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)

1. Bastards \S 17½, New, vol. 12 Key-No. Series—Nonsupport statute furnishes cumulative remedy in determining paternity and compelling support.

Notwithstanding the provision made in chapter 80 of the Code (§§ 3927-3932), for determination of paternity of illegitimate children and provision for their support, a cumulative remedy therefor is provided in sections 16c(1) to 16c(8) of chapter 144 of the Barnes' Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 5179a-5179h), commonly known as the nonsupport statute.

2. Bastards \S 17½, New, vol. 12 Key-No. Series—Order requiring defendant to support child cannot be made solely upon complaint, warrant, and proof of nonsupport.

In a proceeding under the provisions of chapter 144, §§ 16c(1)-16c(8), Barnes' Code 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, secs. 5179a-5179h), against the putative father of a bastard child, primarily to punish him for willful neglect of the child and refusal to support it, and incidentally to compel him to provide for its support, the court cannot properly make an order requiring him to support it pending the proceeding, solely upon the complaint and warrant supported by proof of nonsupport. To obtain such an order, the complainant must file a petition therefor, in the proceeding, and give the defendant notice thereof, and afford him an opportunity to resist the application by appropriate pleadings and proof, as in a civil action.

3. Bastards \S 17½, New, vol. 12 Key-No. Series—In proceeding for nonsupport defendant entitled to jury trial unless waived, and court cannot award support pendente lite in absence of such remedy.

If upon such petition an issue is made as to the paternity of the child, the defendant is entitled to a trial thereof by a jury, unless waived, and the court cannot properly award support pendente lite in the absence of such waiver, unless nor until such issue has been determined against the defendant by the verdict of a jury.

4. Bastards \S 17½, New, vol. 12 Key-No. Series—In proceeding for nonsupport of illegitimate child where relationship is expressly admitted, or not denied, the court may order temporary support.

If, however, in any case arising under said statute, the relation between the defendant and the person or persons who are alleged in the petition to be entitled to their support from him is expressly admitted or not put in issue by a denial thereof, the court, upon its own finding and judgment as to what sum should be paid by him for temporary support, may award it against him and enforce payment thereof.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Proceeding by the state on the relation of Amella Wright, against Oscar L. Bennett for the nonsupport of an illegitimate child, and being denied a jury trial, the defendant brings error. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

James S. Kahle, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., and R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, P. On a complaint filed and warrant issued under the provisions of sections 16c (1) to 16c (8), inclusive of chapter 144 of Barnes' Code of 1918 (Code Supp. 1918, §§ 5179a-5179h), commonly known as the nonsupport statute, the plaintiff in error was arrested, prosecuted, and convicted of the paternity of an illegitimate child. On his arraignment in the circuit court of Mercer county, he demurred to the complaint and warrant, and moved to quash them, and later, the motion having been overruled, he entered a plea of not guilty on which issue was joined. Thereafter, a continuance having been refused, he demanded a trial by jury, which was denied him. To all of these adverse rulings he excepted.

On the inquiry conducted by the court, he was found and held to be the father of the child, required to pay $4 per week to its mother, pending an inquest by the grand jury at the next term of the court, and compelled to enter into a recognizance in the penalty of $500, and with condition to appear on the first day of such term to answer such indictment as should be found against him. The basic issue in the inquiry conducted by the court was that of the paternity of the child, then about two and a half years old. The accused had never been charged with such paternity in any proceeding under the bastardy statute. Chapter 80 of the Code (§§ 3927-3932).

[1] Although the statute under which the proceedings here narrated and complained of authorizes prosecution of any parent who shall, without lawful excuse, desert, or willfully neglect or refuse to provide for the support and maintenance of his or her legitimate or illegitimate child or children under the age of 16 years, in destitute or necessitous circumstances, it makes no express provision for determination of the question of paternity, in any instance in which the accused is a man and the child illegitimate, and the former denies the relation of parent. Apparently assuming the existence of the status of parent, it makes nonsupport of the child a criminal offense, and incidentally provides means of coercing support of the child by the parent. In the cases of legitimate children, the parentage is so notorious and so readily susceptible of establishment that it is not often denied. In the cases of illegitimate children, the paternity, unless judicially established in a proceeding under the provisions of chapter 80 of the Code, is nearly always denied. A vital and basic inquiry in this case is whether the nonsupport statute contemplates a proceeding against a man for failure to support an illegitimate child whose paternity he denies, and of which he has never been convicted under the bastardy statute and in the manner provided by it.

But for the rule of evidence prescribed in section 16c(8) of the act, it would be difficult, if not impossible, consistently with the rules of interpretation and construction, to bring cases of this kind within its provisions. Serious consequences ensue upon the fixing of paternity of an illegitimate child upon a citizen. It affects his liberty, his estate, and his earnings. That subject has been governed for many years by a statute conferring the right of jury trial and carefully safeguarding the rights of the accused as well as those of the prosecutor. Code, c. 80. In the act now under consideration there is no express repeal of that statute.

However, in the enactment of chapter 80 of the Code, the Legislature did not exhaust its powers over the subject, and its authority to provide additional remedies for the same wrong, making the new ones cumulative, is incontrovertible. Intent to do so in this instance is clearly indicated by the terms and provisions of the act, when read and considered together. The first section includes parents of children, whether legitimate or illegitimate. Section 6 plainly contemplates trial of the issue of paternity of illegitimate children. It prescribes a rule of evidence to govern in proving that the defendant is the father or mother of "such child or children." These terms necessarily include both classes of children, legitimate and illegitimate, though the issue of relationship is more frequently raised in cases of paternity of illegitimate children than in those involving maternity and the marital relation, it is easy to perceive that it may be just as vital and important in the other classes of cases. There may be efforts to charge men with the support of women, as their wives, who are not their husbands, and women, as mothers of children, who are not their mothers. Imposters and pretenders may break into proceedings of the kind provided for by this statute as well as others. Hence, if any exception is to be made from its operation, it must be based upon the relative frequency or infrequency of the occurrence of issues as to the relationship charged, and the fact that there is an additional and pre-existing statutory remedy for one class of the cases it includes not applicable to any of the others. This would be a flimsy and insufficient ground upon which to base it. Express terms in a statute do not often yield to implications, and never do unless they are so strong that the contrary thereof cannot reasonably be supposed. First National Bank v. De Berriz, 87 W. Va. 477, 105 S. E. 900. Implied exceptions must be based upon very substantial presumptions. This statute does not innovate upon any right conferred by chapter 80 of the Code. It violates no established and recognized principle of public policy. It is susceptible of a construction that will avoid conflict with any of the constitutional limitations of legislative power. No ground is perceived, therefore, upon which the import of its terms, respecting the classes of cases to which it applies, can be cut down or restricted in meaning.

[2] But it must be interpreted and applied in conformity with legislative intent and purpose. It does not, in terms nor by necessary implication, authorize dispensation with the procedure ordained by the Constitution and statutes for the government and regulation of trials, findings, and judgment in actions and proceedings instituted in the courts for imposition of civil and criminal liability. It assumes that the courts, in administering it, will take notice of the modes of trial of such issues and adopt them. In so far as conviction of a criminal offense is sought, there must be an indictment and trial by jury, if the latter is not waived, as it may be in some cases. If establishment of civil liability is sought and properly denied, there is likewise right of trial by jury. In giving a civil remedy or creating a criminal offense, the Legislature is not bound to repeat in the act the constitutional guaranties and statutory provisions for trial. It is the duty of the courts to look beyond such acts for the procedure found in other parts of the law, except in so far as it is provided in the act. Fisher v. Somerville, 83 W. Va. 160, 93 S. E. 67; State v. Harris, 88 W. Va. 97, 106 S. E. 254.

dictment and trial, the court may make such order "as may seem just" for support. This, too, is collateral and incidental. The plea of not guilty entered to the indictment, when found, puts in issue the act made criminal by the statute, willful desertion and failure or refusal to support the dependent party. That issue, of course, includes the narrower, though basic, one, of relation, which may or may not be raised in the evidence on the trial. Ordinarily it is not, except in cases of alleged paternity of illegitimate children, but it is involved and may become actual in all of the other classes of cases. If that is the vital issue in any case, as it is here, the accused is entitled to have it determined by a jury, whether it is involved in the civil side of the case or the criminal side. Intention on the part of the Legislature to make any citizen, male or female, civilly liable for perhaps hundreds of dollars in the form of support pendente lite, otherwise than by the verdict of a jury, when the relation is properly denied, can no more be assumed nor indulged than intention to impose criminal liability without such trial.

[4] For the purposes of award of support pendente lite, that issue does not arise solely upon the complaint and warrant. There must be a petition, with notice to the defendant of the filing thereof, to which he has right to make defense. In many cases the relation charged in the petition is not and cannot be denied. If it is not, the court may award the temporary support, if, under all the circumstances, justice requires it, and in such an amount as is just. Failure to deny the relation or an express admission of it amounts to a confession of the cause of action alleged in the petition. It also confesses a relation which in law imposes the duty to render support. But, if it is denied, the situation is altogether different. The inquiry then arises, in the construction of the statute, whether support pendente lite can be awarded at all.

Postponement of all pecuniary relief, until after indictment, trial, conviction, and final judgment, would often work great hardship. There may be necessary continuances, mistrials, and appellate proceedings, carrying the controversy over a long period of time, and, in that way, the plainly manifest purpose of the Legislature to compel the rendition of support may be almost entirely defeated. While, in a legal sense, the main proceeding is criminal, its practical purpose is to coerce husbands and parents into the rendition of necessary support of wives and children, both before and after conviction of the accused. Section 3 of the act gives the prosecutor the right to come into court for pendente lite support, and empowers the court to award it. Its inability to try the issue of relationship, if made on the petition, without a jury, does not necessarily preclude such relief. The section of the act providing the remedy is silent as to the mode of trial. Not a word in it can be construed as necessarily inhibiting power in the court to impanel a jury for trial of such an issue, and let it render a verdict in such collateral proceeding, upon which the award or denial of the relief sought shall depend. And the prescription of a rule of evidence, by section 8, limited to the issue of relationship, is strongly suggestive of legislative contemplation of two issues, one governed by the rules of evidence applicable in civil cases, and the other by the rules applicable in criminal trials. Such power in the trial court is necessary to full realization of the legislative purpose, as disclosed by the general scope of the act and also by section 3 thereof. Generally it contemplates support of a more or less permanent character. As to temporary support, section 3 confers jurisdiction and power upon the court to award it, and right upon the complainant to come in and ask for it by petition. Notice to the defendant is required in order to give him an opportunity to defend. Parties to an informal civil proceeding are thus provided with power in the court to hear and determine the controversy and award relief, upon the basis of justice as disclosed by the circumstances. In this there is no exception of any case brought within the scope of the act, nor any limitation upon the court's powers. Temporary support is as clearly within the intent of the Legislature as permanent support. Power to award the latter is conferred in terms very similar in import to those in which authority is given to allow the former. Grant of power to make the allowance in term or in vacation does not preclude the construction here given the statute. A jury trial in vacation could hardly have been intended, but, in the great majority of the cases, there is no occasion for such a trial, for the relation is not denied. The meaning of the phrase, "the court or a judge thereof in vacation," is that the order may be made in term or in vacation, according to situation of the parties, the issues developed, and the circumstances disclosed. If an issue as to the relation is made by allegation and denial, the question should be determined in term, by a jury unless waived, and the order then made, or in vacation, according to the convenience of the court and parties. Otherwise, it may all be disposed of either in term or in vacation. The jury trial here suggested and held to be within the contemplation of the act will not in any way affect such a trial on the criminal charge preferred by the indictment. It determines the relationship only provisionally and for the purposes of award of temporary support. Moreover, the parties are different in the two trials. Our conclusion is that, in this case and others of its class, a temporary order awarding support pendente lite cannot properly be entered until after determination of the issue as to the relation of the parties, by a jury trial, if not waived, nor otherwise than upon a petition filed by the complainant praying for such relief, and notice to the defendant of the filing thereof.

In this proceeding all of the steps prescribed by the statute for determination of the right to temporary support were omitted. No petition was filed. The defendant had no notice of an application for award of such support. He was not accorded the right of trial by jury of the issue as to paternity of the child. The trial he had on the complaint and warrant was not such a one as the statute contemplates, except in so far as it may answer the purposes of a preliminary examination. His demurrer to the warrant and complaint and motion to quash them were properly overruled. Both papers follow the forms prescribed by the statute. As the entire proceeding, in so far as it relates to the award of temporary support, was irregular and erroneous, it is unnecessary to enter upon any inquiry as to the propriety of the rulings on the motion for a continuance and the demand for a trial by jury.

The judgment complained of will be reversed, except in so far as it required the defendant to enter into a recognizance to answer such indictment as should be found against him, and the case remanded.

APPALACHIAN POWER CO. v. TATE.
(No. 4419.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence ⇨441(9)—Where appliance is sold by particular description in written contract, buyer may not prove a verbal warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.

Where a machine or appliance is sold by a particular description or designation by a contract in writing, the buyer may not prove an express verbal warranty of fitness of such machine or appliance for a particular purpose.

2. Sales ⇨273(5)—There is no warranty that article bought by particular description is fit for any particular purpose, although seller knows the buyer intends it for such purpose.

Ordinarily there is no implied warranty that a machine or appliance sold by a particular description is fit for any particular purpose, even though the seller knows at the time of the sale that the buyer intends it for such specific purpose.

3. Sales ⇨272—Machine sold by particular description is impliedly warranted to be a merchantable article of the kind sold.

Where a sale of a machine or appliance is made by a particular description or designation, there is an implied warranty that it will be a merchantable article of the kind sold.

4. Sales ⇨273(5)—Buyer is justified in rejecting a machine sold by particular description, where it will not perform the usual service of the ordinary appliance described.

One who buys a machine or appliance by a particular description or designation is justified in rejecting the article tendered in satisfaction of the contract of sale, where it appears that it will not perform the service usually performed by the average or ordinary machine or appliance described in the contract of sale.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by the Appalachian Power Company against James D. Tate to recover a balance claimed upon an account for goods sold and delivered. Judgment for the defendant, plaintiff's bill dismissed, and the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McClagherty & Richardson, of Bluefield, for appellant.

Reynolds & Reynolds, of Princeton, for appellee.

RITZ, J. The plaintiff instituted this suit to recover the balance claimed upon an account for goods sold and delivered by it to the defendant, the jurisdiction in equity being sustained by an attachment sued out upon the ground that the defendant is a non-resident of the state of West Virginia. The right to recover was denied, and upon a hearing the court below found in favor of the defendant, and dismissed the plaintiff's bill, and it is to reverse this decree that this appeal is prosecuted.

The only substantial controversy arises over the right of the plaintiff to recover the purchase price of one "Isko refrigerating unit No. 20," amounting to $332.50. It appears that on the 9th day of May, 1919, the defendant gave a written order to the plaintiff for the refrigerating machine above mentioned at the price above indicated, to be shipped by express as soon as possible, and to be paid for in 30 days from date of delivery. This written order was accepted in writing by the plaintiff. It will be noted that there is no express warranty that the machine to be furnished would be fit for any particular use, or would accomplish any specific purpose. It is shown, however, that at the time this order was given and accepted the plaintiff's agent warranted that the machine would furnish refrigeration for the defendant's refrigerator, and would make small cubes of ice for domestic table use. Upon this order the plaintiff had the manufacturer ship a machine to the defendant, but the shipment was not made for nearly three months after the order was given. This delay in shipment is, however, not involved in the controversy. When the machine arrived it was received from the transportation company by an agent of the plaintiff, and taken to defendant's residence, where it was placed in a servant's room, without removing the original crating and packing, until the same could be installed. It seems that a part of this machine was intended to rest on the top of the refrigerator and another part, consisting of coils and perhaps some other devices, was intended to be placed inside the chamber of the refrigerator intended to contain the ice when the refrigerator was used in the ordinary way, and to connect the parts so placed it was necessary to bore holes through the top of the refrigerator, through which pipes extended joining the part on the outside with the part on the inside of the refrigerator. The mechanical device was operated by electricity, and to secure the current for this purpose it was necessary for the apparatus to be connected with the electric wires used by defendant for lighting his residence. Upon the delivery of the machine at his residence the defendant inquired of plaintiff's agent who made the delivery, who was the same agent who sold the machine to him, whom he could get to make these connections and install the machine, and this agent advised him that a certain plumber and a certain electrician could properly do the work. Accompanying the machine were diagrams and directions for the proper installation. On the day after the machine was delivered at his residence, defendant procured the plumber and the electrician recommended by plaintiff's agent to come to his residence for the purpose of installing the machine. Upon opening the door of the room in which the machine had been stored overnight, a very strong odor of gas was detected, which had evidently escaped from the machine. The crating and packing were removed and the machine installed in exact accordance with the directions, but it failed to produce any substantial refrigeration or to make any ice as it was contemplated that it would. Defendant thereupon notified the plaintiff's agent of the failure of the device to function, and this agent made an examination of it. He made no criticism of the manner in which the work of installation had been done, but discovered some valves which he thought were not properly adjusted. After adjusting these valves another attempt was made to operate the machine, but without success. The plaintiff's agent then concluded that the failure upon the part of the device to operate was occasioned by an insufficient supply of gas, and he undertook to secure an additional supply. He was unable to get the gas upon his order, and proposed that he would substitute a machine which he was using for demonstration purposes. The defendant acceded to this suggestion, and the substitution was made, but with no better results than had been obtained with the first machine. After repeated attempts to get the results contemplated, the defendant refused to accept the device, and so notified plaintiff's agent. Some time afterward a representative of the manufacturer appeared upon the scene, and examined the machine at defendant's residence, where it still remained. According to his contention it was badly out of repair, and required considerable replacements and repairs to make it a working machine. He proposed to remedy the difficulties, but the plaintiff refused to employ him for the purpose and incur the attendant liability, as did also the defendant, and the machine remained at the defendant's residence without any further attempt to use it at the time this suit was brought.

The defendant challenged the right of the plaintiff to recover upon this state of facts, and in addition filed an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, in which he claimed damages in the sum of $1,000 for injury to his refrigerator, for loss of food products on account of lack of refrigeration, and for inconvenience experienced by him in his home because of the experiments conducted with the machine.

[1] The plaintiff's right to recover depends upon the application of a few familiar principles of the law of sales. There is contained in the written order and the acceptance thereof no express warranty that the machine purchased would be fit for any particular use or would accomplish any particular purpose. There was a verbal warranty made by the plaintiff prior to or contemporaneous with the writing that the device would furnish refrigeration and would produce small cubes of ice for domestic table use. The plaintiff's agent admits this. Can we add this warranty to the written contract? If we can, the defendant's right to prevail in this suit is clear, for it is admitted that the machine does not and never did meet the terms of this warranty. There is some conflict among the authorities on this question. There are some holdings to the effect that a warranty is collateral to the principal contract, and may be proven by parol evidence, even though the contract of sale is in writing. The better reason, supported by the weight of authority, seems to be that a verbal express warranty cannot be added to a written contract of sale. Williston on Sales, § 215; 23 R. C. L., title "Sales," § 224. This is the doctrine adhered to by this court. Erie City Iron Works v. Miller Supply Co., 68 W. Va. 519, 70 S. E. 125; American Canning Co. v. Flat Top Grocery Co., 68 W. Va. 698, 70 S. E. 756.

[2] Being thus barred from considering the express verbal warranty, we must determine the rights of the parties upon the terms of the written contract. It is quite well established that where one buys an article of personal property by a particular description or of a designated kind, there is generally no implied warranty of fitness of such article for any particular purpose, even though the seller knows at the time of the sale that the buyer intends it for a specific use, but there is an implied warranty that the article furnished is a merchantable article of the kind purchased; that is, that it will fill the description of the article purchased. Gorby v. Bridgeman, 83 W. Va. 727, 99 S. E. 88. Applying this principle to the case here, if the machine furnished by the plaintiff meets the description of the machine contained in the written contract, then it has fully complied therewith, and is entitled to recover. If, on the other hand, the machine furnished was not a merchantable machine of the kind ordered, the defendant was justified in rejecting the same.

[3] That the machine furnished answered the description contained in the written contract so far as the name is concerned there is no doubt. Was it, however, an ordinary machine of that class? Did it possess the attributes ordinarily belonging to a machine of that kind? If it did not, then it did not meet the requirements of the contract. There is some evidence tending to show that the Isko refrigerating machine will not perform the functions of refrigeration or of making ice. If this is true, then the fact that the device furnished the defendant did not make ice is not evidence that it did not correspond with the description contained in the written contract. The plaintiff, however, has introduced much evidence to establish as a fact that the Isko machine when in proper order will produce adequate refrigeration and will make ice cubes, and, as before stated, a representative of the manufacturer condemned the machine furnished the defendant because it was out of order. Of course the plaintiff, in fulfillment of its contract, could not furnish a machine answering the general description, but so out of order or so lacking in workmanship as not to perform any of the functions usually performed by machines of the general class to which it belongs. Such a machine would not be a merchantable one of that class. There is evidence in support of both contentions, but it seems to us that the preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that an ordinary Isko machine will furnish refrigeration and make ice, and, it being conceded that the one furnished the defendant will not, it follows that it does not answer the description contained in the written order, and the court properly denied the plaintiff relief.

[4] The plaintiff insists that the defendant's conduct has been inconsistent with his contention that he rejected the machine, that it offered to take the machine back and relieve him of any liability for its purchase price, which offer he refused. It is true one of plaintiff's agents testifies that he proposed to the defendant that he would take the machine back for the plaintiff and cancel the claim for the purchase price, but the defendant says that this was to be also a settlement of any claims he might have for damages against the plaintiff, and that he did refuse to accept such settlement, but that he never refused to permit the plaintiff to reclaim the machine, but has been perfectly willing at all times and still is willing for it to take it and make any disposition it desires of it. The evidence of plaintiff's witness upon this question is not inconsistent with defendant's contention. He shows that he was trying to settle the controversies between the parties, and that defendant was then claiming damages, and it would seem from all of the evidence that his proposition contemplated just what the defendant says it did. Of course the defendant could not be compelled to waive any claims for damages that he might have, under penalty of being charged with conduct inconsistent with his rejection of the machine.

The plaintiff contends that it is entitled to recover in any event the sum of $9.50, being the price of an electric grill furnished the defendant. The defendant admits that he received this grill, but says that he is under the impression that he returned it, and enforces this contention with the declaration that it did not appear on the statement of account sent him by the plaintiff, all of the items of which he paid, except the one covering the price of the Isko machine. It is true when testifying he stated that he would ascertain definitely when he went home whether this grill had been returned, but there is no further showing in the record in regard to it. The plaintiff did not undertake to show that it had not been returned. It occurs to us that the defendant's statement, coupled with the fact that the item was not included in the statement of account sent him, justifies the finding of the circuit court upon this question.

The defendant cross-assigns as error the action of the court in denying his claim for damages. He claims that his refrigerator was rendered practically worthless in attempting to install the machine in it, and that it was worth from $200 to $250; that he lost a considerable quantity of vegetables, milk, and meat for want of refrigeration; and that he was much inconvenienced by the failure of the machine to produce refrigeration. That the refrigerator was slightly injured, sufficiently appears, but it is also shown that the damage to it can be repaired for a very inconsiderable sum; the amount not being shown. Under the evidence he was not entitled to recover as damages the full value of the refrigerator, but, if entitled to recover at all on this account, only the difference in the value of the same before and after the injury to it. What this is does not sufficiently appear to form a basis for a recovery in his favor. The claims for loss of food products are uncertain and indefinite. There is no showing of any actual loss on this account and the amount thereof. The inconvenience suffered is entirely too speculative and uncertain to form the basis of any recovery. The defendant's evidence introduced in support of his claim for damages entirely fails to establish any reasonably certain or definite basis for such recovery.

We find no error in the decree complained of, and the same is affirmed.

DEXTER & CARPENTER, Inc., v. CO-OPERATIVE FUEL CO. (No. 4422.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1003—Verdict contrary to weight and preponderance of evidence should be set aside.

Where the verdict of a jury is contrary to the decided weight and preponderance of the evidence, it should be set aside, notwithstanding the evidence may have justified the giving of instructions based thereon.

2. Sales \Leftrightarrow 428, 429—Where goods are sold without opportunity for inspection, buyer may recoup the difference between the contracted value and the value with the defects shown; return not condition precedent to recoupment.

When goods are sold to be of a particular kind or quality, and there has been no inspection or opportunity of inspection, and the buyer relies on the seller to deliver the goods contracted for, the purchaser may, when sued by the seller for the price thereof, recoup in damages the difference between the value which the goods sold would have had at the time of delivery if of the kind and quality corresponding to the warranty, and the actual value thereof at the same time with the defects shown; and it is not a condition precedent to such right that the purchaser should have notified the seller and offered to return the goods.

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by Dexter & Carpenter, Inc., against the Co-operative Fuel Company. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and defendant awarded a new trial.

Arthur F. Kingdon, of Bluefield, for plaintiff in error.

Lee & Tanner, of Bluefield, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. On notice of a motion therefor the plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for the sum of $922.21, the full amount sued for, and we awarded defendant the present writ of error to review the judgment pronounced on the 11th day of June, 1921.

What plaintiff sued for was the price of two car loads of coal sold and delivered to defendant, the first on November 5, 1920, containing 41.40 net tons at $9.00 per ton, amounting to $372.60; the second on November 10, 1920, containing 58.70 net tons at $9.00 per ton, amounting to $528.30, which with interest to the date of the notice totaled $918.90, and at the date of the verdict, $922.21, the amount of the verdict and judgment.

Besides the general issue of non assumption, the defendant filed a plea of tender before suit and on the trial, of $282.48, also a notice of recoupment of damages for breach of the contract by plaintiff in furnishing coal of an inferior quality to that of Standard Pocahontas ROM coal contracted for, and for which defendant was only able to realize the sum of $385.91, and was obliged to pay demurrage and switching charges amounting to $53.38, and on which coal it was entitled to a profit of fifty cents per ton, or $50.05, leaving a net balance of $282.48, the amount tendered, entitling defendant to recoup in damages the difference between $900.90, the principal sum sued for, and the sum of $282.48, or the sum of $617.42, which it would undertake to offset against plaintiff's demand.

It is agreed that the memorandum orders accepted by plaintiff show that the coal contracted for was what was known in the market as Standard Pocahontas ROM (run of mine) coal. And according to these memoranda the coal was to be shipped to defendant at Portsmouth Scales, Ohio.

The main controversy before the court and jury was whether the two cars of coal sued for were in fact Standard Pocahontas ROM coal; and much testimony of witnesses was introduced on this question. It was fully proven that these two cars of coal came from what it known as the J. B. B. mines, in McDowell County, and were billed and shipped to Portsmouth, Ohio, not in the name of the defendant, but in the name of the plaintiff, where there was a joint agent or shipping clerk, who received them and rebilled and shipped them to defendant's customer, the Ford Motor Company, at Detroit, Michigan, where they were received a few days later, and were after analysis rejected, apparently on the ground that the coal was too high in ash qualities; and plaintiff was so notified through its agent at Bluefield, W. Va., where the contract was made, by the agent of the defendant company, also located there.

It is proven that the coal from the J. B. B. mines, owned and operated by plaintiff, was generally good coal, and was, when properly mined and delivered in the cars, accepted in the market as Standard Pocahontas ROM coal. The witnesses for plaintiff and defendant, however, differ as to the proper manner for preparing the coal for shipment at the mines. One or two of defendant's witnesses say that, at some mines at least, the coal is first run over screens, and the lump, egg, nut and slack thereby separated and delivered on to different tables, where it is picked and the impurities removed, and when so treated, Standard Pocahontas ROM coal is produced by reassembling the different lots in about the proportion it comes from the mine, namely, 40% to 50% lump, egg and nut, and 50% to 60% slack, and then delivered into the cars for shipment. It is proven and agreed that the J. B. B. mines have no equipment for purifying and preparing the coal for market in this way; but witnesses for plaintiff say that Standard Pocahontas ROM coal does not call for such treatment; that run of mine means the coal just as it is mined and hauled out of the mine and dumped into the cars. Notwithstanding this claim, plaintiff's manager at Bluefield says on cross-examination that Standard Pocahontas run of mine for the United States Navy is fixed as to quality by chemical analysis, but that when sold elsewhere the designation Standard Pocahontas ROM has no meaning other than run of mine. Accepting this as the true basis for marketing the coal, however, the evidence satisfies us that run of the mine coal from the mines of plaintiff would produce lump, egg, nut and slack in about the proportion named, that is, 40% to 50% lump, egg and nut, and 50% to 60% slack, and that the chemical analysis should not show over 4% to 6% ash, and that a showing of a greater percent. of ash would mean dirty coal, not properly classified as Standard Pocahontas ROM coal.

But whatever may be the true method of producing and classifying Standard Pocahontas ROM coal, it is conceded by plaintiff that coal so classified and sold in the market, whether at the seaboard or inland, has good heat producing and other qualities, and is free from impurities rendering it practically worthless for steam and domestic purposes. So that for the purposes of this case it becomes of little importance whether the one or another method of producing such coal be the proper one; to answer the reasonable requirements of such coal for steam or domestic uses it should come up to the quality of coal sold as Standard Pocahontas ROM coal. Otherwise the seller could not know what he was selling, nor the buyer what he has contracted for. After this case arose the plaintiff took samples by pick from the face of one of its mines and had them analyzed, and proved by this analysis that they showed a low percentage of ash, not over 4%; and plaintiff proved by the same witnesses that the average per centum of ash in the Standard Pocahontas ROM coal runs not to exceed 7% of ash. The customer of defendant, the Ford Motor Company, in rejecting the particular coal in question, replied that the coal in the two cars rejected showed an ash test of over 12%. Objection was made to this evidence because hearsay, the chemist of the Ford Motor Company who made the test not being found or examined; but this was the ground of objection by the Ford Motor Company, and it is conceded that a coal showing this high a percentage of ash would be a dirty coal, and much higher showing than the coal from the Pocahontas field should develop. However, defendant does not rely wholly on the test supposed to have been made by the Ford Motor Company. After the coal was rejected a representative of the defendant was sent to Detroit, and was told that he might have it analyzed at the Ford company's expense, and if it showed the proper test, the Ford company would take it and pay for it. The coal was identified by the numbers of the cars in which it was shipped. Defendant's representative concluded that it was useless to have the test made, and he set out to make the best disposition of the coal that he could. He succeeded in selling both loads to J. W. Dykstra & Company, a coal dealer at Detroit, at the price shown in defendant's recoupment, who in turn disposed of car I. C. 118519 to the Peoples Coal & Coke Company, dealers at Detroit, and the other car N. & W. 47350 to R. A. Holland at Walkerville, Ontario. Each purchaser swears that the coal in the car purchased was not Standard Pocahontas coal. The purchaser of I. C. car No. 118519 said it looked like nut, pea and slack; and the witness Michalak, of the Peoples Coal & Coke Company, swears that the car bought by his company was mostly fine slack and was mixed with sand; that one purchaser to whom he sold a part of it complained, and when he went to investigate he found his furnace choked; that he advised buying some lump coal to mix with the other, which was done, and still it would not work in the furnace, and he had to remove the coal from the cellar of his customer; that other complaints were made by other customers; that they still had a greater part of the coal on hand; and that his company had complained to J. W. Dykstra about the coal, and had not paid for it. The Ontario customer testified to the bad qualities of his coal; said that on account of its quality the Canadian government had made him a rebate of the difference between fifty-three cents, the regular customs duty per ton on the class of coal purchased, and fourteen cents a ton, the rate on inferior coal such as he got in the car purchased. There is some evidence tending to show that exposure of the coal to weather may have accounted for the disintegration shown, but this would not account for the dirty condition and bad quality of the coal as shown by the positive evidence of the witnesses. It is conceded that these cars of coal had no substantial inspection at the mines before shipment. Plaintiff had only one inspector to inspect as many as fifty cars a day, produced at five different and widely separated mines; and he says he could not be at the mines when the coal was being run and dumped into the cars. This coal had no inspection until it reached Detroit. The purchaser at Walkerville, Ontario, says he used the coal himself and would not have purchased it at all if he had seen it beforehand. Plaintiff offered no evidence of the character of these two loads of coal except the general statement of its superintendent that it was run of the mine coal. These cars were two of the six sold to the Ford Motor Company. The four other cars were accepted without objection. Why not these two, if Standard Pocahontas ROM coal? There could be no reason for the Ford company rejecting these and not the four cars accepted, except that the coal was bad and inferior and not of the quality of the four other cars. There is some evidence that about the time this coal was loaded the plaintiff had been engaged in robbing its coal of egg and nut to fill orders for those grades of coal. But while significant, we do not think this fact material.

[1] Upon the whole evidence we think the plaintiff failed to make even a prima facie case of compliance with its contract, and that the verdict of the jury was contrary to the plain preponderance of the evidence. Where the verdict of the jury is contrary to the decided weight and preponderance of the evidence, notwithstanding the evidence may have justified the giving of instructions based on it, it will be set aside. Fucy v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 75 W. Va. 134, 141, 83 S. E. 301.

[2] But as is said it was the duty of the defendant, if the coal was not of the quality called for by the contract, to reject it and notify the plaintiff, and give it opportunity to resell or give orders for its disposition; that having accepted and sold it, defendant was bound for the full price regardless of the quality or character of the coal; and such seems to have been the theory of the trial court as evidenced by instructions given to the jury and refused. The coal was shipped, not to the defendant at Portsmouth Scales as stipulated in the order, but to the plaintiff itself, and there turned over to defendant through a joint agent. There was no opportunity there to properly inspect the coal in the cars; and it must have been known to the plaintiff that the only one there to look after the coal was the billing or shipping clerk, employed to rebill and forward the coal to defendant's customers. The coal was sold f. o. b. cars at the mines, and certainly there was no opportunity there for the defendant to inspect it. Viewing the coal from the top of the car would not ordinarily furnish adequate opportunity for inspection. In the case of Wilson v. Wiggin, 73 W. Va. 560, 81 S. E. 842, we held that under such circumstances the purchaser, if the goods are not of the kind and the quality contracted for, though he has not returned or offered to return them, or notified the seller of the defect, may plead the breach in recoupment of the purchase price, when the seller sues therefor. And subsequently, when this case was again before us on writ of error, we decided that the true measure of damages in such cases is the difference between the value which the goods sold would have had at the time of delivery if of the kind and quality corresponding to the warranty, and the actual value thereof at the same time with the defects shown.

And in Virginia, the Supreme Court of Appeals held that a purchaser is not estopped from claiming damages for such breach because he has given no notice to the seller of his claim. Eastern Ice Co. v. King, 86 Va. 97, 102, 9 S. E. 506.

In the case here the evidence satisfies us that the defendant sold the coal at the very best price obtainable in the market, on the basis f. o. b. cars at the mines, and thereby mitigated the damages which it was entitled to recoup against plaintiff.

In so far as the instructions given and refused are not in accord with the foregoing principles, they should, on the new trial about to be awarded, be refused or modified.

The judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the defendant awarded a new trial.

DAVIS v. FISHER. (No. 4320.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)

1. Principal and agent §189(4)—In action on a contract, where defendant pleaded nil debet, evidence he made the contract merely as agent for disclosed principal was admissible under the general issue.

Plaintiff, on motion under the statute, sought to recover judgment for money alleged to be owing him, under a verbal contract made with defendant. Defendant pleaded nil debet, and upon the trial offered evidence tending to show that, when the alleged contract was made, he was acting as the agent of a disclosed principal and not for himself, and that plaintiff then knew he was so acting. Such evidence was admissible under the general issue, and it was error to exclude it.

2. Pleading §428(3)—In action on contract, where defendant pleaded nil debet, plaintiff not moving to require defendant to file particulars of defense cannot object to testimony admissible under such plea.

In an action for recovery of money due on contract, where defendant has filed the plea of nil debet, the plaintiff has the right under section 48, chapter 130 (sec. 4903), Code, to move the court to require the defendant to file a statement showing the particulars of his ground of defense, and, upon his failure or neglect to make such motion, he cannot, on the ground of surprise, object to evidence properly admissible under such plea.

3. Principal and agent §136(2)—Principal and not agent held bound by agent's commission contract made within actual or apparent scope of authority.

Where an agent, within the scope of his actual or apparent authority, and acting for and on behalf of his disclosed principal, makes a contract to pay plaintiff commissions for his services in bringing about a meeting between the agent and the owner of certain timber which the principal desires to purchase, and, in consequence of which meeting, the agent procures such timber for his principal, such contract is deemed to be that of the principal, and the agent is not bound by it, unless his conduct or his express promise evinces an intention that he shall be bound personally.

4. Principal and agent — 194(4)—Refusal of instruction that defendant agent was not liable for commissions under contract if made for disclosed principal held error.

Under such circumstances it is error to refuse an instruction on behalf of the defendant agent in an action for such commissions, which told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant made the contract as claimed by the plaintiff, and that at the time it was made the defendant was acting for his principal in making the contract, and that plaintiff then knew the defendant was so acting, the jury should find for the defendant, there being no claim by the plaintiff that defendant promised to pay the debt of his principal.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by George E. Davis against W. H. Fisher. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying a motion to set aside a verdict and for a new trial, the defendant brings error. Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

W. B. & E. L. Maxwell, of Elkins, for plaintiff in error.

R. S. Irons and A. M. Cunningham, both of Elkins, for defendant in error.

MEREDITH, J. Plaintiff caused to be served upon defendant a notice, with affidavit attached, that on February 19, 1919, he would move the circuit court of Randolph county for judgment against him for $540, with interest from September 1, 1918, for commissions alleged to be due him from defendant upon a verbal contract made between them, whereby defendant agreed to pay plaintiff $1 per cord for each and every cord of locust timber taken from the lands of O. S. Armentrout in Dry Fork district in said county, for plaintiff's services and attention in securing a meeting between defendant and said Armentrout by and through which the defendant purchased said locust timber from Armentrout to the amount of 540 cords. Defendant filed his counter affidavit and plea of nil debet, and, upon a trial before a jury, a verdict was returned for the amount sued for; defendant's motion to set aside the verdict and award him a new trial was overruled; judgment was entered for plaintiff, and from that order defendant obtained a writ of error to this court. Two errors are complained of: First, that the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered by defendant; and, second, in refusing defendant's instruction No. 6, which is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant did make the contract as claimed by the plaintiff, and that at the time said contract was made the defendant was acting for the Buena Vista Hardwood Company in making said contract, and that the plaintiff knew at that time that the defendant was so acting, then the jury should find for the defendant."

As these involve the same question, they may be considered together. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that defendant bought the Armentrout timber, and that plaintiff was instrumental in bringing Armentrout and defendant together, and for which he was to be paid $1 per cord for all the timber purchased by defendant from Armentrout, and which amounted to 540 cords. Defendant denied any such agreement with plaintiff, and offered evidence tending to show that, when he bought the timber, he bought it for the Buena Vista Hardwood Company and not for himself, and that he was acting solely as the agent of that company, and that such was known to the plaintiff at that time; that plaintiff then had other contracts with that company by which he was furnishing it locust timber, and made his settlements for such timber with defendant as agent of the company, and received a stipulated price of $18 per cord for all locust timber delivered by plaintiff to defendant as agent of the company, and which was the only compensation to which plaintiff was entitled by reason of his contracts made with that company.

It appears that defendant manufactured some of the Armentrout timber into locust pins for shipbuilding purposes under a contract with the Keystone Manufacturing Company, which company had bought the timber from the hardwood company. This evidence, as well as the evidence offered by defendant that he bought the timber, not for himself, but for and as agent of the hardwood company, the court excluded. It appears from the briefs filed in the case that this evidence was excluded on the theory that it could not be admitted under the general issue for two reasons: (1) That, in order to have it admitted, defendant should have filed a plea in abatement at rules, alleging the nonjoinder of the hardwood company as a cocontractor, and that this could not be done because the hardwood company was a nonresident of the state; and (2) that, before such evidence could be admitted, defendant should have filed a special plea alleging his agency so as to give the plaintiff notice of his defense.

[1, 2] As to the first objection, there was no occasion for the filing of such plea in abatement; of course, it could not be filed at rules, because the case was never at rules. Defendant did not seek to show by his evidence that the hardwood company was a cocontractor, that is, a contractor jointly liable with him in the purchase of the timber, but, on the contrary, his evidence offered and excluded tended to show that the hardwood company was the sole contractor, and defendant was not a contractor at all in any sense, either joint or several; that he was acting merely as its agent when the timber was bought, and that his agency was known to the plaintiff. The second ground of objection is equally untenable. If the plaintiff desired to know the ground of defense that would be relied on by defendant in the trial, all he needed to do was to move the court to require the defendant to file a statement showing the particular matters relied upon by him. We have no doubt the court would have readily granted it, under section 46, chapter 130 (sec. 4903) of the Code, which provides:

"In any action or motion, the court may order a statement to be filed of the particulars of the claim, or of the ground of defense; and if a party fail to comply with such order, may, when the case is tried or heard, exclude evidence of any matter not described in the notice, declaration, or other pleading of such party so plainly as to give the adverse party notice of its character."

It will be observed that this statute applies alike to plaintiff and defendant; no such motion was made, and the plaintiff, therefore, could not properly object to the admission of defendant's evidence, because of surprise or because of lack of notice to him that it would be offered.

This evidence is clearly admissible under the general issue in this case. All the authorities so hold. As stated in 4 Minor's Inst. 770:

"Hence, under the plea of nil debet, the defendant may prove at the trial, coverture when the promise was made, lunacy, duress, infancy, release, arbitrament, accord and satisfaction, payment, a want of consideration for the promise, failure or fraud in the consideration, a former judgment for the same cause of action, illegality in the contract, as gaming, usury etc.; * * * and, in short, anything which shows that there is no existing debt."

See, also, Kittle, Modern Law of Assumpsit, § 364; Insurance Co. v. Buck, 88 Va. 517, 13 S. E. 973; Keckley v. Union Bank, 79 Va. 462; Richmond Union Pas. Ry. Co. v. New York Seabeach Ry. Co., 95 Va. 386, 28 S. E. 573; Bank v. Foster, 35 W. Va. 357, 13 S. E. 996; Sutherland v. Guthrie, 82 W. Va. 419, 96 S. E. 61.

The evidence offered by the defendant should have been permitted to go to the jury, and its rejection was error.

But was defendant's instruction No. 6 above quoted proper in view of the evidence? Plaintiff testified:

"Mr. Fisher told me if I would get that locust—get Mr. Armentrout to sell that locust—he would give me a dollar on the cord for the locust wood, all that came off of their land, whether he brought it to Hendricks or manufactured it on the ground."

He further stated that if he (plaintiff) moved the timber to Hendricks, he was to have in addition to the dollar a cord his expenses for moving it. It appears that at that time the hardwood company had a mill at Hendricks for manufacturing the timber, but after it sold the timber to the Keystone Manufacturing Company, that company employed the defendant to manufacture the timber on the ground, so plaintiff did not move any of it.

[3, 4] If defendant as agent of the hardwood company contracted with plaintiff to pay him for his services, and plaintiff knew at that time that he was contracting with him as agent, then plaintiff's contract was made with the hardwood company.

"If an agent is acting within the scope of his actual or apparent authority, and purports to enter into a contract on behalf of the principal it is fundamental that the contract is that of the principal and all rights and obligations under it belong to him. The agent can neither enforce it, nor is he bound by it. In informal contracts it is sometimes a difficult question of fact to determine whether the agent did contract on his own behalf or on behalf of his principal. In any case the question is one of fact. The inquiry must be made, to whom was the third person justified in giving credit? If the name of the principal is disclosed, the presumption is strong of an intention to contract on behalf of the principal, and not of the agent." Williston, Contracts, § 281.

"Where an agent contracts on behalf of a disclosed principal, in reference to the matters within the scope of the agency, and within the scope of his authority conferred upon him, there is always a legal presumption that he intended to bind his principal and not himself personally, and that credit is extended to the principal and not to the agent; and unless credit has been given to the agent expressly or exclusively, and it was clearly his intention to assume a personal responsibility, and this is shown by clear and explicit evidence, the agent will not be personally liable on the contract." Clark & Skyles, Agency, § 565; Hall v. Lauderdale, 46 N. Y. 70.

"A person having contracted with an agent, knowing him to be such, for the rent of a piano to be used in the principal's business, cannot, by charging the account to the agent, elect to hold him for the rent, instead of the principal, and he is not precluded, by so charging, from asserting the claim against the principal." Guest v. Burlington Opera House Co., 74 Iowa, 457, 38 N. W. 158; Simonds v. Heard, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 120, 34 Am. Dec. 41.

"Where in a chancery suit to require money to be paid on a contract it appears that one of the parties, who signed the contract, had no interest in the subject but was acting as agent merely, and the other contracting party knew that he was acting as agent for others, no personal decree can be had against such person for the repayment of moneys paid on such contract." Smith v. Bond et al., 25 W. Va. 387. See, also, Hoon v. Hyman, 87 W. Va. 659, 105 S. E. 925.

The instruction told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the parties made the contract as claimed by the plaintiff, and that at the time the contract was made the defendant was acting for the hardwood company in making the contract, that is, acting for it and in its behalf, and thus made the promise of $1 per cord to be paid by it, and that plaintiff then knew that defendant was so contracting on behalf of the hardwood company, the jury should find for the defendant. This instruction should have been given; it was error to refuse it. We therefore reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for a new trial.

LEWIS v. WELCH WHOLESALE FLOUR & FEED CO. et al. (No. 4465.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 7, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Landlord and tenant §123—Lease recognizing occupancy of part of premises by tenant and providing for subsequent surrender held not to exclude such part from lease.

A stipulation in a lease in terms demising certain buildings, which, recognizing the occupancy of part of one of them by a tenant of the lessor without indication of the character of the tenancy of the occupant, assumes subsequent vacation and surrender of possession by him, says no definite time is fixed for such vacation and surrender, and provides for an agreed abatement of the rent reserved on the entire property, until such vacation and surrender shall occur, does not except the occupied part of the property from the operation of the lease, in favor of the occupant, nor reserve it to the lessor, except for a period of time, reasonable in view of the situation and purposes of the parties to the lease and the circumstances surrounding them at the date of execution thereof.

2. Landlord and tenant §22(2)—Stipulation in lease, reserving part of building then occupied by tenant for reasonable time, demises whole premises.

Such stipulation does not make the instrument, as to the occupied part of the building, a mere contract for a lease. The entire property is demised, subject to a burden or incumbrance in favor of the occupant, consisting of right to retain possession of the occupied part thereof, for such reasonable period of time.

3. Landlord and tenant §117, 120(1)—Lease creating burden in favor of occupant by sufferance held to terminate occupant's right after expiration of reasonable time for surrendering premises.

The occupant in whose favor such burden is created is prima facie a tenant at will or by sufferance of the lessor, in the absence of disclosure of right of a higher nature in him, and such tenancy is terminated by the execution of the lease, notice thereof to him, and expiration of such reasonable period of time.

4. Landlord and tenant §291(4)—Lessee may maintain action against occupant of premises after reasonable time for surrender and notice.

After expiration of such period and demand for possession, the lessee may invoke and maintain, against such occupant, the statutory remedy known as unlawful detainer, for recovery of the possession of the part of the property so withheld.

Error to Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Action by Walter H. Lewis against the Welch Wholesale Flour & Feed Company, and others. Directed verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and verdict set aside, and case remanded for new trial.

Strother, Sale, Curd & Tucker, of Welch, for plaintiff in error.

Litz & Harman and G. W. Howard, all of Welch, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, P. The judgment under review on this writ of error was rendered upon a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, in an action of unlawful detainer in which the issues involved are right to possession of one floor of a certain building and damages for detention thereof.

The defendant, a corporation, was in possession of that floor at the date of the lease made to the plaintiff, as tenant of the lessor, under some sort of an agreement the nature of which is not disclosed by the evidence, and the lease recognized such possession and contained a stipulation respecting it. Failure of the lessor to put that tenant out and admit the plaintiff to possession is the occasion of this action.

C. D. Brewster, having two brick buildings on two adjoining lots, one a two-story building in course of construction and not completed, and the other a completed one-story building, one floor of the latter being then occupied by the Welch Wholesale Flour & Feed Company, a corporation in which he was a stockholder, entered into a lease with the plaintiff, February 25, 1920, by which he demised and let both buildings to him, for a term of 10 years, commencing April 1, 1920, with the privilege of renewal for a further and like term, upon certain conditions. An annual rental of $7,500, payable in monthly installments, was provided for in the lease, with a proportionate right of abatement of rent for uncompleted portions of the two-story building.

As to the occupied floor of the one-story building, the parties agreed as follows, by a clause inserted in the lease:

"The lessors agree with the lessee that the lessee shall be entitled to a reduction of one hundred ($100.00) dollars per month from the said monthly rental until such a time as the said lessors or their tenants shall vacate from the first floor of the said one-story brick building, and deliver possession of the said one-story brick building to the lessee, it being understood and agreed that the lessors or their tenants are now in possession of the first floor of the said brick building, and no definite time is fixed for the lessors to vacate and surrender possession of said one-story brick building, but it being further understood and agreed that the basement under said one-story brick building is now and will be available to said lessee for use and occupancy."

Under the lease, the plaintiff took possession of all of the premises except the floor in question, and, after having verbally demanded possession of that floor, served a written notice upon the defendant, February 10, 1921, requiring vacation of it and relinquishment of the possession thereof, on or before March 31, 1921. Compliance with that requirement having been refused, the summons in this action was issued June 16, 1921, and executed June 30, 1921.

On the trial, the lease and written notice were put in evidence and supplemented by the oral testimony of the plaintiff, proving verbal demands for possession, both before and after service of the written notice, and also the amount of his damages. Thereupon the defendant tendered a statement of agreed facts, showing the interest of the lessor, directly and indirectly, in the defendant corporation, at the date of execution of the lease, and disposal thereof before institution of this action; and also offered the testimony of a witness, tending to prove verbal negotiations between the parties to the lease, resulting in the stipulation above quoted. Both the statement and the evidence of that witness were rejected by the court.

[1, 2] The court's direction of a verdict for the defendant, by the giving of a peremptory instruction to find for it, seems to have been based upon the theory of nonexpiration of its term or tenancy, or lack of right of possession in the plaintiff, and not upon a defect as to parties or informality of any kind in the procedure. That the plaintiff's lease includes the entire building is incontrovertible, unless the stipulation referred to partially nullifies the express demise thereof made in the granting clause of the instrument. The two clauses read together are perfectly consistent, however, and the latter did not except any property included in the former. It impliedly said the occupied floor should be vacated and possession thereof delivered to the lessee, and provided for an abatement of rent, until the vacation and surrender should occur. If the granting clause did not expressly demise the entire building, there would be strength in the contention that, as to the floor in question, the lease amounted to no more than a contract for a demise thereof; but it was expressly demised, and was not afterward excepted by the stipulation relied upon. On the contrary, as has been observed, the stipulation carries an implication, or rather an express assumption, that the occupied part of the building would be vacated in favor of the lessee. Hence, it is manifest, that the lease granted the plaintiff a term of 10 years in the entire building, commencing April 1, 1920, subject to an incumbrance or burden thereon, occasioned by the occupancy of a part of it, for an apparently indefinite time, by the lessors or their tenant, with a reciprocal right of abatement from the rent, provided no inconsistent term or right was reserved to the lessors or excepted in favor of their tenant.

As to that, nothing was agreed, except that the lessors or their tenants were then in possession, and that no definite time had been fixed for vacation and surrender. This agreement fails to disclose such reservation or exception, and also continues and repeats the assumption of future vacation and surrender of possession. It merely recognized the existing occupancy and stipulated that no definite time for termination thereof was fixed by it. As to the right of the occupant, if a tenant of the lessors, it is either silent or admits that the tenant had no definite term. As the tenant, if any, was not a party to the lease, nor bound by its provisions, no doubt the stipulation ought to be construed as reserving no definite right of possession in the lessors and as representing that their tenant had none. However this may be, it is obvious that no term for months or years is reserved to the lessors or excepted in favor of a third party, by any provision of the lease.

The evident purpose of the stipulation relied upon was an allowance of a reasonable period of time, after April 1, 1920, for convenient transfer of the business of the defendant from the building to some other location, during which the rent should be abated in an agreed amount. It must be allowed some effect and operation, if it may operate consistently with the other terms and provisions of the instrument. Having found one function for it, agreeable to its own terms and consistent with the expressed objects and purposes of the parties, nothing in the rules of interpretation requires allowance to it of any further scope or effect.

White v. Bailey, 65 W. Va. 573, 64 S. E. 1019, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 232. Functions, neither expressed nor necessarily implied, should not be added.

As the defendant set up no title in itself and relied solely upon this stipulation of the lease, which, except as aforesaid, reserved none to its landlord and admitted none in it, and more than a year after April 1, 1920, had elapsed at the date of the institution of this action a manifestly reasonable period, the court should have given the peremptory instruction requested by the plaintiff, and refused the one it gave at the instance of the defendant, if the plaintiff had right of action against the occupying tenant, to recover the possession.

[3] Lack of disclosure of any right on the part of the defendant, except a possession rightful in its inception, made it prima facie a tenant at will or by sufferance of the lessors, at the date of the execution of the lease to the plaintiff. The lessors held the legal title to the property and the defendant was in possession under them. Nothing further appeared then or has since been disclosed. Holding a lease of the property from the owner, effective after the lapse of a reasonable time from April 1, 1920, the plaintiff had such right respecting possession, as his lessors had at the date of execution thereof. If the occupant was then a mere tenant at will or by sufferance, as it must be deemed to have been, in the absence of disclosure of any better right, the execution of the lease terminated it as of the date on which it became effective. At and from that time, the plaintiff had, and has had, right of possession superior to that of the defendant, if the execution of the lease terminated the indefinite tenancy of the latter. It did. Hildreth

v. Conant, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 300; Mizner v. Munroe, 10 Gray (Mass.) 290; Pratt v. Farrar, 10 Allen (Mass.) 519; Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 4 N. E. 824, 55 Am. Rep. 462; Grundy v. Martin, 143 Mass. 279, 9 N. E. 647; Cofran v. Shepard, 148 Mass. 582, 20 N. E. 181; Underhill, Land. & Ten. § 153; Tiffany, Land. & Ten. p. 1424.

[4] After notice to the tenant at will, of the execution of the lease, expiration of the reasonable time allowed by it, and demand for vacation, the plaintiff was entitled also to invoke the remedy he adopted. Our statute giving it is very liberal. Any person against whom possession of land is unlawfully detained, no matter what his right or title may be, can invoke it. Code, c. 89, § 1 (sec. 4065). It lies between lessees of the same land, in favor of him who has superior right of possession thereof. Guffy v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 49, 61, 11 S. E. 754, 8 L. R. A. 759, 26 Am. St. Rep. 901.

Exclusion of evidence, offered by the defendant is not complained of. However no error in it is perceived. The rights of the parties depend upon the written contract which cannot be varied by parol evidence, in the absence of disclosure of a tenancy in the defendant superior in right to that of the plaintiff, and the evidence rejected was not such in character as to give any aid in the interpretation thereof, in so far as it may be deemed to be uncertain or indefinite in its terms. The declarations of the parties, as to what they intended by the language they used, are inadmissible. Snider v. Robinett, 78 W. Va. 88, 88 S. E. 599; Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co., 51 W. Va. 106, 41 S. E. 340.

Being clearly erroneous, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial

HOLLY SPRINGS LAND & IMPROVEMENT
CO. v. BREWER. (No. 250.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

Appeal and error \S 927(3)—On review of grant of motion for nonsuit, evidence construed in plaintiff's favor.

On review of grant of motion for nonsuit the evidence should be considered in the light most favorable to the plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Connor, Judge.

Action by the Holly Springs Land & Improvement Company against W. L. Brewer. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff excepts and appeals. Reversed.

P. J. Olive, of Apex, and Little & Barnes and J. W. Bailey, all of Raleigh, for appellant.

H. E. Norris and Armistead Jones & Son, all of Raleigh, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. It is alleged in the complaint that on February 17, 1916, I. D. Royal and his wife executed and delivered to the plaintiff a deed conveying certain timber situated on the land therein described, and that after the registration of the deed these grantors conveyed a part of said land to the defendant. It is also alleged that for the purpose of acquiring title to a portion of the plaintiff's timber the defendant has endeavored to hinder and delay the plaintiff in removing it, and to this end has threatened and intimidated the plaintiff's employees, and with evil intent has had one of them arrested and prosecuted for an alleged breach of the criminal law, and otherwise has wrongfully obstructed the plaintiff's right of removal. The defendant denies the material allegations of the complaint, and alleges that the plaintiff has wrongfully cut and removed a large quantity of timber of dimensions smaller than the plaintiff's deed specifies, and has otherwise damaged the land.

It is unnecessary to analyze the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, which covers about 24 pages of the record; but a careful perusal of the evidence, considered in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, leads us to the conclusion that the jury should have been permitted to determine the controversy between the parties. Daniels v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 87 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 719; Freeman v. Brown, 151 N. C. 111, 65 S. E. 743; Morton v. Lumber Co., 152 N. C. 54, 67 S. E. 67; *Christman v. STATE v. FRESHWATER. (No. 325.)(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5,

1. Municipal corporations \S 592(1) — Ordinance held void as conflicting with statutes.

Under C. S. \S 2618, limiting speed of automobiles to 18 miles per hour in the residence section of a city, and to 10 miles per hour in the business section, and section 2599, making the violation of those statutes punishable by a fine not exceeding $50 and imprisonment not more than 30 days, and section 2601, inhibiting passage of ordinance by a city contrary to the provisions of the chapter in which those statutes are found, a city ordinance limiting the speed of automobiles to 15 miles per hour in the residence section, and to 8 miles per hour in the business section, and punishing the first violation by a fine of $5, the second by a fine of $10, and the third by canceling the permit to operate motor vehicles, is void.

2. Municipal corporations \S 592(1) — In case of conflict, ordinances must yield to state law.

In case of conflict between municipal ordinances and the state law, the former must yield.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Kerr, Judge.

Bob Freshwater was convicted of violation of a city ordinance, and he appeals. Reversed.

The ordinance is as follows:

"That the speed limit on all automobiles, motor cars, electric and steam vehicles of any and all kinds shall not exceed eight miles an hour over the streets in what is known as the fire limits; and through and over any other streets of the city of Burlington the speed limit shall not exceed fifteen miles an hour; that in turning from one street to another the signal must be given, and that the mufflers on all automobiles shall not be open within the fire limits.

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall upon conviction before the mayor be punished by a fine of $5.00; for the second offense or any subsequent offense he shall be punished by a fine of $10.00; and upon conviction of the third offense the permit to operate automobiles or other motor vehicles shall be canceled."

Sections 57b, 57h.

At the close of the state's evidence the defendant moved to dismiss as in case of nonsuit. C. S. \S 4643. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Verdict of guilty. Judgment, and appeal by defendant.

William I. Ward, of Graham, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ADAMS, J. [1, 2] The ordinance is plainly in conflict with sections 2599 and 2618 of the Consolidated Statutes. Section 2601 inhibits the governing body of a municipal corporation from passing any ordinance contrary to the provisions of the chapter in which these sections are found. But, with-out regard to this statutory inhibition, the conflict would be fatal. Municipal ordinances are ordained for local purposes in the exercise of a delegated legislative function, and must harmonize with the general laws of the state. In case of conflict the ordinance must yield to the state law. The motion to dismiss the action should therefore have been allowed. Washington v. Hammond, 76 N. C. 33; State v. Langston, 88 N. C. 693; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 574; State v. Keith, 94 N. C. 933; State v. Austin, 114 N. C. 835, 19 S. E. 919, 25 L. R. A. 283, 41 Am. St. Rep. 817; State v. McCoy, 116 N. C. 1059, 21 S. E. 690; State v. Black, 150 N. C. 886, 64 S. E. 778. On the defendant's motion the judgment is reversed, and this will be certified.

Reversed.

BOWMAN v. FIDELITY TRUST & DEVELOPMENT CO. et al. (No. 282.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Trial \Leftarrow 25(7)—Under court rule no error in giving defendant having burden of proof opening and closing argument.

Under Rules of Practice in the Superior Court, rule 6 (81 S. E. xvii), where at trial plaintiff tendered no issue and defendant admitted the execution of a contract, but alleged mutual cancellation, the burden being on defendant, there was no error in giving him the opening and conclusion of the argument.

2. Trial \Leftarrow 260(1)—Where general charge covered issues, denial of special charge not error.

Where the law bearing on issues and evidence had been clearly and sufficiently stated in the general charge, denial of a special charge relating thereto was not error.

3. Trial \Leftarrow 256(1)—Party desiring specific instruction should request it.

Where the instructions given covered the case, if plaintiff desires more specific instructions on any issue, he should request them.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by G. A. P. Bowman against the Fidelity Trust & Development Company and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. No error.

This was an action to recover $3,675 for alleged breach of contract. The execution of the contract was admitted by the defendant, but alleging that it had been mutually canceled and released about June 1, 1912, in consideration of a cancellation and discharge of an indebtedness of about $800 which was then due by the plaintiff to the defendant. The plaintiff denied there was any mutual cancellation of the contract, and contended that he was wrongfully discharged by the defendant. The case was in this court on a former appeal. 170 N. C. 302, 87 S. E. 46. The jury in response to the issues found that the contract described in the complaint had been made, but that the parties to said contract thereafter mutually canceled and annulled the same, and that the plaintiff had sustained no damages. Appeal by plaintiff.

Wright & Stevens, of Wilmington, for appellant.

Jno. D. Bellamy & Sons and C. D. Weeks, all of Wilmington, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The plaintiff tendered no issue and made no exceptions to those submitted by the court, which besides were those properly arising upon the pleadings. The plaintiff contended, however, that the court erred in giving to the defendant the opening and conclusion of the argument, but, the defendant having admitted the first issue as to the execution of the contract described in the pleading, the burden of the second, namely, the allegation of the cancellation of the contract, rested with the defendant, and the court allowed the defendant to open and conclude. This was a matter entirely in the discretion of the judge. Rule 6 of the Rules of Practice in the Superior Court (174 N. C. 848, 81 S. E. xvii) prescribed by this court, provides:

"In any case where a question shall arise as to whether the counsel for the plaintiff or the defendant shall have the reply and the conclusion of the argument the court shall decide who is so entitled and except in the cases mentioned in rule 3 (i. e. when no evidence is introduced by the defendant) its decision shall be final and not reviewable."

Besides the court properly charged that the burden was upon the defendant to establish by the evidence that there had been a mutual cancellation of the contract and also to show that the plaintiff did or could by reasonable effort and diligence have reduced the amount of his loss. The third issue as to the measure of damages was immaterial, if no error was committed as relates to the second issue. The rulings of the court as to the admission and rejection of evidence was proper.

[2, 3] The plaintiff abandoned all exceptions for refusal of the judge to charge as prayed except one:

"If the defendant had breached the contract on or before June 14, 1912, you will answer the second issue, 'No.'"

The court properly refused this prayer, except so far as he instructed the jury in the general charge, an examination of which shows that the law bearing on the evidence and issues was clearly and sufficiently stated.

It is not incumbent upon the court to present every contention of the various parties, nor to charge as to the law in every possible phase of the evidence. If counsel for the plaintiff had desired more specific instructions on any point involved, he should have so requested. The trial was principally, if not entirely, upon the evidence, and the result depended almost entirely upon the second issue as to the cancellation of the contract, in regard to which the court charged the jury that, the defendant having admitted the execution of the contract and pleaded the mutual cancellation of it, then the burden was upon it to show by the greater weight of the evidence that the contract was actually canceled and annulled, and further charged that as to the third issue:

"As to how much the contract price has been diminished and how little the plaintiff has been damaged, the burden is upon the defendant company."

Upon full consideration of all the matters presented for our consideration, we find no error.

STACY, J., took no part in the consideration and decision of this case.

(183 N. C. 267)

WILLIS et al. v. MUTUAL LOAN & TRUST CO. (No. 299.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Deeds ¶97—Habendum was void at common law if repugnant to estate previously created.

The habendum clause in a deed was void at common law if it was repugnant to the estate vested by preceding parts of the deed.

2. Deeds ¶128—Rule in Shelley's Case not applicable to conveyance to grantee and bodily heirs.

Where the conveyance was to a named grantee and her bodily heirs, the rule in Shelley's Case is not applicable to make the conveyance an unconditional fee, since there is no limitation by way of remainder to the bodily heirs.

3. Deeds ¶93—Now construed to give effect to intention of parties.

The rigid technicalities of the common law for the construction of deeds have yielded to demand for a more rational construction, and now the purpose is to discover the intention of the parties, which must be gathered from the whole instrument in conformity with established principles, and the division of the deed into formal parts is not permitted to prevail against such intention.

4. Deeds ¶95—Every clause must be given effect if possible.

If possible, effect must be given to every part of a deed, and no clause shall be construed as meaningless if reasonable intentment can be found.

5. Deeds ¶127(2)—Conveyance to grantee and bodily heirs gives fee-simple estate.

A conveyance to a grantee and her bodily heirs in the premises and the habendum, followed in the warranty by the words "to the grantee and the heirs of her body," creates what was originally a conditional fee at the common law, but became a fee tail under the statute de donis conditionalibus, and was converted into an estate in fee simple by C. S. § 1734.

6. Deeds ¶120—Fee may be limited after a fee.

The former common-law rule that a fee could not be limited after a fee was changed after the enactment of the statute of uses, now C. S. § 1740, by the doctrine of springing and shifting uses, under the latter of which a fee may be limited after a fee by deed or will.

7. Deeds ¶134—Conveyance held to create fee simple, determinable by grantees dying without issue.

Where the premise and habendum of a deed created what would have been a fee-tail estate, which became a fee simple under C. S. § 1734, a last clause of a deed providing that if there were no heirs of grantee, the land should go back to grantor's estate, which under C. S. § 1737, is held to be a limitation to take effect when the grantee dies without issue living at the time of her death, the grantee received a fee-simple estate determinable in the event of her dying without issue, so that she could not convey a valid fee-simple title to the land, especially when she was 70 years of age and unmarried.

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Connor, Judge.

Controversy submitted without action by Joe Willis and another against the Mutual Loan & Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiffs and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. S. J. Regan, unmarried and seized in fee, executed to his grantee a deed, the material parts of which are as follows:

"This deed, made this 31st day of January, 1882, by Joseph Samuel Jenkins Regan, of Robeson county, state of North Carolina, to his daughter, Mary Regan, and her bodily heirs, of Robeson county and state of North Carolina.

"Witnesseth, that said Joseph S. J. Regan for and in consideration of the sum of $1,000.00 doth bargain, sell and convey to said Mary Regan and her bodily heirs a tract or parcel of land in Robeson county,

"To have and to hold the aforesaid tract or parcel of land and all privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, to the said Mary Regan and her bodily heirs, and to their only use and behoof forever.

"And the said J. S. J. Regan covenants that he is seized of said premises in fee and hath right to convey the same in fee simple, that the same are free from all incumbrances and that he will warrant and defend the said title to the same against the claims of all persons whatsoever, to his daughter, Mary Regan, and the heirs of her body, and if no heirs said lands shall go back to my estate."

On October 1, 1914, Mary Regan conveyed said land to Joe Willis, reserving a life estate; and on December 3, 1921, these two entered into a written agreement to convey to the defendant 50 acres of the land at the price of $3,400. Accordingly they tendered to the defendant a deed in fee duly executed, and demanded payment of the purchase price, and the defendant refused to make payment or to accept the deed on the ground that they cannot convey a title in fee simple. Mary Regan is now more than 70 years of age, and has never been married. His honor rendered judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant excepted and appealed. The only question is whether Joe Willis and Mary Regan can convey a title in fee.

Johnson & Johnson, of Lumberton, for appellant.

McNeill & Hackett, of Lumberton, for appellees.

ADAMS, J. [1] The plaintiffs contend that the deed should be considered with regard to its formal division into parts; that the last clause, because repugnant to the estate conveyed in the premises, is void, and in consequence that the grantor conveyed to Mary Regan an estate in fee. They rely in part upon the common-law principle that a fee acquired in the premises cannot be divested by the habendum. Blackstone says:

"The office of the habendum is properly to determine what estate or interest is granted by the deed, though this may be performed, and sometimes is performed, in the premises. In which case the habendum may lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify, but not totally contradict or be repugnant to, the estate granted in the premises, as if a grant be 'to A. and the heirs of his body,' in the premises habendum 'to him and his heirs forever,' or vice versa; here A. has an estate tail, and a fee simple expectant thereon. But, had it been in the premises 'to him and his heirs,' habendum 'to him for life,' the habendum would be utterly void; for an estate of inheritance is vested in him before the habendum comes, and shall not afterwards be taken away or divested by it." 2 Bl. Com. 298.

And Coke:

"The habendum hath also two parts, viz. first, to name againe the feoffee; and secondly, to limit the certaintie of the estate." 1 Coke, c. 1, § 1, 6a.

Originally used to determine the interest granted, or to lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify the premises, the habendum was held to be void if repugnant to the estate vested by preceding parts of the deed. Hafner v. Irwin, 20 N. C. 570, 34 Am. Dec. 390; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514. Whether this principle applied to a limitation in the warranty we need not now consider; for neither in the warranty nor in the habendum of this deed is there a fatal repugnancy, and the question presented must be resolved by other recognized rules of interpretation.

[2] The plaintiffs can derive no aid from Shelley's Case. There being no limitation by way of remainder to the heirs or "bodily heirs" of Mary Regan as nomen collectivum, the deed in question cannot be construed as an unconditional fee. The distinction between a determinable fee and an estate created under the rule in Shelley's Case is clearly drawn in numerous decisions. Ward v. Jones, 40 N. C. 404; Whitesides v. Cooper, 115 N. C. 570, 20 S. E. 295; May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550; Smith v. Proctor, 139 N. C. 314, 51 S. E. 889, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 172; Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. 344, 74 S. E. 15; Jones v. Whitchard, 163 N. C. 241, 79 S. E. 508; Reid v. Neal, 182 N. C. 192, 108 S. E. 769.

[3] The rigid technicalities of the common law have gradually yielded to the demand for a more rational mode of expounding deeds. Hence to discover the intention of the parties is now regarded as the chief essential in the construction of conveyances. The intention must be gathered from the whole instrument in conformity with established principles, and the division of the deed into formal parts is not permitted to prevail against such intention; for substance, not form, is the object sought.

[4] If possible, effect must be given to every part of a deed, and no clause, if reasonable intentment can be found, shall be construed as meaningless. Springs v. Hopkins, 171 N. C. 486, 88 S. E. 774; Jones v. Sandlin, 160 N. C. 155, 75 S. E. 1075; Eason v. Eason, 159 N. C. 540, 75 S. E. 797; Acker v. Pridgen, 158 N. C. 337, 74 S. E. 335; Real Estate Co. v. Bland, 152 N. C. 231, 67 S. E. 483; Featherstone v. Merrimon, 148 N. C. 199, 61 S. E. 675; Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 513, 54 S. E. 386.

[5] The phrase "to Mary Regan and her bodily heirs," twice used in the premises and once in the habendum, is followed in the warranty by the words to "Mary Regan and the heirs of her body." What was the intention of the grantor? Obviously to limit over the grantee's estate in case she should die without issue or bodily heirs. To give to the deed such construction is not inconsistent with familiar principles of law.

"A conditional fee, at the common law, was a fee restrained to some particular heirs, exclusive of others, * * * as the heirs of a man's body. * * * Now, with regard to the condition annexed to these fees by the common law, our ancestors held that such a gift (to a man and the heirs of his body) was a gift upon condition that it should revert to the donor if the donee had no heirs of his body; but, if he had, it should then remain to the donee. They therefore called it a fee simple, on condition that he had issue." 2 Bl. Com., 110. "Which condition was implied in the words as well as in the intent; for in that the gift is to one and to his heirs of his body, and no further, therein it is implied that, if he have no heirs of his body, the donor shall have the land again." Willon v. Berkley, Plowd. 235.

But upon the birth of issue the donee had power to alien the fee, and thereby to bar, not only the succession of his issue, but the reversion of the donor in case his issue subsequently failed. Willon v. Berkley, supra; 2 Bl. Com. 110. To suppress the exercise of this power the nobility procured the enactment of the statute de donis conditionalibus (13 Ed. 1), which so operated that the estate was no longer alienable by the donee upon the birth of issue, but remained to the heirs of his body, and on the failure of such heirs reverted to the donor. The estate was divided into two parts, leaving in the donee a fee tail, and investing in the donor the ultimate fee simple, expectant on the failure of issue. Estates in fee simple conditional were thus converted into estates in fee tail; "and hence it is that Littleton tells us that tenant in fee tail is by virtue of the statute of Westminster the second." 2 Bl. Com., supra. But since the act of 1784 every person seized of an estate in tail shall be deemed to be seized of the same in fee simple, C. S. § 1734; Marsh v. Griffin, 136 N. C. 333, 48 S. E. 735. Eliminating the last clause, the deed therefore conveys to Mary Regan an estate in fee. What, then, is the legal effect of the words "if no heirs said lands shall go back to my estate"?

[8] At common law, because a freehold could not pass without livery of seisin, a fee could not be limited after a fee; but after the statute of uses was enacted (27 Henry VIII, C. 10; C. S., § 1740), the judges, departing from the rigor of the common law, ingeniously devised the doctrine of springing and shifting uses, under the latter of which a fee may be limited after a fee by deed or will. If by deed, it is a conditional limitation; if by will, it is an executory devise. 2 Bl. Com. 234; Smith v. Brisson, 90 N. C. 284.

[7] The scope of the contingent limitation set forth in the last clause of the deed is defined by statute. Every contingent limitation in a deed or will made to depend upon the dying of any person without heirs, or heirs of the body, or issue, shall be held to be a limitation to take effect when such person dies not having such heir, or issue, or child living at the time of his death. C. S. § 1737; Act of 1827, 1856.

Applying these principles, we conclude that the deed should be construed as if it read, "to Mary Regan and the heirs of her body (a fee simple, C. S. § 1734) and if she should die not having such heirs or issue living at the time of her death then to the heirs of the grantor." C. S. § 1737; Patterson v. McCormick, 177 N. C. 448, 99 S. E. 401; Williams v. Blizard, 176 N. C. 146, 96 S. E. 957; Reid v. Neal, 182 N. C. 199, 108 S. E. 769. A similar construction may be found in Smith v. Brisson, 90 N. C. 284; Buchanan v. Buchanan, 99 N. C. 306, 5 S. E. 430; Dawson v. Ennett, 151 N. C. 544, 66 S. E. 566; Smith v. Lumber Co., 155 N. C. 890, 71 S. E. 445; Rees v. Williams, 165 N. C. 201, 81 S. E. 286; Jarman v. Day, 179 N. C. 318, 102 S. E. 402. There are cases apparently to the contrary, but they were decided before the act of 1827 (C. S. § 1737). Davidson v. Davidson, 8 N. C. 163; Sanders v. Hyatt, 8 N. C. 247; Hollowell v. Kornegay, 29 N. C. 261; Weatherly v. Armfield, 30 N. C. 26; Folk v. Whitley, 30 N. C. 133. McBee's Case, 63 N. C. 332, may be considered an exception, but there the act of 1827 was evidently disregarded or overlooked. Smith v. Brisson, supra.

From these principles it follows that Mary Regan acquired under the deed of her grantor a fee simple determinable upon her dying without having heirs of her body or issue living at the time of her death, and that she and her coplaintiff cannot convey to the defendant an indefeasible estate in fee. The judgment is therefore reversed.

Reversed.

(183 N. C. 213)

M. V. MOORE & CO. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(No. 541.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Carriers ⇨187—Proof that box in which goods were shipped was empty when delivered made question for jury against delivering carrier.

Proof that the box in which goods were shipped was empty when delivered to the consignee by the terminal carrier made a question for the jury and required the carrier to elect between introducing testimony in exoneration and risking an adverse verdict on plaintiffs' evidence.

2. Carriers ⇨132—Presumption that liability is common-law liability and burden on party claiming different liability.

As a general rule, the liability of a common carrier is presumed to be its common-law liability, and any party attempting to prove otherwise carries the burden of showing facts and circumstances which change or affect such liability.

3. Carriers ⇨108—Liable at common law for loss or damage not due to act of God, etc.

At common law a carrier was liable for loss or damage to property in its possession not due to the act of God, the fault of the shipper, or the inherent nature or quality of goods.

4. Carriers ⇨177(1)—A carrier is liable only for its own negligence in absence of contract or statute changing rule.

In the absence of any contract or partnership agreement or constitutional or statutory provision, a common carrier is not required to transport goods beyond its line, and its obligation extends only to carriage to the end of its route and delivery to the consignee or next succeeding carrier, and the carrier, whether initial, intermediate, or terminal, is liable only for such loss or damage as results from its own negligence.

5. Commerce ⇨8(13)—Carmack Amendment in saving rights under "existing law" means existing federal law.

Under the Carmack Amendment to the Hepburn Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), providing that nothing therein shall deprive any holder of the receipt or bill of lading therein mentioned of any remedy or right of action which he has under "existing law," the "existing law" referred to is the existing federal law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Existing Law.]

6. Carriers ⇨177(3)—Under federal law receiving carrier is liable for loss or injury on connecting lines.

Under the Carmack Amendment to the Hepburn Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), requiring interstate carriers to issue a receipt or bill of lading and making the carrier liable to the lawful holder for loss, damage, or injury, the receiving carrier is conclusively treated as having made a through contract and will be liable for loss or injury on any connecting line on the principle that each connecting carrier is made the agent of the initial carrier.

7. Carriers ⇨177(4)—Connecting lines not liable for initial carrier's negligence under federal law.

The Carmack Amendment to the Hepburn Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa) does not expressly or impliedly make intermediate and terminal carriers the agents of the receiving carrier so as to make them liable in damages for the negligence of the initial carrier.

8. Carriers ⇨184—No recovery against delivering carrier on partnership or special contract when not alleged though proved.

Where the complaint did not allege a partnership between connecting carriers or special contract for joint transportation, but merely alleged delivery to the receiving carrier for transportation by it and connecting carriers under a bill of lading, proof of a partnership or special contract was incompetent and would not support a recovery, and liability depended on the legal import of the bill of lading itself.

9. Carriers ⇨177(4)—Under bill of lading initial carrier not connecting carrier's agent so as to impose liability for its negligence.

Under a bill of lading for transportation of goods from New York to Asheville, N. C., providing that no carrier should be liable for loss, damage, or injury not occurring on its own road, except as liability might be imposed by law, the initial carrier was not the agent of the connecting lines so as to make the terminal carrier liable for the initial carrier's negligence.

10. Carriers ⇨180(1)—Bill of lading excluding liability for loss or injury on connecting lines does not limit common-law liability.

A provision in an interstate bill of lading that no carrier should be liable for loss, damage, or injury not occurring on its own road, etc., except as liability might be imposed by law, was not a limitation of the carrier's common-law liability, as there was no common-law liability on a carrier for loss or damage not occurring on its own line and not caused by its own negligence.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Harding, Judge.

Action by M. V. Moore & Co. against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Civil action to recover damages for the loss of merchandise tried before Harding, Judge, and a jury, at the June term, 1921, of Buncombe. Judgment for defendant. Appeal by plaintiffs.

On October 5, 1917, the plaintiffs ordered from Friedman & Co., of New York, a box of clothing which was turned over to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for transportation and delivery to the purchasers in Asheville. The Pennsylvania Railroad then issued a straight nonnegotiable bill of lading containing this provision:

"No carrier shall be liable for loss, damage, or injury not occurring on its own road or its portion of the through route, nor after said property has been delivered to the next carrier, except as such liability is or may be imposed by law, but nothing contained in this bill of lading shall be deemed to exempt the initial carrier from any such liability so imposed." Section 2.

The defendant was the terminal carrier. The agent of the defendant in Asheville collected the freight charges and delivered the box to the plaintiffs; and the box when opened was found to contain paper and packing, but no part of the original shipment. The plaintiffs filed with the defendant a claim for the invoice price of the goods, together with the charges for freight, and brought suit against the defendant after it had refused to make payment. The Pennsylvania Railroad is not a party to the action.

The issues were answered as follows:

1. Did the initial carrier, Pennsylvania Railroad Company, receive from J. Friedman & Co., to be transported to the plaintiff at Asheville, N. C., the box containing the clothing mentioned and described in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

2. If so, was said clothing lost by reason of the negligence of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

3. If said clothing was delivered to said Pennsylvania Railroad Company, was the same lost by the negligence of the Southern Railway Company? Answer: No.

4. What damages, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover of the defendant? Answer: $292.14, with interest from October 5, 1917.

The plaintiffs made a motion for judgment upon the verdict on the ground that the bill of lading constituted a contract or partnership by which the receiving carrier and the connecting lines became jointly and severally liable for the loss. The court's denial of the motion is assigned for error.

Lee & Ford, of Asheville, for appellants.
Martin, Rollins & Wright, of Asheville, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. [1] The case was appropriately submitted to the jury on the question of the defendant's negligence. Proof that the box was empty when delivered to the plaintiffs required of the defendant an election between introducing testimony in exoneration and risking an adverse verdict on the evidence of the plaintiffs. Meredith v. R. R., 137 N. C. 478, 50 S. E. 1; White v. Hines, 182 N. C. 275, 109 S. E. 31. But the verdict shows that the loss was due, not to the negligence of the defendant, but to the negligence of the initial carrier. The answer to the third issue exonerated the defendant from the charge of negligence. The question for decision, then, is this: Upon the pleadings and the proof in this cause, can the terminal carrier who collected the freight charges when the shipment was delivered be held liable in damages to the consignee for the negligence of the receiving carrier, upon bare proof of carriage on a uniform nonnegotiable bill of lading which contains the provisions hereinbefore stated? There is no contention that the defendant incurred liability by reason of the joint or concurrent negligence of separate lines independently operated.

[2-4] As a general rule, the liability of a common carrier is presumed to be its common-law liability, and any party attempting to prove otherwise carries the burden of showing facts and circumstances which change or affect such liability. N. J. Steam Nav. Co. v. Bank, 6 How. 344, 12 L. Ed. 485; R. R. v. Stock Co., 136 Ill. 643, 27 N. E. 59, 29 Am. St. Rep. 348; R. R. v. Barrett, 36 Ohio St. 448; Jackson v. R. R., 23 Cal. 268; Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. 362, 62 Am. Dec. 285; 10 C. J. 110. At common law a carrier was liable for loss or damage to property in its possession, not due to the act of God, the fault of the shipper, or the inherent nature or quality of the goods; but such carrier was bound to carry the shipment only over its own line and to deliver it without damage to the next succeeding carrier. The English doctrine announced in 1841 in Muschamp v. R. R., 8 Mees. & W. 421, has been repudiated by the Supreme Court of the United States and by the greater number of the American courts, and the generally accepted doctrine has been stated as follows: In the absence of any contract, or partnership agreement, or constitutional or statutory provision, a common carrier is not required to transport goods to a point beyond its line, for its obligation extends only to carriage to the end of its route and delivery to the consignee or to the next succeeding carrier; and in these circumstances the carrier, whether initial, intermediate, or terminal, is liable only for such loss or damage as results from its own negligence. In R. R. v. Myrick (decided in 1883) 107 U. S. 102, 1 Sup. Ct. 425, 27 L. Ed. 325, Mr. Justice Field said:

"The general doctrine, then, as to transportation by connecting lines, approved by this court, and also by a majority of the state courts, amounts to this: That each road, confining itself to its common law liability, is only bound, in the absence of a special contract, to safely carry over its own route and safely to deliver to the next connecting carrier, but that any one of the companies may agree that over the whole route its liability shall extend. In the absence of a special agreement to that effect, such liability will not attach, and the agreement will not be inferred from doubtful expressions or loose language, but only from clear and satisfactory evidence." R. R. v. Ex. Co., 117 U. S. 1, 6 Sup. Ct. 542, 628, 29 L. Ed. 791; R. R. v. R. R., 110 U. S. 667, 4 Sup. Ct. 185, 28 L. Ed. 291; R. R. v. Pratt, 22 Wall. 123, 22 L. Ed. 827; R. R. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S. 186, 31 Sup. Ct. 164, 55 L. Ed. 167, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 7; McConnell v. R. R., 163 N. C. 504, 79 S. E. 974; Phillips v. R. R., 78 N. C. 294; Lindley v. R. R., 88 N. C. 550; Rocky Mount Mills v. R. R., 119 N. C. 694, 25 S. E. 854, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682.

The plaintiffs insist, however, that this principle is not applicable here for the reason that it has been modified both by the Carmack Amendment to the Hepburn Law (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa), and by the contract of the connecting carriers. It becomes material therefore to inquire, first, into the practical operation of the Carmack Amendment in its relation to intermediate and terminal carriers. This act provides:

"That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company * * * receiving property for transportation from a point in one state * * * to a point in another state * * * shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass, * * * and no contract, receipt, rule [or] regulation * * * shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed. Provided, * * * that nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under the existing law. * * *

"That the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company issuing such receipt or bill of lading shall be entitled to recover from the common carrier, railroad, or transportation company on whose line the loss, damage, or injury shall have been sustained the amount of such loss, damage, or injury as it may be required to pay to the owners of such property, as may be evidenced by any receipt, judgment, or transcript thereof." 219 U. S. 195, 31 Sup. Ct. 166, 55 L. Ed. 178, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20; Act Cong. June 29, 1906, 34 Stat. 595 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa).

[5] The "existing law" referred to is, of course, the federal law. Express Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 33 Sup. Ct. 148, 57 L. Ed. 814, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 257.

[6] Under this act, when the receiving carrier accepts an interstate shipment it is conclusively treated as having made a through contract and will be liable for loss or injury occurring on any connecting line over which the shipment may pass as well as for loss or injury occurring on its own line. Express Co. v. Croninger, supra; R. R. v. Carl, 227 U. S. 639, 33 Sup. Ct. 391, 57 L. Ed. 683. This on the principle that each connecting carrier is made the agent of the initial carrier. In R. R. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S. 204, 31 Sup. Ct. 169, 55 L. Ed. 167, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 7, Mr. Justice Lurton said:

"Reduced to its final results, the Congress has said that a receiving carrier, in spite of any stipulation to the contrary, shall be deemed, when it receives property in one state to be transported to a point in another involving the use of a connecting carrier for some part of the way, to have adopted such other carrier as its agent, and to incur carrier liability throughout the entire route, with the right to reimbursement for a loss not due to his own negligence." R. R. v. Wallace, 223 U. S. 481, 32 Sup. Ct. 205, 56 L. Ed. 516; Commis. Co. v. R. R., 262 Ill. 400, 104 N. E. 666, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 89; R. R. v. Ward (Tex. Civ. App.) 169 S. W. 1035.

[7] By virtue of this act the intermediate and terminal carriers are made the agents of the receiving carrier; but the act does not purport in terms express or implied to make any connecting line liable in damages for the negligence of the initial carrier.

The next question raised by the plaintiffs is whether in the present case, without regard to the Carmack Amendment, there was a special contract between the several carriers by which the defendant became liable for the negligence of the carrier first receiving the shipment.

In approaching the question we do not controvert the established principle that a special contract or partnership relation among connecting lines may make the intermediate or terminal carrier liable for loss or injury, whether occurring on its own line or on the line of another connecting carrier. Barter v. Wheeler, 49 N. H. 9, 6 Am. Rep. 434; Phillips v. R. R., supra; Lindley v. R. R., supra; R. R. v. Myrick, supra.

[8-10] But in the complaint there is no allegation upon which to base the application of this principle. The plaintiff does not allege either a partnership or a special contract for joint transportation. The substance of the only relevant and material allegations in the complaint is this: The goods were packed by the shippers and delivered to the receiving carrier to be transported by it and its connecting carriers to the plaintiffs in Asheville, and the bill of lading was thereupon issued. Considered in the light of section 2 in the bill of lading, the absence of an allegation of a partnership or special contract for joint transportation is all the more marked. Without allegation, proof of such partnership or special contract is incompetent and unavailing; for in our procedure is firmly embedded the principle that proof without allegation is no less fatal than allegation without proof. McKee v. Lineberger, 69 N. C. 217; McLaurin v. Cronly, 90 N. C. 50. In these circumstances the ultimate inquiry is confined to the legal import of the bill of lading. Taken in connection with the allegations referred to, does the receipt or bill, itself, constitute a partnership among the connecting carriers? If, as we have seen, the Carmack Amendment does not create such partnership, we must search for an answer in the relation that would have existed between the connecting lines, by virtue of the bill of lading, if this amendment had not been enacted. Under such conditions—if the Carmack Amendment were not in force—the receiving carrier, when the shipment was tendered, would have had the right to contract either to carry the goods to their destination or to carry them safely over its own line only and then to deliver them to the next carrier. In case of the latter election, the next connecting carrier would have been the agent of the shipper; and, in case of the former, the intermediate or terminal carrier would have been the agent of the receiving carrier. In neither event would the initial carrier have been the agent of either of the connecting lines. R. R. v. Riverside Mills, supra; 10 C. J. 518. This conclusion is fortified by the provisions of section 2 in the bill of lading. This section is not a limitation by contract of the defendant's common-law liability; for no common-law obligation devolves upon any carrier to transport goods over lines other than its own, and hence there is no common-law liability for loss or damage not occurring on its own line and not caused by its own negligence. The plaintiffs, not having alleged a partnership or special contract, did not tender an issue relating to either question. The case turned upon the issues as to negligence, and the verdict was adverse to the plaintiffs. At the trial there was neither an allegation nor an issue of a partnership or special contract, and we hold that there was no error in the judgment of the court. The plaintiffs cited Paper Box Co. v. R. R., 177 N. C. 351, 99 S. E. 23, in support of their contention; but that case and this are entirely distinct. Indeed, the question arising in the instant case has not heretofore been presented to this court for decision.

No error.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). On October 5, 1917, the plaintiffs purchased a bill of goods, $290, from Friedman & Co., in New York City, who delivered the same to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, who agreed to transport them over its own and connecting lines to Asheville, N. C., and gave the plaintiffs a bill of lading to that effect. On November 3, 1917, the defendant, Southern Railway Company, delivered the box supposed to contain the shipment of goods to the plaintiffs and accepted payment in full of the freight from New York City. On opening the box it was found to contain nothing but waste paper and trash. The plaintiffs filed with the defendant, the Southern Railway Company, their claim for the value of the goods lost and freight paid. This being refused, this action was brought.

The liability of the defendant should be settled upon the right and reason of the thing as heretofore decided, in several cases in this court. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company agreed for itself and its connecting lines to deliver the shipment in Asheville, and the defendant company ratified that contract by accepting the shipment and delivering the box to the plaintiffs and accepting payment for itself and associates of the entire freight from New York to Asheville.

It is true that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company put in the bill of lading a denial of any responsibility for default except as to carriage along its own line, but under the Carmack Amendment the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is expressly made responsible and liable for the whole transit. The initial carrier could not restrict its liability against the responsibility placed upon it by virtue of the Carmack Amendment, and, as on behalf of itself and connecting lines it assumed a joint contract to take the shipment at New York and deliver it at Asheville, it could not restrict that liability of a common carrier against the liability of any one of the lines.

In the execution of the contract to take this box of goods in New York and deliver it in Asheville, no valid restriction could exempt the defendant from liability for the goods whose shipment it accepted at the beginning of its line and the payment of the entire freight on which it accepted at its terminal point.

A partnership cannot stipulate that it will not be liable for the misconduct or negligence of any one of its partners in the transaction of the partnership business, and still more is it against public policy that one railroad company shall undertake to receive a package in New York and transport it over its own and connecting lines to Asheville, the defendant company ratifying this contract by accepting the box for shipment, transporting it along its route, and then, at its end as agent for all the lines from New York to Asheville collect freight, and then deny all liability.

This proposition was discussed and fully settled in Mills v. R. R., 119 N. C. 693, 25 S. E. 854, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682, and the cases in our reports which have followed that authority. Indeed, it has been held that in spite of any agreement to the contrary, or even where there is no bill of lading, there is a presumption that a terminal carrier who delivers the freight short or in bad order is liable. R. R. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S. 186, 31 Sup. Ct. 164, 55 L. Ed. 167, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 7, and notes.

The defendant relies upon the headnote in Ins. Co. v. R. R., 104 U. S. 146, 26 L. Ed. 879, decided in 1881, long before the Carmack Amendment rendered statutory the liability of the initial carrier, "that in the absence of a special contract, express or implied, for the safe transportation of goods to their known destination, the carrier is only bound to carry safely and deliver to the next carrier in the route"; but the decision in that case states that the facts found were that there was no through bill of lading and the bill of lading also specified that the receiving company should not be liable for any damage or deficiency beyond its terminus. Since then the Carmack Amendment has recognized that such contract as this is in fact a partnership agreement, and hence that the receiving carrier is responsible. This statute does not negative in any respect the decision in Mills v. R. R., 119 N. C. 693, 25 S. E. 854, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682, and numerous citations thereto in 2 Anno, Ed., and the Carmack Amendment is wholly illogical unless it is based upon the same principle that this court has always recognized as the basis of the decision in Mills v. R. R., supra.

Upon the evidence the reasonable inference arose as a matter of law that the initial carrier was the duly authorized agent of the other carriers through to the point of destination, not only because of the Carmack Amendment, but upon the foundation on which that statute rested, that it was a joint contract upon the bill of lading making each the joint lines extending from New York to Asheville, a member of the partnership existing pro hac vice for the transportation of the shipment, and liable, more especially the initial carrier and the terminal carrier.

The liability of the carrier for nondelivery or damage to freight does not require proof of negligence to be made (as was required in this case) by the consignee, for the carrier is an insurer except against the acts of God or the public enemy. The court below erred in putting this burden on the plaintiff.

It would be a very great hardship in the transportation of freight for long distances, over several lines of road, if when the consignee brings suit against the last carrier in the joint contract and fails to locate the loss on that line, that then it must sue the next carrier and the next, and so on up through to the initial carrier, who was certainly made liable not only itself but as agent for all the others. It is easy for the joint lines, making for this occasion the continuous transportation of this shipment from New York to Asheville, to ascertain by wire or correspondence promptly, accurately, and inexpensively where the default lies. It is almost impracticable for the consignee to ascertain this fact without suing in succession each member of the line and travelling from carrier to carrier and from state to state and employing successive lawyers to prosecute the action.

This will amount practically to a denial to the shipping public of all remedy unless the consignee should go to the expense at once of suing the initial carrier at the most distant point on the line. To require a consignee of a small shipment like this to sue in succession a half dozen carriers in order to trace and locate the loss of this $290, or any other shipment, is a denial of justice which should not be imposed on the shipping public.

The true doctrine as laid down in Mills v. R. R., 119 N. C. 693, 25 S. E. 854, 56 Am. St. Rep. 682, Gallop v. R. R., 173 N. C. 21, 91 S. E. 375, Paper Box Co. v. R. R., 177 N. C. 351, 99 S. E. 23, and other similar cases, is thus summed up in Paper Box Co. v. R. R., 177 N. C. 351, 99 S. E. 23:

"The various companies which compose, pro hac vice, the 'through line' over which any shipment passes, make a joint contract for their own convenience, or it may be a quasi partnership for the occasion, by which the bill of lading is given at the point of origin by the receiving company on behalf of itself and as agent for all the others down to the place of destination and on this joint contract any company on such line of through traffic can be sued."

Public policy and elemental principles of justice require that the consignee for whom this transportation was received and to whom the bill of lading is given by the initial carrier on behalf of all the carriers constituting the line of transportation for the goods should be held liable, leaving them to apportion among themselves or ascertain on which line the loss occurred. No mere technicality nor reference to decisions made at a time when the law in regard to liability for shipments over more than one line was in an unsettled state should govern. The only reasonable and logical ruling, especially since the Carmack Amendment has fastened liability upon the initial carrier because it is held as acting and assuming responsibility for all the carriers, is that all the carriers on the line over which it is stipulated that a given shipment shall pass are equally liable, more especially the terminal carrier who delivered the rifled package, or failed to deliver it at all, while receiving the freight. The law must conform to the modern customs and methods of transportation and to the reason of things, for, as Coke says, "Reason is the life of the law."

This line of carriers having agreed through its initial carrier, who is certainly responsible for them all under the Carmack Amendment, that these goods should be safely transported from New York to Asheville, should be jointly and severally held liable for the failure to deliver or for the delivery in a damaged condition of the goods which the Initial carrier agreed should be delivered in Asheville. Any other ruling will fall short of the reason applicable to such shipments as laid down in the cases above cited.

OLIVE v. KEARSLEY. (No. 92.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Brokers ⇨44—Agency may be revoked before sale perfected.

Though a broker in whose hands land is placed for sale has begun negotiations, the principal has a right to revoke the agency at any time before the sale is perfected.

2. Brokers ⇨88(1)—Question whether agency revoked and sale made through another agent should be submitted to jury when there is evidence thereof.

Where there was ample evidence, if believed, that defendant revoked a broker's agency before a sale was made, and that it was actually made by another agent whom he paid for the service, he was entitled to have this question of fact submitted to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Cranmer, Judge.

Action by W. J. Olive against G. T. Kearsley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial granted.

This is an action by a broker on an alleged indebtedness of $250 for making sale of land. The defendant listed the land for sale with the plaintiff and a number of other brokers, and the same was sold to one Price. The defendant was introduced to Price by one Carter (to whom the defendant paid $25 for making the sale). The plaintiff was allowed to testify over the defendant's objection that the attendance of Price was procured by the "influence of plaintiff" acting through one McGhee, who was dead at the time of the trial. The defendant testified that he sold the land himself to Price, that plaintiff was not there, and said nothing to him about selling the land until after it was sold. The contest was over the right of the defendant to revoke the agency of brokerage. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Appeal by defendant.

Hoyle & Hoyle, of Greensboro, for appellant.

A. A. F. Seawell, of Sanford, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The court instructed the jury:

"Now it is the law in North Carolina that, when land is placed in the hands of a broker for sale and that broker had begun negotiations, the owner cannot take the matter into his own hands and complete the sale and refuse to pay commission. Now if you find from the evidence in this case—it is not refuted that the land was placed in the hands of Olive for sale—if you find from the greater weight of the evidence in this case that he had begun negotiations and brought the buyer down, then I instruct you that the defendant could not take the matter out of his hands and avoid paying his commission."

[1] The instruction that if the broker "had begun negotiations that the owner cannot take the matter into his own hands and complete the sale and refuse to pay commission" was error. There was evidence from the defendant which denies that Olive effected the sale. He testified:

"I placed my land with Olive for sale. I listed this land with 15 or 20 concerns that sell. I told a number of others that I would pay them to send me a purchaser, among them was Abe Carter who had come from Rockingham county, and who was the first man who brought Price [the purchaser] to me. Olive said nothing to me about selling the land until after it was sold and the trade closed. Then he claimed a commission."

Abe Carter testified that the purchaser Price lived on an adjoining farm to his in Rockingham county; that he told him about the Kearsley place and he agreed to go with him to look it over and he bought the place from Kearsley.

The law applicable in this case is thus stated in Abbott v. Hunt, 129 N. C. in which on page 404 it is said (40 S. E. on page 119):

"An agency can be revoked at any time before a valid and binding contract, within the scope of the agency, has been made with a third party. The only exception is an agency coupled with an interest, and that must be an interest in the subject of the agency, and not merely something collateral, as commissions or compensation for making sale. Hartley's Appeal, 53 Pa. St. 212, 91 Am. Dec. 207, which holds that a power of attorney by which the attorney is to receive as compensation 'one-half of the net proceeds' is not a power coupled with an interest, and is revocable. This case cites a very clear enunciation of the same principle by Marshall, C. J., in Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, which is also cited by this court (as to agencies to solicit insurance) in Insurance Co. v. Williams, 91 N. C. 69. In Brookshire v. Vancannon, 28 N. C. 231, it is held that a power of attorney is revocable 'at any moment before the actual execution of it.' To same purport Wilcox v. Ewing, 141 U. S. 627; Mansfield v. Mansfield, 6 Conn. 559, 16 Am. Dec. 76; Mechem on Agency, §§ 204-210; Hall v. Gambrell, 88 Fed. 709. In Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 378, 22 Am. Rep. 441, it is said: 'Where no time is fixed for the continuance of a contract between broker and principal, either party can terminate it at will, subject only to the ordinary requirements of good faith.' A case on 'all fours' is Coffin v. Landis, 46 Pa. St. 426, which holds (page 431):

"Where one as agent for another contracts to sell the land of the latter in consideration of one-half of the net proceeds of the sale, and there is no stipulation in the contract as to the duration of the employment, the principal has a right to terminate it at any time, and to discharge the agent from his service without notice, and the plaintiff (agent) cannot recover for any services rendered, or for his loss of employment after his discharge." And almost as directly in point are the recent cases Young v. Trainor, 158 Ill. 428 (1895) which holds that "a real estate broker who produces a customer after his principal has withdrawn his offer to sell, is not entitled to a commission," and Bailey v. Smith, 103 Ala. 641 (1894) which is to the same effect, and Malonee v. Young, 119 N. C. 549. * * *

"In Atkinson v. Pack, 114 N. C. 597, and Martin v. Holley, 104 N. C. 38, the broker had procured a purchaser at the stipulated price before the revocation of the power, and, of course, being an executed contract, the agent was entitled to his commission, and the same might be true where the revocation was in bad faith, just as the contract was about being consummated, the revocation being for the purpose of depriving the agent of his commissions. But such is not the case here."

This has been often quoted and always followed by this court. In Thomas v. Gwyn, 131 N. C. 461, 42 S. E. 904, Abbott v. Hunt was reaffirmed, the court saying that, "Where no term is fixed for the continuance of a contract, either party may terminate it at will," and this was reaffirmed in Wilmington v. Bryan, 141 N. C. 871, 873, 54 S. E. 543, which held that a contract of this kind, containing no limits as to time, is in law a contract terminable at the will of either party.

In Trust Co. v. Adams, 145 N. C. 161, 58 S. E. 1008, Walker, J., states that—

"When there is no definite time fixed for the employment to sell land upon a commission, either party has a right to terminate the agreement at will, subject to the requirement of good faith under the agreement and a sale made in pursuance of its terms."

When such broker fails to complete the purchase upon the specified terms before the principal elects to terminate the agreement, the principal has the right to terminate the contract if done in good faith.

In Wright v. Shepard, 178 N. C. 656, 100 S. E. 587, where the defendant, as in this case, claimed that he had revoked the agency and sold the land himself, it was held that this was a question of fact which was properly submitted to the jury by the judge, and the verdict against the plaintiff was sustained. Mr. Justice Stacy was the trial judge in that case, and the able and instructive brief filed therein for the defendant cites and relies upon Abbott v. Hunt, supra, and Sibbald v. Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 378, 38 Am. Rep. 441, supra, and Trust Co. v. Adams, supra, and thus sums up the doctrine which was stated in those cases by the trial judge and affirmed by this court:

"The broker may devote his time and labor and expend his money with ever so much devotion to the interests of his employee and yet if he fails without effecting an agreement or accomplishing a bargain, or abandons the effort, or his authority is fairly and in good faith terminated, he gains no right to commission. He loses the labor and effort which was staked upon success, and in such event it matters not that after his failure and the termination of his agency what he had done proves of use and benefit to the principal."

In Real Estate Co. v. Sasser, 179 N. C. 497, 103 S. E. 73, it was held, Brown, J., that the interest of an agent in a contract which would prevent the revocation of the agency must be in the subject-matter of the power, and not merely relate to the agent's compensation for its execution and where the principal contracts for the sale of his land by the agent, the latter to receive whatever he could get for the land over a certain price, and there is no covenant not to revoke, the former may at any time invoke the power before the completion of the deal leaving the broker to an action for damages for the expenses incurred by him and reasonable compensation for the worth of his services rendered before the revocation.

In Hagood v. Holland, 181 N. C. 64, 106 S. E. 154, it was held by Stacy, J., that—

"A contract of agency for the sale of land for an indefinite and unstated time may be revoked at will by the owner, in the absence of agreement or covenant to the contrary" (citing Abbott v. Hunt, and Real Estate Co. v. Sasser, supra).

In House v. Abell, 182 N. C. 628, 109 S. E. 877, the court held that where the broker "within the terms of authority given, succeeds in bringing about a contract of sale with a responsible purchaser, he is entitled to stipulated commission, or to the reasonable worth of his services if no definite amount is specified, and his claim therefor is not affected because the principal has seen proper to voluntarily surrender his rights under the contract;" and, further "a broker who has agreed for compensation 'to procure a purchaser' for lands, has earned his commission when he effects a valid written contract for sale of the lands upon terms and with the purchaser acceptable to the owner and the voluntary failure of the vendor to compel him to do so will not defeat the broker's claim for commission." It will be seen at once that there is no conflict in these rulings to the case at bar. In the later case the contract was performed and the sale perfected, but the vendor refused to make the conveyance. But in cases like the present, where the sale was not completed, the principal has the right to revoke the agency at any time before the sale was perfected, or, if there is a controversy whether the sale was completed by the party who first "began negotiations," then it was error not to submit that question of fact to the jury.

[2] In the present case there was ample evidence, if believed, not only that the defendant had revoked the agency before the sale was made, but that it was actually made by another agent whom the defendant paid for the service, and he was entitled to have this phase of the evidence presented to the jury.

For this error there must be a new trial.

STATE v. MONTGOMERY. (No. 275.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 29, 1922.)

1. Rape §52(1) — Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for rape on 12 year old girl, evidence held to sustain conviction.

2. Criminal law §1178—Exceptions not insisted upon in brief abandoned.

Exceptions not insisted upon in brief will be considered as having been abandoned.

3. Rape §38(1)—Testimony of 8 year old girl who witnessed offense that she was too frightened to give alarm held admissible.

In prosecution for rape, testimony of 8 year old sister of prosecutrix, who witnessed the offense, that she was too frightened to give an alarm held admissible in explanation of her failure to give alarm.

4. Rape §48(1)—Testimony of mother of prosecutrix that prosecutrix complained of physical and nervous suffering shortly after commission of offense held admissible.

In prosecution for rape on 12 year old girl, testimony of the girl's mother that the girl complained of physical and nervous suffering soon after the commission of the offense held admissible.

4. Criminal law §1038(1)—Defendant cannot complain of court's statement of his contentions in absence of objection thereto at time statement was made.

Defendant cannot on appeal complain of the court's statement of his contention in absence of objection to the statement made at time contention was stated.

5. Criminal law §822(14)—Instruction as to corroboration of witness by testimony as to statements made on prior occasions held not misleading.

Instruction authorizing jury to consider statements made by witness on prior occasions in corroboration of the testimony of witness, in so far as such previous statements tend to "persuade" the jury to believe as true the testimony of the witness, held not misleading in view of the charge as a whole.

7. Criminal law §822(10)—Instruction as to weight to be accorded testimony of character witnesses held not misleading.

In prosecution for rape, instruction as to weight to be accorded testimony of character witnesses stating that, "if the jury find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, then the question of his character cuts no figure," held not misleading in view of instructions as a whole.

8. Criminal law §923(2)—Denial of new trial on ground that juror expressed his opinion as to defendant's guilt before trial held properly refused.

Motion for new trial on the ground that a juror had expressed an opinion as to the defendant's guilt before the trial held properly refused where the juror did not intend to express his opinion as to whether the defendant was guilty, but merely stated his opinion as to the propriety of capital punishment for any person who was guilty of the crime.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Bond, Judge.

Clyde P. Montgomery was convicted of rape and he appeals. No error.

The evidence for the state consisted of the testimony of the prosecutrix, who was 12 years old at the time of the crime, as to the assault claimed to have been made by the defendant, the testimony of her 8 year old sister who witnessed the assault, and the testimony of her mother and father, and of a physician, that she had been violated. The defendant denied that he committed the offense, and introduced a number of character witnesses who testified as to his good character. Another witness for the defendant testified that she could have seen and heard a struggle at the place where defendant was alleged to have committed the crime, but neither saw nor heard anything indicating an assault, and that she saw prosecutrix shortly after the alleged crime, and that prosecutrix at such time appeared to be all right.—Statement by editor.

J. C. King, W. F. Jones, and Herbert McClammy, all of Wilmington, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WALKER, J. [1] The state's evidence, if believed, was amply sufficient to establish all the essential elements of the crime.

[2] The defendant's counsel in their brief do not insist upon their exceptions 1 and 2, and so they have abandoned them, under our rule. But there is no merit in them.

[3] Exception 3 was to testimony by Maude Smith, 8 year old sister of the prosecuting witness, Ruby Smith, that "she was too scared when she witnessed the act of defendant upon her sister to call out and alarm the neighborhood." The witness was clearly entitled to give this explanation of her failure to give the alarm, its weight to be determined by the jury.

[4] Exception 4 was to admission of testimony by the mother of Ruby Smith that Ruby soon after the occurrence complained of physical and nervous suffering. Ruby Smith, however, had previously been on the stand, and had herself testified to this suffering, and the judge told the jury that they were to consider the evidence from the mother only in so far as it tended to corroborate the statement of the girl made here, and for no other purpose. This ruling was more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to have it. Involuntary expressions as to existing suffering are admissible in themselves when physical condition is a material question in the investigation. This was made material here by the nature of the offense.

Exceptions 5, 6, 7, and 8 were all to similar evidence, which was plainly admissible. The same observation may be made to exception 9.

[5] Exception 13 was to a part of the judge's charge in which he was stating one of the contentions of this defendant. Whether or not he stated this contention correctly does not appear from the record. If it was stated incorrectly, the defendant's counsel should have called the court's attention at the time to its incorrectness, if they deemed it incorrect. To take such an exception after the charge is delivered, and in the case on appeal, is contrary to the rule, and numerous decisions of the court.

[6] Exception 14 was to the following part of the charge, especially that in brackets:

"In earlier part of the trial, gentlemen, I called your attention to this fact, that in order to corroborate a witness the law allows another witness to testify that on prior occasions he had made the same statement that he made here as a witness on the stand, and it allows the jury to consider it, not as substantive evidence, but as corroborative evidence; that is, for this purpose: [How far does it persuade the jury to believe as true the statement made by the witness on the stand, by reason of the fact that the witness has made the same statement about the same occurrence on other occasions, if the jury find that the witness did make the same statement on prior occasions?] They have a right to consider it in that view, simply as assisting them in seeing how far are they persuaded to accept as true the statements made by the witness on the stand. Now, then, as I have said to you, it is not substantive evidence tending to prove the defendant's guilt; it is to be considered only for the purpose of corroboration, as I have outlined to you."

The criticism of the defendant's counsel is directed to the use of the word "persuade." That criticism, however, if just, would, applied as it was to corroborative statements of the prosecuting witness, Ruby Smith, tend to weaken the force of those statements; that is, the jury must be induced to believe those statements before they can give them any weight. However this may be, the jury could not, in any sense, have been misled by the use of this term, taking the whole charge together. The average juror is not a philologist. He would not stop to consider the exact meaning of a word when its immediate context interpreted it. Besides the word "persuade" is also defined as "to cause to believe."

[7] Exception 15 was taken to that portion of the judge's charge included in brackets below, as follows:

"Now the defendant contends, as I said to you just now, that he has brought a large number of witnesses here upon the question of his character. The defendant has a right to prove that his character is good if he can when he is being tried for crime, and our courts have all along said that the possession of good character by a man on trial is substantive evidence to be considered by the jury as tending, along with the other evidence, to show his innocence. [The same law says, however, that, notwithstanding the evidence as to the defendant's character, if the jury find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, then the question of his character 'cuts no figure'; that is, if upon consideration of all the evidence in the case the jury say that the guilt of the defendant is proven beyond a reasonable doubt, then the question of his character no longer cuts any figure.] Because it is just as much a crime for a man of good character to violate the law as it is for a man of bad character to violate the law."

It appears that this criticism is also directed to the particular language of the judge. The use of the words "cuts no figure" may have been, as argued, unfortunate, but used as they were, and in the connection in which they were, the jury could not have misunderstood them. Almost immediately the judge returned to this subject and said:

"The prisoner contends that he has come here and admitted the occurrence all along about the selling of the greens, and things of that sort, until he got to this house, and he says he has a consistently good character, which ought to persuade you that his statement should be accepted as true; that he has brought a large number of witnesses whom you have heard upon the stand testify as to his character, and that, putting all these things together, you ought to say that you did have a reasonable doubt as to whether he did anything wrong while in the house or not."

He thus draws the attention of the jury to the very point where evidence of good character would most help or benefit the defendant. Qualified as the words criticized were by their immediate context, "If the jury find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty," then he would be guilty regardless of the evidence as to his character, because it is just as much a crime for a man of good character to violate the law as it is for a man of bad character to violate it; they could bear no meaning to the jury prejudicial to the defendant. His honor was stating in his characteristic way a universal truth, known as well to the jury as to him-self.

Exception 16 was addressed to the judge's statement of a contention of the defendant, and the remarks heretofore made under exception 13 are applicable here.

Exception 17 was to the statement of a contention of the state, a perfectly legitimate contention under the circumstances, and, so far as the record shows, not an inaccurate statement.

[8] Exception 18 was taken to the refusal of the judge to set aside the verdict because of the expression of an opinion by one of the jurors, Ira Scott, before the trial, that the defendant was guilty, and should be electrocuted. The judge, however, considered the affidavits sustaining and contradicting this allegation, and found the following facts:

"That at various times in the place of business of Ira Scott, who served on the jury, there were allusions made by various and sundry people to the Montgomery Case, and there were at times debates or colloquies between various people in said place of business upon the rightfulness or wrongfulness of capital punishment. That at different times the juror Ira Scott made some statements in the conversations, but that all that he said was not to express any opinion as to whether or not the defendant Montgomery was or was not guilty, but to give it as his opinion that, if it was shown that he was guilty of the crime of rape, that he ought to be sent to the electric chair, and that he did no more in these conversations than to argue in favor of the rightfulness of his own belief in the rightfulness of capital punishment. The court further finds that the juror, when he was examined by both sides, stated that he had not formed or expressed any opinion as to the guilt of the defendant, and the court further finds such statement to be a fact. The court finds that he stated that he knew of nothing which would prevent his sitting on the jury and giving the prisoner and the state a fair and impartial trial of the cause, and that he went into the jury box unswayed by any impressions and formed no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant until after he had heard the evidence in the case and the judge's charge and the jury had retired to consider the case.

"In the trial of this case, when the jury was being selected, the court announced that it would regard it a proper ground of challenge as to any particular juror if he stated that he had formed and expressed an opinion either way; that is, that if any juror said that he had formed and expressed the opinion that the prisoner was guilty the defendant's counsel would be allowed to challenge him, but on the other hand if any juror said that he had formed and expressed the opinion that the prisoner was not guilty, the state would be allowed to stand him aside. The court announced that it would pursue that rule unless it led to embarrassment which would cause it to notify both sides that the rule would be rescinded and that thereafter the court would follow the decisions of the Supreme Court based upon the statement of the juror that notwithstanding the opinion formed he could make a fair and impartial juror.

"The court further finds that, at the time the juror Scott was examined by the defendant's counsel, they had not exhausted their peremptory challenges," and "that before the juror took his seat in the box that both the State and the defendant were told by the juror, when being questioned, to what extent he had participated in the discussions as set out in the affidavit of said juror, and it further finds that the other statements in the affidavit of said Scott, in addition to those already found, are true. Upon the situation, as it was, the defendant did not challenge or offer to challenge the said juror. When examined by defendant's counsel, said juror Scott stated he had not formed or expressed opinion that the prisoner was guilty." That he had not made any such statement; that he had done no more in the conversations alleged to be the foundation for the motion than to argue in favor of capital punishment.

He further finds:

"The juror, when he was examined by counsel, stated that he had not formed or expressed any opinion as to the guilt of the defendant, and the court further finds such statement to be a fact. The court further finds that he stated, when called as juror, and on his voir dire, that he knew of nothing which would prevent his sitting on the jury and giving the prisoner and the state a fair and impartial trial of the cause and that he went into the jury box uninfluenced by any impressions, and that he formed no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, until after he had heard the evidence in the case and the judge's charge, and the jury had retired to consider the case."

The two principal exceptions in this case are those relating to the proof of the prisoner's character and the one as to the conduct of the juror Ira Scott. As to the reference in the charge to the prisoner's character, and the manner in which it should be considered by the jury, we are clearly of the opinion that the meaning of the judge was so manifest that no intelligent juror could have mistaken it. The jury could not have supposed that the court intended to deprive the prisoner of the benefit of his former good character as a fact to be considered by them in weighing the evidence when the judge plainly meant that, if upon all the testimony, including that as to his character, they found him to be guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, they could not acquit merely because he had always borne a good character.

On the other question, the matter would largely have rested in the sound discretion of the court had the judge found the facts in some respects differently upon the question of the juror's impartiality, as in the case of State v. Terry, 173 N. C. 761, 92 S. E. 154, and the cases therein cited—State v. Banner, 149 N. C. 519, 63 S. E. 84; State v. English, 164 N. C. 498, 80 S. E. 72; State v. Fos- ter, 172 N. C. 960, 90 S. E. 785; and State v. Bailey, 179 N. C. 724, 102 S. E. 406. But upon the facts it did not appear that the juror was not qualified.

We have given close and careful consideration to the record and all the exceptions and assignments of error, and have been unable to discover by the most diligent search any ground for a reversal.

No error.

CLIFTON et al. v. DUPLIN HIGHWAY COMMISSION et al. (No. 229.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

Eminent domain §45—No limitation on kind of property specially created highway commission can condemn.

The Duplin county highway commission, created by Pub. Loc. Laws 1921, c. 447, and authorized by section 12 thereof, without any limitation, to condemn land necessary for a road, may do so irrespective of presence of dwellings, trees, and yards, the provisions of C. S. § 1714, being restricted to corporations described in section 1706, and sections 3668, 3669, and 3746 being applicable only to the county road commissions provided for in the chapter concerning roads and highways (C. S. c. 70, art. 4, pt. 2), and the power to appropriate private property to public use extending, in the absence of restriction by Constitution or statute, to every species of property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Lyon, Judge.

Suit by W. T. Clifton and another against the Duplin Highway Commission and others for injunction. From an order dissolving a restraining order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Clifton owns a life estate and Lucian Clifton the remainder in certain real estate in the town of Faison, on which is situated a dwelling occupied by W. T. Clifton, together with shade trees and yard shrubbery.

The North Carolina highway commission laid out and located a public highway extending from Warsaw northward to the Wayne county line, passing over plaintiffs' land, thence on to the Virginia line. Under competitive bidding the state highway commission let the construction of the highway at the place in question to the defendant Lacey, who has completed a considerable part of the work. Lacey called on the state highway commission to remove the building in the highway as laid out, and the state commission called on the Duplin county highway commission to remove the obstructions. The Duplin county commission employed J. R. Lamb to remove them at a price to be paid by the county commissioners. The defendants were preparing to move the dwelling, when, on application of plaintiffs, Judge Lyon issued a temporary order restraining the defendants from trespassing upon or interfering with the plaintiffs' property. On the hearing the restraining order was dissolved, and the plaintiffs appealed.

The only defendants are Lamb, Lacey, and the Duplin county highway commission.

Grady & Graham, of Clinton, for appellants.

R. D. Johnson, of Warsaw, for appellees.

ADAMS, J. The Duplin county highway commission was created by act of the General Assembly at the regular session of 1921, and is not one of the corporations included in section 1706 of the Consolidated Statutes. Pub. Loc. Laws 1921, c. 447. The provisions of section 1714 are restricted to the corporations described in section 1706, and therefore do not apply to the defendant. In like manner sections 3668, 3669, and 3746 are applicable only to the county road commissions provided for in the chapter concerning roads and highways. C. S. c. 70, art. 4, pt. 2. The defendant is not one of these commissions. Whether the state highway commission entered into a contract with the Duplin county commission under section 3592 does not definitely appear, and under the circumstances is immaterial. The state commission is not a party to the action, and, as the defendants entered upon the property under the alleged authority of the Duplin county commission, the right to condemn the property of the plaintiffs must be determined by the provisions of the act under which the latter commission was created. P. L. 1921, c. 447. Section 12 in part is as follows:

"That the highway commission shall have power, on petition or on their own motion, to relocate, construct, widen or otherwise change public roads or parts thereof, and to lay out and construct new roads or parts thereof, and to lay out and construct new roads when in their judgment the same will be advantageous to public travel, and for such purposes are authorized through their agents to enter upon lands to make the necessary surveys. Before doing any work or construction, apart from the surveys, the board shall give to the owner of the land over which the proposed new road or change of road may run at least five (5) days notice in writing of a time and place, when and where, the highway commission will consider the question of condemning the land. If the landowner be a minor or insane, such notice shall be given to him and his guardian, or if there be no guardian, to the person with whom he is living. If the landowner be a nonresident, or cannot be found within the county, such notice shall be mailed to his last known address and publication made in a newspaper in Duplin county, at least twenty (20) days before the hearing. If the highway commission shall find the proposed improvement advantageous to public travel, and shall decide to condemn the land necessary for the road, they shall so declare and enter the order of condemnation in their minutes. Upon the question of condemnation, the findings and order of the board shall be subject to review by appeal to superior court. No strip of land wider than forty (40) feet, with such additional width as may be necessary for cuts and fills, shall be so required by condemnation. Upon making the order of condemnation the highway commission shall have authority through its agents, to immediately take possession of the land described in the order and proceed to construct the said road."

The procedure for ascertaining the compensation also is set forth, but it in no way affects the right of condemnation.

It will be observed that this act contains no such limitation as is provided in the statutes hereinbefore referred to with respect to dwellings, trees, or yards. In the absence of constitutional or statutory restriction, the power of the state to appropriate private property to public use extends to every species of property within its territorial jurisdiction. Richmond R. Co. v. L. R. Co., 13 How. 71, 14 L. Ed. 55; Eastern R. Co. v. Boston R. Co., 111 Mass. 125, 15 Am. Rep. 13; 20 C. J. 537; R. R. v. Davis, 19 N. C. 452; Wissler v. Yadkin Co., 158 N. C. 466, 74 S. E. 460; Lewis on Em. Dom. § 411.

We are of opinion that under the circumstances of this case the defendants have a right to proceed as authorized by the Legislature, and that the order of his honor dissolving the restraining order should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

(183 N. C. 235)

HARRIS v. MANGUM. (No. 252.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 29, 1922.)

1. Steam —6—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine applicable to explosion of boiler.

In the absence of an explanation, the bursting of a boiler justly and reasonably warrants an inference of negligence within the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, which in its distinctive sense permits negligence to be inferred from the physical cause of an accident.

2. Master and servant —265(5)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine applicable.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur may be invoked by the plaintiff in an action against an employer for an employee's death caused by the explosion of a boiler.

3. Negligence —138(2)—Instruction on burden of proof held erroneous.

In an action for death caused by an exploding boiler, an instruction that the law raises a presumption that the explosion was due to negligence and shifts upon the defendant the burden of showing that the explosion was not neg-ligently caused is erroneous as imposing on the defendant the burden of disproving negligence.

4. Negligence —121(2)—Doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" defined.

Where the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" applies, plaintiff, on proof of the physical cause of an accident, has a prima facie case of negligence; but such prima facie case is not a presumption in the technical sense, but simply evidence from which the jury may or may not infer negligence, and the duty then imposed on the defendant is to elect between introducing or declining to introduce evidence in rebuttal.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Res Ipsa Loquitur.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Nonie B. Harris, administratrix of J. C. Harris, against P. H. Mangum. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. New trial.

Civil action for the recovery of damages for the wrongful and negligent death of plaintiff's intestate, tried by Bond, Judge, and a jury, at the October-November term of the superior court of Wake. The intestate was standing near a steam boiler used by the defendant in the operation of a sawmill when the boiler exploded causing the death of the intestate. There was evidence for plaintiff tending to show that her intestate was an employee of the defendant, and evidence for defendant tending to show that he was not. The jury found that the intestate was such employee, answered the issue of negligence in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed damages. The defendant appealed.

Armistead, Jones & Son and H. E. Norris, all of Raleigh, for appellant.

R. N. Simms, J. H. Finlator and R. L. McMillan, all of Raleigh, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. Applying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to the cause of the intestate's death his honor instructed the jury as follows:

"The defendant having admitted that an explosion occurred, the law raises a presumption that the explosion was due to negligence and shifts upon the defendant the burden of showing that the explosion was not negligently caused."

This instruction the defendant assigns as error, and in our opinion his exception should be sustained. The verdict, considered in reference to his honor's charge, established as between the defendant and the intestate the relation of master and servant. In a large body of decisions, especially in those of the federal courts, the maxim res ipsa loquitur is not applied in actions arising from the relation of master and servant, although, says Labatt, no satisfactory reason is given why in such cases it should not apply. Man. and Ser. (2d Ed.) 1601. Some of the courts, emphasizing the peculiar contract of the employee who ordinarily assumes the risks incident both to his employment and to the negligence of his fellow servants, deny the applicability of the maxim in its strict and distinctive sense. To what extent these decisions may be affected by the abrogation of the common-law doctrine of fellow servants in the enactment of the federal Employers' Liability Act is not germane to this discussion. Jones v. R. R., 176 N. C. 260, 97 S. E. 48. Other courts, which do not exclude the rule in cases between master and servant, nevertheless confine its application to a scope more limited than that which is generally recognized in the case of carrier and passenger. In a number of decisions rendered in this jurisdiction it is held that the maxim applies to causes originating in the relation of master and servant. Kinney v. R. R., 122 N. C. 961, 80 S. E. 313; Wright v. R. R., 127 N. C. 225, 37 S. E. 221; Womble v. Grocery Co., 135 N. C. 474, 47 S. E. 493; Ross v. Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 115, 52 S. E. 121, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298; Hemphill v. Lumber Co., 141 N. C. 488, 54 S. E. 420; Fitzgerald v. R. R., 141 N. C. 531, 54 S. E. 391, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337.

[1, 2] In applying the maxim confusion has frequently arisen from a failure to observe the distinction between circumstantial evidence and the technical definition of res ipsa loquitur. This distinction is not merely theoretical; it is practically important. Res ipsa loquitur, in its distinctive sense, permits negligence to be inferred from the physical cause of an accident, without the aid of circumstances pointing to the responsible human cause. Where this rule applies, evidence of the physical cause or causes of the accident are sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the bare question of negligence. But where the rule does not apply, the plaintiff must prove circumstances tending to show some fault of omission or commission on the part of the defendant in addition to those which indicate the physical cause of the accident. Fitzgerald v. R. R., 141 N. C. 531, 54 S. E. 391, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 337 and note; Byers v. Steel Co., 159 Fed. 347, 86 C. C. A. 347, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 214 and note.

We are not inadvertent to decisions in which it is held that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply in case of injury or death caused by the explosion of a boiler; but in our opinion the better reasoning, as well as eminent judicial opinion, supports its application. The principle is embedded, not in the relation existing between the parties, but in the inherent nature and character of the act causing the injury.

"When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." Scott v. London Co., 3 H. & C. 596; Shear. & Red. on Neg. (6th Ed.) § 58b.

When in safe condition and properly managed boilers do not usually explode; therefore, in the absence of explanation, the bursting of a boiler justly and reasonably warrants an inference of negligence. Rose v. Trans. Co. (C. C.) 20 Blatchf. 411, 11 Fed. 438; Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530; Young v. Bransford, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 232; Judson v. Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; Beall v. Seattle, 28 Wash. 593, 69 Pac. 12, 61 L. R. A. 593, 92 Am. St. Rep. 892; Lykiardopoulo v. New Orleans, 127 La. 300, 53 South. 575, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 976; Newton v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 561, 105 S. E. 433; Stone v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 546, 105 S. E. 425, 12 A. L. R. 1297. We hold, then, upon the present record, that the plaintiff had a right to invoke in aid of her action against the defendant the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

[3] In our opinion, however, his honor's instruction is subject to the criticism of imposing upon the defendant the burden of disproving negligence. Furniture Co. v. Ex. Co., 144 N. C. 639, 57 S. E. 458; Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 61, 50 S. E. 562; Ross v. Cotton Mills, supra; Womble v. Grocery Co., supra; Overcash v. Electric Co., 144 N. C. 573, 57 S. E. 377, 12 Ann. Cas. 1040; Page v. Man. Co., 180 N. C. 335, 104 S. E. 669. In the last of these cases Walker, J., said:

"It is true that expressions are to be found in some of our cases, filtered there from two or three cases based on the English rule, which justified his honor's charge, but since they were decided we have adhered to the true and correct rule, which is stated in Stewart v. Carpet Co., supra; Womble v. Grocery Co., supra; Cox v. R. R., supra; Shepard v. Tel. Co., supra, and many other cases, and which we have applied in this case, the substance of which is that the burden to prove his case is always on the plaintiff, whether the defendant introduces evidence or not. Where we have said 'it is the duty of the defendant to go forward with his proof,' it was only meant in the sense that if he expects to win it is his duty to do so or take the risk of an adverse verdict, and not that any burden of proof rested upon him. He pleads no affirmative defense but the general issue, and this puts the burden throughout the case on the plaintiff, who must recover, if at all, by establishing his case by the greater weight of evidence. The Supreme Court of the United States has so stated the rule, and it referred with approval to our cases above cited. We say this much again, in the hope that the rule, as we have stated it, may hereafter be considered as the correct one."

For the purpose of calling attention to inconsistent expressions in some of the decisions of this court, we undertook at the last term to review the cases in which the burden of the issue and the "burden of proof" are discussed. White v. Hines, 182 N. C. 275, 109 S. E. 31. The origin of these inconsistencies may perhaps be found in the application against the defendant of the words "presumption" and "burden of proof." In some of the decisions the word "presumption" seems unfortunately to imply the right of the plaintiff to recover unless the defendant introduces evidence in rebuttal and to this extent assumes the burden of proof; whereas, the "presumption" is nothing more than evidence to be considered by the jury. In this case the plaintiff could have rested her case as to the first issue upon proof of the explosion and her intestate's death as the proximate result; and in that event it would have devolved on the defendant to elect between introducing and declining to introduce evidence, because, although the maxim referred to was applicable, the explosion and consequent death were only evidence from which the jury in the exercise of their reason might or might not have inferred negligence. The burden of proving by the greater weight of the evidence the explosion, the death, and the proximate cause, remained with the plaintiff throughout the trial, and the burden of disproving negligence was not at any time cast upon the defendant.

In White v. Hines, supra, 182 N. C. 288, 109 S. E. 38, it is said:

"When the plaintiff proves, for instance, that he has been injured by the fall of an elevator, or by a derailment, or by the collision of trains, or like other cause, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, and the plaintiff has a prima facie case of negligence for the consideration of the jury. Such prima facie case does not necessarily establish the plaintiff's right to recover. Certainly, it does not change the burden of the issue. The defendant may offer evidence or decline to do so at the peril of an adverse verdict. If the defendant offer evidence the plaintiff may introduce additional evidence, and the jury will then say whether upon all the evidence the plaintiff has satisfied them by its preponderance that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant. * * *

"As applicable to this class of cases the rule formulated by the more recent decisions of this court is substantially as follows: In all instances of this character, after the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of negligence, if no other evidence is introduced, the jury will be fully warranted in answering the issue as to negligence in favor of the plaintiff, but will not be required to do so as a matter of law.

When such prima facie case is made, it is incumbent upon the defendant to offer proof in rebuttal of the plaintiff's case, but not to the extent of preponderating evidence. The defendant, however, is not required as a matter of law to produce evidence in rebuttal; he may decline to offer evidence at the peril of an adverse verdict. If he offer evidence, the plaintiff may introduce other evidence in reply, and the jury will finally determine whether the plaintiff is entitled by the greater weight of all the evidence to an affirmative answer to the issue; for throughout the trial the burden is upon the plaintiff to show by the greater weight of the evidence that he is entitled to such answer."

It may not be improper to direct attention to his honor's further instruction that the law raises a presumption that the explosion was due to negligence. There are decisions which apparently sustain the instruction; but again we find that certain of the decisions are inharmonious, if not directly conflicting. For example, it has been held that in case of derailment or the collision of trains, in which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, the law raises a presumption of negligence (Stewart v. R. R., 141 N. C. 277, 53 S. E. 877; Hemphill v. Lum. Co., 141 N. C. 488, 54 S. E. 420); in others, that the maxim does not create a presumption, but merely carries the question of negligence to the jury (Fitzgerald v. R. R., 141 N. C. 542, 54 S. E. 391, 6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 837; Womble v. Grocery Co., supra; Ross v. Cotton Mills, supra); and in Cox v. R. R., 149 N. C. 118, 62 S. E. 884, it was held that an instruction that there was a "presumption in law of negligence" was erroneous in that it raised a legal presumption of the defendant's liability and shifted the burden of proof to the defendant.

[4] We hold that, where the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, the plaintiff has a prima facie case of negligence; but such prima facie case is not a presumption of law, but simply evidence from which the jury may or may not infer that the issue should be answered in favor of the plaintiff. The duty then imposed on the defendant is to elect between introducing or declining to introduce evidence in explanation or rebuttal.

We deem it unnecessary to consider the remaining exceptions.

For the reasons stated, the defendant is entitled to a new trial. Cotton Oil Co. v. R. R., 183 N. C. —, 110 S. E. 600.

New trial.

(183 N. C. 207)

NOBLES et al. v. DAVENPORT. (No. 217.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Trial ¶139(1)—When evidence sufficient to go to jury stated.

Instruction directing a verdict for defendant cannot be sustained if the evidence construed most strongly for the plaintiff will warrant a finding for him.

2. Descent and distribution ¶118—Whether father's conveyance to son constituted advancement held for jury.

In action involving issue as to whether father's deed to son constituted an advancement, evidence held sufficient for submission of the issue to the jury.

3. Descent and distribution ¶93—"Advancement" defined.

An "advancement" is an irrevocable gift in present of money or real or personal property to a child by a parent to enable the child to anticipate his inheritance to the extent of the gift.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Advancement.]

4. Descent and distribution ¶93—Doctrine of advancement based on presumption that parent intends equality among children.

The doctrine of advancement is based on the presumption that a parent who dies intestate intends an equality among his children in the division of his property, but such presumption is subject to rebuttal by parol evidence.

5. Descent and distribution ¶98—Advancement depends on intention.

In the determination of the question whether a transfer of property from parent to a child is a gift, a sale, or an advancement, the intention of the grantor at the time of the transaction, as ascertained by the circumstances surrounding the interested parties at the time the property is transferred, is a controlling element.

6. Descent and distribution ¶115—Presumptions with reference to advancements stated.

A substantial gift of property by a parent to his child, or a conveyance of land in consideration of love and affection, or a nominal sum, is ordinarily presumed to be an advancement; but, if the transfer is made for a valuable and adequate consideration, the presumption is to the contrary, such presumptions not being affected by a reservation of a life estate.

7. Descent and distribution ¶116—Father's deed to son competent on issue of whether execution of subsequent deed covering same land constituted an advancement.

In action involving issue of whether parent's conveyance of land to son was an advancement, a previously executed deed from the father to the son covering the same land held admissible.

8. Evidence ¶121(9), 273(4)—Testimony as to father's statements as to nature of his conveyances to children, inadmissible as res gesta or declarations against interest.

In an action involving issue as to whether father's conveyance to son constituted an advancement, testimony as to statements made by father to witnesses as to the nature of such conveyances held properly excluded; such testimony not being competent as a part of the res gesta, or as a declaration against the interest of the father.

9. Evidence ¶501(7)—Opinion as to value of land admissible though based upon personal observation of property.

Witness who was qualified to express opinion as to the value of land based upon personal observation of the property should have been permitted to give such opinion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Bond, Judge.

Action by Dora Nobles and others against W. H. Davenport. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. New trial.

Ben Nobles and Ben Davis would have testified, if they had been permitted, as to statements made by the father with reference to the nature of his conveyances to his children.

Dora Nobles and her sister Denny Nobles (the husband of each being a party) instituted before the clerk a special proceeding against the defendant (their brother) for partition of land and accounting for advancements. The plaintiffs alleged that their father, S. H. Davenport, conveyed to Denny Nobles and to the defendant each a tract of land as an advancement, and that the petitioner Denny was willing to account. The defendant filed an answer denying that he had been advanced, and the case was transferred to the civil docket. The following issue was submitted to the jury:

"Was the conveyance of land by deed referred to in the pleadings in this cause, from S. H. Davenport to the defendant, W. H. Davenport, a settlement and advancement to said defendant?"

His honor instructed the jury upon all the evidence to answer the issue, "No." Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appealed.

Rouse & Rouse, of Kinston, for appellants. Cowper, Whitaker & Allen, of Kinston, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. S. H. Davenport, father of the plaintiffs and the defendant, died intestate September 8, 1919, and his wife, in January, 1909. On October 13, 1905, he and his wife executed and delivered to Denny Nobles, one of the plaintiffs, a deed for 97 acres of land, designated a "deed of gift," reserving to the grantors a life estate. This conveyance was duly acknowledged before a justice of the peace in October, 1905, and in November.

1919, it was duly probated and registered. All the parties admit that it was intended as an advancement. On October 13, 1905, S. H. Davenport and his wife signed and acknowledged before the same justice of the peace another deed, likewise designated a "gift," purporting to convey to the defendant a tract of land containing 102 acres, and reserving a life estate to the grantors. This deed has never been registered. In each deed the consideration recited is natural love and affection. On November 15, 1910, S. H. Davenport, reserving a life estate, executed and delivered to the defendant another deed for said 102 acres, reciting as the consideration natural love and affection, and $700 paid by the grantee. This conveyance was acknowledged by the grantor in March, 1911, and registered in the following November. Simultaneously with the execution of this deed, the defendant executed and delivered to S. H. Davenport a mortgage on said land, reciting an indebtedness to the mortgagee of $700 and the purpose "to secure the purchase money of even date" evidenced by three notes. The mortgage was acknowledged on May 10, 1911, probated and registered on March 29, 1913, and marked satisfied on December 20, 1918. On December 26, 1918, S. H. Davenport executed and delivered to the defendant a release of his reserved life estate in the land described in the deed and mortgage.

[1,2] His honor's instruction cannot be sustained if the evidence construed most strongly for the plaintiff will warrant an affirmative answer to the issue; and we are of opinion that the evidence, thus construed, should have been submitted to the jury.

[3-6] In its legal sense an "advancement" is an irrevocable gift in present of money or property, real or personal, to a child by a parent, to enable the donee to anticipate his inheritance to the extent of the gift; or, as somewhat differently defined, a perfect and irrevocable gift, not required by law, made by a parent during his lifetime to his child, with the intention on the part of the donor that such gift shall represent a part or the whole of the donor's estate that the donee would be entitled to on the death of the donor intestate. 18 C. J. 911; 1 R. C. L. 653; Thompson v. Smith, 160 N. C. 257, 76 S. E. 1010; Hollister v. Attmore, 58 N. C. 373; Meadows v. Meadows, 33 N. C. 148. The doctrine of advancements was the subject of statutory enactment in England as early as the reign of Charles II (22 and 23 Car. II, 1682-83), and in this jurisdiction it is set forth as to both real and personal property in sections 138 and 1654(2) of Consolidated Statutes. This doctrine is based on the presumption that a parent who dies intestate intends equality among his children in the division of his property, but such presumption is subject to rebuttal by parol evidence.

The decision in Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, 17 N. C. 376, may be considered in connection with Thompson v. Smith, supra; Griffin, Ex Parte, 142 N. C. 116, 54 S. E. 1007; James v. James, 76 N. C. 331; Harper v. Harper, 92 N. C. 300. In the determination of the question whether a transfer of property from parent to child is a gift, a sale, or an advancement, the intention of the grantor is the controlling element. Thompson v. Smith, supra; Kiger v. Terry, 119 N. C. 456, 26 S. E. 38; Harper v. Harper, supra; Bradsher v. Cannady, 76 N. C. 445; James v. James, supra; Cowan v. Tucker, 27 N. C. 78; 1 R. C. L. 656. And only such intention as exists at the time of the transaction is to be considered. Therefore a parent's transfer of property to his child may constitute in part an advancement and in part a gift or a sale. Walker v. Brooks, 99 N. C. 207, 6 S. E. 63; 18 C. J. 918. In endeavoring to discover the donor's intention, we must consider the circumstances surrounding the interested parties at the time the property is transferred; for the circumstances may be such as to create a presumption of advancement. Thus a substantial gift of property by a parent to his child, or a conveyance of land in consideration of love and affection, or a nominal sum, is ordinarily presumed to be an advancement. Thompson v. Smith, supra; Kiger v. Terry, supra; Harper v. Harper, supra. But if the transfer is made for a valuable and adequate consideration there is no presumption of an advancement, but rather the contrary. Kiger v. Terry, supra; Ex parte Griffin, supra. Nor is the doctrine of presumptions affected by the reservation of a life estate. 18 C. J. 918, § 221.

[7] Applying these principles, although the plaintiffs declare only on the deed of 1910, we conclude that his honor should have submitted to the jury any competent evidence relating to the alleged delivery and acceptance of the deeds of 1905; relating to the actual consideration of the deed and mortgage of 1910; to the value of the land conveyed; to the circumstances under which the mortgage was canceled; and to the grantor's release of his life estate, together with any other relevant evidence tending to show the intention of the grantor at the time he executed the deed of 1910. For these reasons we hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to have the issue determined by another jury.

[8] There are exceptions to evidence which may not arise in another trial; but it is not inappropriate to say that in our opinion the proposed testimony of Benjamin Nobles and Benjamin Davis, as presented in the record, was properly excluded. In the circumstances disclosed it was not competent either as a part of the res gestae or as a declaration against the interest of the grantor. Hicks v. Forrest, 41 N. C. 528; Melvin v. Bullard, 82 N. C. 84; Roe v. Journegan, 175 N. C.

261, 95 S. E. 495; Roe v. Journigan, 181 N. C. 180, 106 S. E. 680; Reese v. Woods, 182 N. C. 703, 109 S. E. 846; Tart v. Tart, 154 N. C. 502, 70 S. E. 929, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 952, 1 R. C. L. 665 et seq.; Elliott v. Western Coal & Mining Co., 243 Ill. 614, 90 N. E. 1104, 184 Am. St. Rep. 398, 17 Ann. Cas. 886.

[9] We see no sufficient reason for excluding the proposed testimony of Calvin Robinson as to the value of the land, if the court should hold that he is qualified to express an opinion based upon personal observation of the property. Bennett v. Manufacturing Co., 147 N. C. 620, 61 S. E. 463; Britt v. R. R., 148 N. C. 37, 61 S. E. 601.

The plaintiffs are entitled to a new trial. Let this be certified to the superior court of Lenoir county.

(183 N. C. 228)

WHITE v. FISHERIES PRODUCTS CO.
(No. 107.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 29, 1922.)

1. Evidence \Leftrightarrow 444(2)—Written contract may be shown to have been delivered on condition that it was not to be operative except on the happening of a contingency.

A written contract may be shown to have been delivered on condition that it was to be inoperative except on the happening of a contingency, since such evidence does not vary the written instrument, but proves the effect of delivery.

2. Evidence \Leftrightarrow 442(1)—Parol evidence not admissible to vary terms of notes and contract.

In an action for damages for negotiating notes in violation of a contract, where each note bore a printed indorsement that it was for a cash consideration, and that the holder might cash the note before it was due, and a clause in a contract for the purchase of stock, entered into at the time of executing the notes which were given to pay for the stock, provided that no condition or agreement other than those in the contract should be binding on either the seller or buyer, an oral agreement in regard to placing the notes in escrow, being in direct contradiction to the terms of the written contract, was not admissible.

3. Fraud \Leftrightarrow 32—Issue of fraud on maker of note held proper in suit for breach of escrow agreement.

In a maker's action for damages for negotiating notes contrary to an escrow agreement in which plaintiff alleged that defendant's agent procured the notes by false and fraudulent representations, and that he sought recovery for damages occasioned by the deceit, a refusal to submit the question of fraud to the jury was error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by O. F. White against the Fisheries Products Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. New trial.

Civil action to recover damages for an alleged wrongful conversion and negotiation of plaintiff's promissory notes in violation of the understanding and agreement between the parties that same should remain in escrow and not become operative or effective unless and until the plaintiff sold his farm for $35,000, which he never did.

Rountree & Carr, of Wilmington, and O. H. Gulon, of Newbern, for appellant.

Winston & Matthews and Gillam & Davenport, all of Windsor, for appellee.

STACY, J. [1] Plaintiff alleges that, on June 17, 1920, he gave to the defendant's agent three promissory notes, aggregating the sum of $11,410, due June 1, 1921, the same to be placed in the Bank of Colerain for safe-keeping, and, in the event the plaintiff sold his farm in Chowan county before the maturity of said notes, it was understood and agreed that he would take them up by paying the principal sum, with interest, and receive 761 shares of the capital stock of the Fisheries Products Company; provided, further, that should the plaintiff fail to sell his farm, as above stated, the notes were to be returned and all negotiations abandoned. Instead of depositing said notes in accordance with the above understanding and agreement, it is alleged that defendant's agent wrongfully, fraudulently, and with intent to cheat the plaintiff, negotiated said notes to the Bank of Colerain, which became an innocent purchaser thereof for value, and that the plaintiff was thereby forced to pay the same at maturity, although he had not been able to sell his farm, as contemplated, and the contingency upon which the notes were to take effect, as between the original parties, had not occurred.

The law relating to conditionally delivered contracts has been sanctioned and approved by us in a number of carefully considered decisions, and it is now very generally recognized, applied, and followed in this as well as in other jurisdictions. Farrington v. McNeill, 174 N. C. 420, 93 S. E. 957; Bowser v. Tarry, 156 N. C. 35, 72 S. E. 74; Gaylord v. Gaylord, 150 N. C. 222, 63 S. E. 1028; Hughes v. Crooker, 148 N. C. 318, 62 S. E. 429, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606; Aden v. Doub, 146 N. C. 10, 59 S. E. 162; Pratt v. Chaffin, 136 N. C. 350, 48 S. E. 768; Kelly v. Oliver, 113 N. C. 442, 18 S. E. 698, and Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590, 9 Sup. Ct. 174, 32 L. Ed. 563. It is said in Anson on Contracts (Am. Ed.) 318:

"The parties to a written contract may agree that until the happening of a condition, which is not put in writing, the contract is to remain inoperative."

And again, in Wilson v. Powers, 131 Mass. 539:

"The manual delivery of an instrument may always be proved to have been on a condition which has not been fulfilled, in order to avoid its effect. This is not to show any modification or alteration of the written agreement, but that it never became operative, and that its obligation never commenced."

These excerpts are quoted with approval in Garrison v. Machine Co., 159 N. C. 285, 74 S. E. 821, where the same doctrine is announced by Walker, J., in an elaborate review of the authorities on the subject now in hand.

[2] But defendant contends that the foregoing principles are not applicable to the facts of the instant case; or, at least, that the evidence tending to bring them into operation cannot be admitted without violating other equally well-known and established rules of procedure. On the back of each note, over the signature of the plaintiff, appears a printed indorsement in the following words:

"To Any Bank or Banker Anywhere: This is to certify, that this note is given as a cash consideration. Therefore it will be satisfactory to me for the holder to cash this note before it is due. And I will pay same in full at maturity to the purchaser."

In addition to this indorsement there was a clause in the contract for the purchase of the stock, duly signed by the plaintiff, as follows:

"No condition or agreement, other than those printed herein, shall be binding on either the seller or buyer."

It is clear from the foregoing indorsement and stipulation, in the contract of sale, that, in the absence of any fraud or mistake, the plaintiff will not be allowed to show the oral agreement in regard to placing the notes in escrow as this would be in direct contradiction to the terms of his written contract.

"It is a rule too firmly established in the law of evidence to need a reference to authority in its support that parol evidence will not be heard to contradict, add to, take from or in any way vary the terms of a contract put in writing, and all contemporary declarations and understandings are incompetent for such purpose, for the reason that the parties, when they reduce their contract to writing, are presumed to have inserted in it all the provisions by which they intend to be bound." Ray v. Blackwell, 94 N. C. 10.

And to like effect are many decisions in our reports, too numerous to be cited here.

In Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, 62 S. E. 510, the present Chief Justice, speaking of this question, aptly said:

"It is true that a contract may be partly in writing and partly oral (except when forbidden by the statute of frauds), and that in such cases the oral part of the agreement may be shown. But this is subject to the well-established rule that a contemporaneous agreement shall not contradict that which is written. The written word abides, and is not to be set aside upon the slippery memory of man."

See, also, Moffitt v. Maness, 102 N. C. 457, 9 S. E. 399, one of the leading cases on this subject, and Sykes v. Everett, 167 N. C. 600, 83 S. E. 585, 4 A. L. R. 751; Mfg. Co. v. McCormick, 175 N. C. 277, 95 S. E. 555, L. R. A. 1918F, 572; Bland v. Harvester Co., 169 N. C. 418, 86 S. E. 350; Guano Co. v. Live Stock Co., 168 N. C. 447, 84 S. E. 774, L. R. A. 1915D, 875; Thomas v. Carteret County, 182 N. C. 374, 109 S. E. 384, and cases there cited.

[3] Plaintiff also alleges that the defendant's agent procured the notes in question by false and fraudulent representations, and he seeks, in this action, to recover for the loss thus occasioned by such deceit, etc. But there was no issue of fraud submitted to the jury. His honor held that, under Hughes v. Crooker, 148 N. C. 318, 62 S. E. 429, 128 Am. St. Rep. 606, such would not be necessary, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff on a simple issue of indebtedness. This, we think, was erroneous.

Upon the instant record, unless the plaintiff can make good his allegation of fraud, it appears that his recovery must be denied.

For the error as indicated, there must be a new trial or a venire de novo; and it is so ordered.

New trial.

WEATHERS v. BALDWIN. (No. 336.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error \S 927(3)—On review of ruling on nonsuit, plaintiff's evidence taken as true.

On appeal from an order of nonsuit, the evidence produced by plaintiff must be taken as true, with all reasonable inferences which may be drawn therefrom.

2. Municipal corporations \S 706(6)—Evidence sufficient for jury on question of willful injury by an automobile.

Under C. S. \S 768, providing that no woman shall be arrested, except for willful injury to a person, in an action for injury from being struck by an automobile, where the evidence showed that defendant was in open violation of the laws as to running of automobiles, and her conduct was without regard for the lives and safety of others, the issue as to whether her acts were willful was for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by Ed. Weathers against Hettie Baldwin. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff excepts and appeals. Error, and new trial.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover for injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon him by the willful wrong of the defendant in driving her motorcar against the plaintiff on the public streets of Apex. Issues were submitted to the jury, and verdict returned by them for $1,250, and judgment entered thereon. At a subsequent term, upon a motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict and judgment, the court refused to do so, but reduced the amount of the judgment to $1,000, and set aside the finding as to willful injury, and ordered that an issue as to the injury being willful be submitted to a jury at a subsequent term of the court. The issue was accordingly submitted to the jury, and evidence was taken upon the same, and at the close of the evidence the court held that there was no evidence of willful injury and nonsuited the plaintiff as to that issue.

Ed. Weathers, plaintiff, testified in his own behalf as follows:

"My name is Ed. Weathers and have lived in Durham four or five years. I know where the town of Apex is located. It is located about 20 miles from Durham, and is on the Seaboard Air Line Railway, between Raleigh and Hamlet, N. C. I went down to Apex on the 9th day of May, 1920. I was down there on Sunday, and went to or started to a funeral to be held at church. Apex is a good-sized town, and has a good many business houses. I was walking on the main street in the business section of the town, and at the intersection of two streets, when an automobile ran into me, driven by the defendant, Hettie Baldwin. At the time I was struck I was on the sidewalk, or the line of the sidewalk at the intersection of two streets. At that time I was going in the direction of the church, and it was 10 or 11 o'clock, I think. I heard a noise, at the place I was struck, and just as I turned around to see, the automobile was right on me, and I was knocked down like this (describing manner). The place where I was struck was in the business section, where there are many stores, and I think a bank was on one corner, and a drug store on the other. I can hear well, and as I heard the noise I looked around and was immediately struck. The white people were having church meetings, and there were lots of people on the street. The church was just above where I was struck. Hettie Baldwin approached me from the rear, at the rate, in my opinion, of 25 or 30 miles an hour. I was going in a southerly direction, and she was going south in the direction of New Hill. She neither blew her horn nor gave any signal of her approach. I do not know how far her car ran after hitting me, but she went some distance and ran into a telegraph pole, breaking her lights and fender. I was knocked down, and learned soon afterwards that I was painfully hurt. I was bruised about the head and body and was confined in bed for several weeks."

Cross-examination:

"The defendant ran into a post after I was struck, and I could not tell why she did. I was raised at or near Apex and had been there before. I went from Raleigh to Mississippi when young, with an uncle and aunt. I am no preacher, but went to Apex to church. I have been living in Durham since I came back from Mississippi. I got to Apex about 10 o'clock, and went there to attend a funeral. I was going down Main street, when I was struck about 10. The main street runs toward New Hill, and I reckon is called Salem street. The street runs north and south, and another street runs at right angles with it, I reckon. The street that crosses the main street, or Salem street, runs toward the railroad. I was crossing Main street, and going along the cross street. I was going toward the railroad before I turned down Main street, to my right. When I reached Main street, I was going toward New Hill. I was coming down the cross street, and was crossing from the bank building over to the next corner, across Main street. I was struck on the sidewalk after crossing Main street, and had made two or three steps going in the direction of New Hill. I went right from the bank corner to the other corner, where the street crosses, and was struck there—the corner opposite Mr. Olive's house. I do not know whether there is a drug store on the other corner or not. There is a bank on one corner, a drug store, I guess, or brick building, on the other, and Mr. Olive's house on the other. I had crossed the street, and was on the sidewalk, somewhere near the Olive residence, when I was struck. I do not think the sidewalk was paved. There was no whistle or horn blown. The first I saw or heard of the automobile, it was right on me. I was near enough, so that when I looked around I was struck. I looked around. I do not know whether I stooped or not. I fell. I do not know what part of the car struck me. Some colored person helped me up, but I do not know his name. She did not get out of the car, and if she said anything I do not know it. If she asked me whether I was hurt, I did not know. I told the colored man I was hurt. I did not say to Mr. Wall or others that I was hurt, that I remember. If I saw Mr. Seamore, Wall, or Scott, I do not know it. I do not know that they were standing near. I do not remember any white men coming to me at all; none except a big yellow fellow. He carried me to the doctor that day, but he was not at home. He carried me to the church, and turned me over to another fellow. I did not go into the church. I did not know where the church was. I lay outside on the grass under the trees. The fellow did not stay with me all the time, but my sister-in-law did."

Redirect examination:

"I did not come to Durham until that night. I came on the train, and called a physician that night.

"Q. How long was he attending you? A. Several weeks. (Objection—objection sustained. Extent of injury, together with conduct of plaintiff, admitted by the court.)

"Q. What effect did the injury have on you, whether it made you sick or not. (Objection by defendant—objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. I got sick and spit up blood for a week after I was struck. I lay in bed, and there was a great knot on the back of my head, caused by the blow. My bowels were swelled, and my neck was wrenched."

Recross-examination:

"I did not tell any one I was not hurt. I called Dr. Strudwick. I do not know how long he attended me. I did not have a doctor in Apex. I have not had the doctor in court."

II. W. Hursey, witness for plaintiff, testified:

"I have known Ed. Weathers since he came back from Mississippi. His character is good. I recall the occasion on which he was injured."

The issue came on to be tried, and the court held that there was no evidence of willful injury, and nonsuited the plaintiff, whereupon he excepted and appealed.

J. W. Barbee, of Durham, for appellant.

R. O. Everett, of Durham, and Percy J. Olive, of Apex, for appellee.

WALKER, J. [1, 2] We have set forth, in the statement of the case, only the testimony of the plaintiff given in his own behalf, and that of one of his witnesses, as, upon a motion to nonsuit, the evidence introduced by the plaintiff must be taken as true, and so considered with all reasonable inferences which may be drawn therefrom. Snider v. Newell, 132 N. C. 614, 44 S. E. 354; Brittain v. Westhall, 135 N. C. at page 495, 47 S. E. 616; Biles v. Railroad Co., 143 N. C. 79, 55 S. E. 512. If the testimony is thus construed, the case should have been submitted to a jury to find whether the defendant had not only wrongfully injured the plaintiff, as was done at a former term of the court, but whether she committed, not only a wrongful injury, but also a willful injury. Consol. St. § 768, provides:

"No woman shall be arrested in any action except for willful injury to person, character or property."

It would be useless to set out here the numerous definitions of the word "willful" or "willfully"; the former being the term used in the statute. It is sufficient to consider, and adopt, one of the definitions which will answer for the purpose of this appeal. In Jones v. Bland, 182 N. C. 70, at page 73, 108 S. E. 344, at page 346 (16 A. L. R. 1383), the question arose as to what would constitute "willfulness or wantonness," and the court held it to be "negligence so gross as to manifest a reckless indifference to the rights of another"—citing Everett v. Receivers, 121

N. C. 519, 27 S. E. 991. This, as being one of the definitions of willful injury or willful tort, was accepted and approved in Ill. Cent. R. Co. v. Leiner, 202 Ill. 624, 67 N. E. 398, 95 Am. St. Rep. 266, and Cin., etc., R. R. Co. v. Cooper, 120 Ind. 469, 22 N. E. 840, 6 L. R. A. 241, 16 Am. St. Rep. 334. In the latter case the court held that it was correct to charge the jury as follows:

"To establish the charge of willfulness, as set out in the fourth paragraph of the complaint, I instruct you that an actual intent to do the particular injury alleged need not be shown; but if you find from all the evidence that the misconduct of the defendant's servants was such as to evince an utter disregard of consequences, so as to inflict the injury complained of, this may of itself tend to establish willfulness."

The court said in this connection that the instruction not only expressed correctly the rule of law applicable to such cases, but that recklessness, reaching in degree to an utter disregard of consequences, may supply the place of a specific intent. In the case of Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Leiner, supra, it was said by the court that, to constitute willful and wanton negligence, it is not always necessary to prove that the defendant's servants are actuated by ill-will towards the plaintiff. In East St. Louis Connecting Railway Co. v. O'Hara, 150 Ill. 580, 37 N. E. 917, it is said:

"If it be true, as the evidence tends to show, that the defendant's servants, at the time plaintiff was injured, were running their engine in the dark, without a headlight, or a bell ringing, and at a high and dangerous rate of speed, along a much frequented street, and where many persons were likely to be passing on their way to the ferry landing or otherwise, such acts would be liable to the construction of being in wanton and willful disregard of the rights and safety of the public generally, so as to amount in law to wanton and willful negligence. And it was not necessary, in order to raise an inference of such negligence, to prove that the defendant's servants were actuated by ill will directed specifically towards the plaintiff, or to have known that he was in such position as to be likely to be injured."

Thompson on Negligence, vol. 1, § 22, thus defines a willful injury:

"An entire absence of care for the life, the person or the property of others, such as exhibits a conscious indifference to consequences, makes a case of constructive or legal willfulness, such as charges the person whose duty it was to exercise care, with the consequences of a willful injury."

In Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Leiner, supra, the court approved this instruction to the jury:

"What is meant by willful and wanton misconduct is such conduct as amounts to an intentional wrong, or of such a reckless character as shows that the person or persons, guilty of such misconduct, were at the time acting in such a manner as shows that they had an utter disregard for the safety and lives of other persons."

See, also, Tolleson v. So. R. R. Co., 88 S. O. 7, 70 S. E. 311.

It may be that there is testimony in this case to show an actual intent to willfully commit the injury; but, whether this is so or not, it is sufficient to evidence an intent to do so, by inflicting injury recklessly and in total disregard of the rights and safety of others. The defendant, if the evidence be true, was in open and almost defiant violation of the statutes as to the running of automobiles in cities and towns, and her conduct can rightfully be characterized as nothing less than reckless, and as exhibiting no regard whatever for the lives and safety of others who were at the time using the streets, as they had a lawful right to do, at the hour of the morning service in the churches of a large and populous town. It is hard to conceive how the defendant could think that she would not injure some one on the streets, as she really did. But her liability to the defendant depends upon how the jury will view the testimony. She may be right, and it may so appear upon the trial of the issue; but the jury must decide the question at issue.

There was error in the ruling of the court withdrawing the issue from the jury.

COPELIN v. WILLIAMS et al. (No. 2531.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Action \S 28—Deeds \S 8—Sale by one without authority does not divest owner's title; owner cannot waive tort and sue one selling without authority for purchase price.

The plaintiffs, as heirs of Mollie Mattox, deceased, instituted an action at law against Ida Copelin, to recover an undivided interest in a described portion of a certain tract of land with mesne profits, and one-half of the proceeds of the remaining portion of the tract, which was alleged to have been sold by the defendant in her own name, under an agreement with the purchaser that she would account to plaintiffs for their interests in the purchase price. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant made a motion for new trial, which having been overruled, she excepted. Held:

Where one person without lawful authority sells and conveys as his own the land of another person and receives the consideration paid therefor, such pretended sale and conveyance will not operate to divest the title of the owner, nor will the purchaser derive any title; and the owner cannot maintain an action against the vendor for the whole or any part of the purchase-price received by him. Crews v. Heard, 7 Ga. 60; 21 R. C. L. 923.

(a) The principle above announced does not conflict with another well-recognized principle, applicable where personality is tortiously converted into money, as stated in Merchants' Bank of Macon v. Rawls, 7 Ga. 191 (2), 50 Am. Dec. 394, and now embodied in Civ. Code 1910, \S 4407, which provides: "When a transaction partakes of the nature both of a tort and a contract, the party complainant may waive the one and rely solely upon the other."

2. Mortgages \S 32(6), 138—Absolute deed may be shown a mortgage by parol, when grantor in possession; under security deed, legal title is in grantee, and equitable title in grantor.

A deed absolute in form will ordinarily transfer the title of the grantor to the land; but, if the grantor remains in possession, it may be shown by parol that the deed was made to secure a debt. Where such a deed is made to secure a debt, the legal title will vest in the grantee, and the equitable title, or right to have the property reconveyed on payment of the debt, will remain in the grantor. Civ. Code 1910, \S 3258; Waller v. Dunn, 151 Ga. 181, 106 S. E. 93.

3. Vendor and purchaser \S 228(1), 239(6)—Grantee of one taking title as security takes free from equity, if he had no notice, but otherwise subject to it.

If the grantee sells and conveys the property to a third person, who takes without notice of the outstanding equity, the purchaser, as against the original grantor or his heirs at law, will acquire the legal title unaffected by such equity. If the purchaser takes with notice of such equity, he will take subject to it.

4. Mortgages \S 36, 319(1)—Vendor and purchaser \S 242—Burden on heirs of one conveying as security when suing to recover land.

Where an owner conveys land by a deed absolute in form, and the heirs of the grantor seek in an action at law to recover the land from a purchaser of the grantee on the basis of an equitable title arising under circumstances specified above, it being necessary that they should have had title at the commencement of the suit and that the purchaser should have bought with notice of such title, the burden would rest upon the plaintiffs to prove that the deed so executed by plaintiffs' ancestor was effective only as security for a debt, that the debt had been paid or tendered before institution of the suit, and that the defendant purchased with notice of plaintiffs' equity.

5. Sufficiency of pleadings.

No question was made as to the sufficiency of the pleadings for application of the principles stated above to the evidence in the case.

6. Charge not accurate.

The charge of the court, as complained of in the motion for new trial, did not accurately apply the principles of law ruled above; nor was the request to charge, though substantially correct, expressed in language entirely accurate and apposite.

7. Sufficiency of evidence.

As the case will go back for another trial, no ruling will be made on the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

JAMES et al. v. GREENE. (No. 2409.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Provisions of statute.

The wife cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor by any assumption of the debt of her husband; and a sale by the wife of her separate estate to a creditor of her husband in settlement of the debt of the latter is void. Civil Code 1910, § 8007.

2. Husband and wife ⇐183—Indivisible sale of separate estate partly to settle husband's debt and partly to settle wife's is void.

A sale by the wife of her separate estate, made to a creditor of her husband in extinguishment of her husband's debt in part and in settlement of the wife's debt in part, the contract being entire, and not divisible, is void. Cross v. Cordell, 149 Ga. 383, 100 S. E. 365.

3. Husband and wife ⇐183—Wife's deed to secure husband's debt being void, creditor's sale under power therein does not convey title.

The deed of the wife to her separate estate, made to a creditor of her husband to secure the debt of the latter, being void, it necessarily follows that a deed by the creditor and grantee as attorney in fact of the wife to the creditor himself, made pursuant to sale under power contained in the deed, is inoperative to convey the title.

4. Verdict not unsupported by evidence.

Accordingly, where the evidence for the defendant in ejectment tended to show that the deed to the plaintiff was made pursuant to sale under power in a deed from defendant, a married woman, to secure an indebtedness of her husband to plaintiff's lessor, the verdict for defendant was not without evidence to support it. No error is assigned on the charge of the court to the jury, nor upon any ruling of the court made during the progress of the trial.

5. New trial ⇐53—Disqualification of jurors not ground when known to losing party.

That two of the jurors were disqualified by reason of relationship to the prevailing party afforded no reason for setting aside the verdict, it affirmatively appearing, from the note of the judge in approving the grounds of the amended motion for new trial, that the fact of such relationship was known to the losing party or his counsel prior to and at the time of the trial. Hadden v. Thompson, 118 Ga. 207 (2), 44 S. E. 1001.

Error from Superior Court, Clay County; W. C. Worrell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. D. W. James and others against Mrs. N. J. Greene. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

On February 23, 1914, Mrs. N. J. Greene conveyed to D. W. James the land in dispute to secure an indebtedness of $5,633.51. The deed authorized the grantee to sell the land upon default in payment of the indebtedness, and, as attorney in fact of the grantor, to execute deed to the purchaser. On March 9, 1915, pursuant to sale by the grantee under the power contained in the deed, the grantee executed and delivered to himself a deed to the premises in dispute. On April 24, 1915, D. W. James sold the land to Thomas C. Suttive, taking from the purchaser a deed to secure the purchase money, which deed likewise contained a power of sale. Subsequently D. W. James was adjudged a bankrupt, and R. O. Waters was appointed trustee in bankruptcy. Under the power contained in the deed from Suttive to James, he sold the land and executed a deed to himself as such trustee in bankruptcy. Mrs. N. J. Greene remained in possession, and ejectment was brought against her to recover the land. The principal contention of the defendant was that the debt secured by deed from defendant to D. W. James, dated February 23, 1914, was a debt of defendant's husband. Upon the trial of the case the evidence for defendant tended to show that the deed was made to secure the debt of the husband in whole or in part, and that the transaction was entire, and not divisible. The jury returned a verdict for defendant. Plaintiff made a motion for new trial, in which complaint is made that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it. The special grounds of the motion are based on the alleged disqualification of two of the jurors, by reason of relationship to Mrs. Greene. Upon the hearing of the motion for new trial, the presiding judge certified that after the jury had been selected and before the introduction of evidence by either party, the attention of counsel for plaintiff was called to the alleged relationship of the particular jurors to Mrs. Greene, and that counsel stated in open court that they would "waive the point." The countershowing submitted by respondent on the hearing of the motion for new trial affirmatively shows that the attention of plaintiff's counsel was called to the alleged disqualification of the parsicular jurors at the time of the trial, as certified by the trial judge. The motion for new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

ADDER MACH. CO. v. HAWES. (No. 2620.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Executors and administrators \S 437(2)—Trover held not "suit to recover debt due by decedent" within statute forbidding suits within 12 months after qualification.

An action in trover against an administrator, wherein a recovery for the hire and value of the property involved is expressly waived, and a recovery of the property itself is sought, is not covered by Civil Code 1910, \S 4015, providing that no suit to recover a debt due by the decedent shall be commenced against the administrator until the expiration of 12 months from his qualification.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by the Adder Machine Company against T. S. Hawes, administrator. Judgement for defendant, and plaintiff brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered in part.

The Court of Appeals certified to this court the following questions:

"(1) A suit in trover, filed May 2, 1919, to recover an adding machine of the alleged value of $310 and of the yearly value of $100, accompanied by an affidavit for bail, was brought against the administrator of an estate within 12 months of his appointment as administrator. The defendant filed a plea denying that title to the property was in the plaintiff, and pleading specially that he was appointed administrator of the estate on August 2, 1918, and that, 12 months therefrom not having expired, he was exempt by law from being sued, and prayed to be discharged. Upon the hearing of the suit the plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended its petition by striking therefrom its claim for hire or yearly value of the property, and elected to take a verdict for the property itself. Under these circumstances, was this trover suit a 'suit to recover a debt due by the decedent,' within the meaning of Civil Code 1910, \S 4015, which provides that 'no suit to recover a debt due by the decedent shall be commenced against the administrator until the expiration of 12 months from his qualification'?"

"(2) If the preceding question is answered in the affirmative, then an answer is requested to the following question: In such a trover suit as is referred to in the preceding question, where the defendant had refused to replevy the property, and the plaintiff, upon such refusal, had replevied the property and taken it into his possession, and where, upon the hearing of the trover proceeding, the court, on the motion of the defendant and over the plaintiff's objection, dismissed the suit as being prematurely brought, and the defendant then elected to take a money verdict for the value of the property and interest, the plaintiff not having offered to return the property or to make restitution, was the defendant entitled, as a matter of right, to a judgment against the plaintiff for the value of the property and interest?"

Hartsfield & Conger, of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Wilson and T. S. Hawes, both of Bainbridge, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. As appears from the first question propounded, the action of trover and bail, by amendment of the petition by the plaintiff, was converted into a plain suit of trover for the recovery of the property itself, wherein no recovery was sought for hire, or for the value of the property. As stated in the question, Civil Code 1910, \S 4015, provides:

"No suit to recover a debt due by the decedent shall be commenced against the administrator until the expiration of twelve months from his qualification," etc.

A trover suit for the recovery alone of the property therein mentioned is not a "suit to recover a debt due by the decedent," and it is only where the suit is to recover a debt that the exemption applies. See Lanfair v. Thompson, 112 Ga. 487 (2), 87 S. E. 717; Redford v. Lloyd, 147 Ga. 145, 98 S. E. 296. We therefore answer the first question in the negative.

No answer is required to the second question, as it is predicated upon the hypothesis that the first question is answered in the affirmative.

WRIGHT v. MARTIN. (No. 2690.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 22, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Habeas corpus \Rightarrow 112—Judgment may be set aside on showing of fraud; evidence held to show fraud justifying setting aside of judgment.

Where a motion was made to set aside the judgment of the city court of Floyd county in a habeas corpus proceeding awarding a minor child to the father, on the ground that the judgment was obtained by fraud practiced on the movant and her counsel by the respondent and his counsel, and the evidence on the hearing of the motion to set aside, though conflicting, supported the allegations of fraud, the court did not err, under the pleadings and evidence in the case, in overruling a motion to dismiss the motion to set aside the judgment, and in ordering that the motion to set aside the judgment be sustained.

Error from City Court, Floyd County; W. J. Nunnally, Judge.

Habeas corpus by A. R. Wright against N. J. Martin. A judgment for plaintiff was vacated and set aside, and he brings error. Affirmed.

On February 7, 1921, A. R. Wright filed his petition for habeas corpus against Mrs. Nettie J. Martin (his former wife who had been divorced), seeking to recover the custody of their minor child, Elizabeth Wright. On February 19, 1921, the defendant filed her answer to the petition for habeas corpus, claiming the legal right to retain the custody of the child. The hearing of the case was continued until Monday March 7, 1921, which date was agreed upon to hear the same. At that time, neither the defendant nor the child appearing, the court entered a judgment awarding the custody of the child to the plaintiff. A few days thereafter the defendant, Mrs. Nettie J. Martin, who had married again, filed a motion to set aside the judgment in the habeas corpus case, and alleged in substance the following: The case was set down for hearing February 21, 1921, and by mutual consent, but without any order of court, the case was continued from time to time until by agreement of the parties it was set for hearing March 7, 1921. On the morning of February 6 defendant's attorney at law called her at her home and reminded her that the case was set for trial on March 7, and requested her and husband to come to his office in order to confer about the case, the summoning of witnesses, etc. Movant informed her attorney that her child "was ill, that on the day before it had 104 degrees of fever, and then had 102 degrees of fever, and that she could not leave said child to attend said court, as she was the only one to nurse it." Her husband went to her attorney's office about 4 o'clock p. m. on March 6, and also called on movant's physician, who advised that the child could not leave its home on March 7, on account of its illness. The physician gave a certificate to that effect. Movant's attorney informed the attorney for the respondent of the illness of the child; and respondent's attorney then stated there could be no trial of the case on March 7, as the child would have to be produced in court, and suggested that the case be continued until Saturday following, and so that date was agreed upon, and movant was so informed on March 6; respondent's attorney stating at the time that he would call his client and inform him of the situation. It was agreed that an aunt of the respondent should visit the child in order to consider its condition. It is alleged that movant and her attorney in good faith acted on the agreement that the case should be continued until the Saturday following, owing to the fact that neither she nor the child could attend the hearing on the 7th, for the reasons stated above, all of which facts were known to respondent's attorney, who for those reasons consented to the continuance. Movant had filed her answer to the petition, and notified respondent's attorney that it was so filed. The answer set up a complete defense in the case, which movant stood ready to prove; and she now refers to that defense so filed. Relying on the agreement that the case would be continued on March 7, neither movant nor her attorney appeared on March 7; and the respondent did appear, and took undue and unfair advantage of the situation, and appeared with his attorney on March 7 with the petition in the case, but left the answer referred to above in the clerk's office, stating that he did not want it, and knowing that movant was relying upon the agreement, which she alleges was unfair and fraudulent, and deprived her of her legal rights. Movant alleges that she has a complete defense to the case, and that no reason existed, had the facts all been heard, in law or otherwise, for taking the child from her; and she prays that the judgment awarding the child to plaintiff be set aside, and that she may have a hearing upon the merits of the case.

The respondent moved to dismiss the motion to set aside the judgment in the habeas corpus case upon two grounds: First, because the motion to set aside does not lie to a judgment in a habeas corpus case, the same not being a proceeding in court, but one before the judge, and the signing of the judgment in a habeas corpus case ends the matter except by bill of exceptions; that the court had no jurisdiction to hear the motion and to determine the same; that movant's remedy, if any, was by bill of exceptions to correct any errors of law committed. Second, that, if the court had jurisdiction to determine the motion, the same is insufficient in law, and sets forth no reason for setting aside the judgment complained of. The court overruled the motion to dismiss the motion; and, after evidence was heard on the part of the movant, sustaining the allegations in the petition to set aside the judgment in the habeas corpus proceeding, and after hearing evidence from the respondent, who denied the allegations as to the agreement to continue the case on the 7th, the court sustained the motion, and ordered that the judgment rendered on March 7, 1921, be vacated and set aside. To this judgment the respondent excepted.

M. B. Eubanks, of Rome, for plaintiff in error.

L. A. Dean and F. W. Copeland, both of Rome, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). This case does not fall within that class in which it has been held that a motion to set aside a judgment must be based on some defect which appears on the face of the record (see Regopoulos v. State, 116 Ga. 596, 42 S. E. 1014), but it falls within the class of decisions to the effect that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction may be set aside by the court which rendered it for fraud practiced on the defendant and the court. Under the act establishing the city court of Floyd county, that court has authority to grant new trials in all cases, both civil and criminal, tried therein, under the same rules and regulations which govern motions for new trial in the superior courts, so far as applicable. Acts 1882-83, p. 535, § 19. In Ford v. Clark, 129 Ga. 292, 58 S. E. 818, it was held:

"A judgment founded on a verdict obtained by fraud practiced on the defendant and the court may be set aside, and the original case reinstated, in a court of law, with proper pleadings, and with all the parties at interest as parties to the motion; the motion being made at the term of the court at which the verdict and judgment were entered, and the movant showing that he was not in laches, had a meritorious defense, and announcing ready for an instant trial."

And see Moore v. Moore, 139 Ga. 597, 77 S. E. 820; Albright v. American Central Ins. Co., 147 Ga. 492 (1), 94 S. E. 561; Seagraves v. Powell Co., 143 Ga. 572 (3), 85 S. E. 760. Civil Code 1910, § 5957, provides that a motion in arrest of judgment must be made during the term at which such judgment was obtained, while a motion to set it aside may be made at any time within the statute of limitations. The case of Exchange Bank of Macon v. Elkan, 72 Ga. 197, is cited by the plaintiff in error as being controlling here; but the facts of that case are distinguishable from the facts of the case at bar. In that case no answer had been filed, and no name of counsel for the defense had been marked on the docket; and, while in that case it appeared that an "understanding" was had between counsel that the case should not be heard until they had been advised, which agreement was not in writing, and although the court held in that case that no agreement of counsel is binding unless in writing, yet the judgment of the lower court, which ordered that the judgment in that case be opened, and that the defendant be allowed to plead, was affirmed. In the present case an answer had been filed, setting up what the defendant claimed was a perfect defense, and alleging that, on the day the plaintiff took judgment in the absence of the defendant, her child, and her counsel, who had absented himself on account of the agreement with counsel for the plaintiff to continue the case, the answer was not read by the plaintiff on the trial of the case. Indeed, according to the affidavit of the clerk of the court, the plaintiff's counsel, while securing the papers from the clerk's office for trial, stated to the clerk that he did not need the answer, and, so far as the record discloses, the court was not advised of the fact that an answer had been filed, or what the contents of the answer were, or that an agreement had been entered into between counsel touching the continuance of the case. We are of the opinion that the allegations of the petition in the present case, and the proof in support thereof, although conflicting on the question of fraud, fall within the rule laid down in the Ford Case, supra, and, consequently, that the court did not err in overruling the motion to dismiss the motion to set aside the judgment in the habeas corpus case, and in ordering that the motion to set aside the judgment be sustained.

The contention that a motion to set aside a judgment in a habeas corpus proceeding will not lie is without merit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Judgment \Leftrightarrow 143(17)—Negotiations for settlement held not to excuse default or failure to move to open it before judgment.

The evidence offered by the defendants to support their application to set aside the judgment rendered in a case in default, and to open the default, did not sufficiently show that the failure of the defendants to file their defense or to move to open the default before judgment, was excusable in law; and the court erred in setting aside the judgment and opening the default.

2. New trial \Leftrightarrow 21—Absence of evidence not ground when uncontroverted allegations justified judgment.

The uncontroverted allegations in the petition required the judgment and decree in favor of the plaintiff; and the fact that no evidence was offered did not authorize the granting of a new trial, there being no verdict and judgment for the damages claimed in the petition, which might have required proof by competent evidence before the plaintiff would have been entitled to a verdict therefor.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by E. M. Jackson against B. M. Grant and others. A verdict and judgment for plaintiff was set aside, and defendants' default opened, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mallet & Bell, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error.

Robt. C. & Philip H. Alston, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. To the September term, 1920, an equitable petition was filed in the superior court of Fulton county, wherein Eula Maddox Jackson was the plaintiff, and Bryan M. Grant and Albert S. Adams and the Walraven Company were named defendants. Each of the defendants was duly served with process, and with an order of the court to show cause why the relief prayed for in the petition should not be granted. The defendants failed to file any appearance and failed to plead to the merits of the petition at the term to which the petition was returnable; and thereafter, to wit, on the 25th day of September, 1920, at the call of the appearance docket of the said court the entry "in default" was marked upon the docket by the judge. Thereafter, to wit, on the 6th day of December, 1920, the same being the trial term of Fulton superior court, and the case being in default, a verdict was rendered and a decree was taken pursuant thereto, granting to petitioner the relief prayed for in her petition. On the 22d day of December, 1920, the defendants filed a motion for a new trial, a motion in arrest of judgment, and a motion to open the default and set aside the verdict and judgment. All of these motions were returnable on the first Monday in January, 1921. These three motions came on to be heard; and the judge, on the 5th day of January, 1921, after argument and over objection of plaintiff's counsel, granted the motion for a new trial. To this ruling and order granting a new trial the plaintiff excepted. The court also granted the motion to open the default and set aside the verdict and judgment, and permitted the defendants to plead, demur and answer; and to the order of the court, sustaining this motion and permitting defendants to plead, the plaintiff excepted.

[1] 1. There was not such a showing made by the defendants in this case, upon the motion to set aside the verdict and judgment and to open the default, as authorized the judge to grant the application. As showing due diligence on the part of the defendants and as an excuse for their failure to plead in time, the defendants show that negotiations were opened with the plaintiff through her attorneys of record, looking to a settlement and adjustment of the case; but, after considering all the evidence as to the pending negotiations upon this subject, this court fails to find any definite statement of anything done or said by plaintiff that would cause or induce the defendants to neglect the filing of their plea and answer in time. Conceding that, in the motion made to set aside the verdict and judgment and to open the default, the defendants show that they had a meritorious defense to the action, nevertheless they do not show that their failure to file an answer embodying this defense was excusable. The entire showing upon the subject of their failure to file a plea or answer is, in substance, as follows: When the petition was served upon the Walraven Company, its president, one of the defendants, was notified, and he advised the company that he would look after the defense; and he did have a conference with another one of the individuals named as a defendant, and the latter said that he would consult with counsel. This was done, and counsel referred to a certain defect in the process, and advised that the suit could be won, but suggested a conference between the defendants and plaintiff's attorneys. Considerable time was required before the four parties could meet in conference, although a prompt effort was made by one of the defendants in behalf of all of the defendants for that purpose. Finally, some weeks after the service of the suit, a conference was had between the attorneys of the plaintiff, and the two individuals named as defendants; and the defendants stated, in the course of this interview, that they did not care to be involved in a lawsuit, and plaintiff's attorneys said that they did not wish to have the case go to trial. Thereupon propositions were made, and the defendant having these matters in charge says: "It was understood that said litigation would remain in abeyance pending negotiations." On November 4th, a letter was received by the defendants from the attorneys for the plaintiff, in which these attorneys stated that a representative of the plaintiff had written them stating that the plaintiff rejected the two propositions submitted by the defendants, but that he was "willing, as a final proposition," to settle, by voiding the lease at the expiration of the first five-year period and dropping any claims for damages or accounting, and requesting a reply at the defendants' earliest convenience as to whether they would consider this proposition. Some days after the receipt of this letter one of the defendants conducting the negotiations met one of the plaintiff's counsel, discussed the letter with him, and explained to him that the plaintiff's counterproposition was not acceptable; and the attorney thereupon asked the defendant to write him to that effect. According to this defendant's recollection, he stated that his reply would be transmitted "with a view to further negotiations." This letter was written on November 17th, as follows:

"Gentlemen: Replying to your letter of November 4th, in regard to the matter of Mrs. Eula M. Jackson v. The Walraven Co. et al., we are instructed by the parties at interest to advise you as follows: They deny any claims for damages or accounting of any sort as being due Mrs. Eula M. Jackson. They state that the proposition as made to you was an extremely liberal one, and is the only proposition that they have to make. They decline to agree to any voiding of the lease at the expiration of the first 5-year period, or to relinquish the option for an additional five years which they hold under same. Yours very truly." [Signed by the defendants.]

Above we have announced our opinion that there was nothing in these negotiations to induce or authorize the defendants to believe that there would be any postponement of the trial or the taking of a verdict and judgment in case of a failure to file their plea and answer; and consequently the judge hearing this motion was not authorized to adjudge that the failure to file the answer in time and as the law requires was excusable. Questions like this have been discussed and ruled upon in numerous cases, but it is not necessary to make lengthy quotations therefrom. Some of the cases are here cited. Moore v. Kelly & Jones Co., 109 Ga. 798, 35 S. E. 168; Kellam v. Todd, 114 Ga. 981, 41 S. E. 39; Murray v. Willoughby, 133 Ga. 514,

[2] 2. The ruling made in the second headnote requires no elaboration, in view of the explicit rulings made in other cases heretofore decided by this court. Langston v. Langston, 141 Ga. 675, 82 S. E. 36; Higgs v. Higgs, 144 Ga. 20, 85 S. E. 1041; Mitchell v. Allen, 110 Ga. 282, 34 S. E. 851. Other cases making pertinent rulings are referred to in the cases here cited.

KIGHT v. KIGHT. (No. 2512.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 21, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Divorce \Rightarrow 116—Letter from defendant, arranging meeting with woman, held admissible in connection with other evidence of cruelty.

Mrs. Olympia Kight brought suit for divorce and alimony against her husband, B. T. Kight, on the ground of cruel treatment, such cruel treatment consisting of abusive language and conduct toward petitioner in connection with the charge made against him of improper conduct with another woman, together with the charge that defendant did strike and beat petitioner. The defendant, denying cruel treatment on his part, charged plaintiff with cruelty, and that plaintiff had an ungovernable temper and was unreasonably and unjustifiably jealous of all females with whom the defendant had business transactions. The jury returned a verdict granting a divorce "between the parties" and alimony for the plaintiff, and also for one of the children which was awarded to her. The evidence was sharply conflicting. The plaintiff filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled, and she excepted. One ground of the motion for a new trial was based on the refusal of the court to admit in evidence a letter, admitted by the defendant to have been written by him, to a woman seeking to arrange a meeting with her—said letter being in substance to the effect that he [the defendant] had endeavored to find an opportunity to have a short talk with the addressee; that this seemed impossible; that he was obliged to see and have a talk with her before she should leave; that she must arrange an opportunity for this; that she might go by train to Adrian under the claim that she was going to visit "Hattie," but that if she was afraid of Hattie giving anything away she could go to Dublin; that he could pretend to have business away and go by automobile and meet her at the place agreed upon; that they could come back together; that no one would think anything of this as they could claim that the addressee of the letter intended coming back on the train, but just happened up with the writer, and came along to save railroad fare and in order to reach home earlier. There were other grounds of the motion for a new trial, but they need not be stated, inasmuch as they afford no reason for a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial. Held, that the letter was admissible in connection with other evidence of cruel treatment. The court erred in refusing to permit the same to be introduced in evidence.

ROBERTS v. JOHNSON et al. (No. 2503.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1922.)

1. Wills ¶68—Witnesses ¶159(8)—Plaintiff's testimony that he went to deceased's home pursuant to contract properly excluded, as involving "transaction with decedent"; evidence in action for breach of agreement to make will held irrelevant.

In an action against the executor of the will of a decedent to recover damages for a breach of an alleged parol contract by the decedent to execute a will in favor of the plaintiff, in consideration of services to be rendered by him, the plaintiff is not a competent witness to testify that he returned to the home of the decedent "pursuant to a contract" she entered into with him. Such testimony involved a transaction with the decedent within the meaning of Civ. Code 1910, § 5858.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Transaction.]

2. Wills ¶68—In action for breach of contract to make will, evidence as to what plaintiff could have made in similar lines of work irrelevant; evidence offered in action for breach of contract to make will properly excluded as irrelevant.

The court did not err in refusing to permit a witness to testify that, in his opinion, the plaintiff's services were worth so many dollars per annum, because the witness knew that plaintiff could have earned the sum stated "in similar lines" of work, and had declined offers of similar amounts during the period in question. The question to be determined was, What was the value of the particular service rendered by plaintiff to the deceased? The evidence offered was not relevant upon this question, nor did the court err in excluding other testimony complained of in the motion for new trial. All of the evidence excluded was irrelevant to any issue in the case.

3. Wills ¶66—In action for breach of contract to make will, plaintiff cannot recover on implied contract to pay for services.

The action being to recover damages for breach of an alleged express parol contract to make a will in the plaintiff's favor, and not for compensation as upon an implied contract to pay for services rendered, if the refusal of the decedent to comply with the contract was justified by the plaintiff's previous breach of the contract, he was not entitled to recover any amount as compensation for services rendered.

4. No error committed, and evidence sufficient.

There was no error harmful to the plaintiff from the charge complained of, nor did the court err in refusing the requests to charge, set forth in the motion for new trial. There was evidence to authorize the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; R. N. Hardeman, Judge.

Action by A. J. Roberts against Mrs. Sarah Spence, in which J. A. Johnson, executor, was made a party defendant. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. S. Bradley, of Swainsboro, for plaintiff in error.

J. Alex Smith & Son, of Swainsboro, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. A. J. Roberts sued Mrs. Sarah Spence, alleging that about the year 1909 the defendant made a contract with the plaintiff, by the terms of which he was to live with defendant, take charge of all her interests, and care for her during the balance of her life, in consideration of which defendant agreed to make a will giving all her property to plaintiff. The petition alleges plaintiff complied fully with his part of the contract; that defendant did make a will giving to plaintiff her property, but afterwards revoked it by executing another will in which the property was given to other persons. Pending the action Mrs. Spence died, and the executor named in the last will was made party defendant. The executor in his answer denied the execution of the contract, and the performance of services as alleged by the plaintiff, and averred that plaintiff had breached the contract himself, if any contract was ever made, by failing to take proper care of the testatrix, and that the plaintiff's conduct was such as to justify the testatrix in refusing to comply with the agreement, if it were made. On the trial a number of witnesses testified for each side. There was a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff's motion for new trial was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The plaintiff offered to testify that he went to live with his aunt, the testatrix, when a boy, some 25 years before the trial; that he lived there continuously after the death of her husband until the year 1907, when he left and followed other pursuits; that at the first of the year 1909 he returned to the home of the testatrix, and lived there continuously until the fall of the year 1917; that when he returned to the home of the testatrix in the year 1909 he returned there "pursuant to a contract" entered into with her. The court refused to admit this testimony, upon the ground that the witness was incompetent to testify to any transaction with the testatrix, she being dead, and her legal representative being a party to the case. The court was clearly right in this ruling. Manifestly the plaintiff could not testify that he returned to his aunt's home in 1909, "pursuant to a contract" entered into with her. This would be equivalent to permitting him to testify that he had a contract with the deceased, and would violate both the letter and spirit of the rule. Civil Code 1910, § 5858. The other portion of the evidence objected to was clearly irrelevant, and did not illustrate any issue in the case, and was properly excluded for that reason.

[2] 2. It is also complained that the court refused to permit a witness for plaintiff to testify that, in his opinion, the value of the services of the plaintiff under the contract which he claims to have entered into with his deceased aunt was from $800 to $1,000 per annum, because the witness knew that the plaintiff could have earned that much money "in similar lines" of work, and had declined offers of such amounts during the period in question. While it is competent for a witness to give his opinion as to the value of service of the nature claimed to have been performed by the plaintiff, and to give his reasons for such opinion, it was not permissible for this witness to state that the plaintiff could have earned a certain sum of money in similar lines of work elsewhere, and that he had declined offers of similar amounts during the period in question. The point at issue was, What were the particular services rendered by the plaintiff to his aunt worth during the period in which he claims the services were rendered? What he could have earned in similar lines of work elsewhere, and the fact that he had declined offers of similar amounts from other people, did not illustrate the value of the particular service rendered by him to his aunt.

It also complained that the court refused to permit another witness for the plaintiff to testify that Mrs. Spence had sold, in the fall of 1917, a tract of land for $400 which was actually worth $3,000. This evidence was entirely irrelevant, and threw no possible light on the question whether such a contract as the plaintiff claimed had been entered into, and, if so, what damages he had sustained by reason of its breach. The same is true of the ruling of the court excluding a power of attorney which Mrs. Spence had executed to

W. P. Ivey in 1917, giving him full authority to manage and control her business affairs. There was likewise no error in excluding the testimony referred to in the tenth ground of the motion, that a certain person had endeavored to procure a turpentine lease from Mrs. Spence, and she refused to lease it to him because he had previously taken up a fl. fa. against her, and had it levied on her land.

[3] 3. The charge complained of in the eleventh ground of the motion correctly stated the law applicable to the case, and the issues involved, and was no error for any reason assigned. One of the specific assignments of error upon this extract from the charge, which is quite lengthy, and need not be set out in full, is that the judge submitted to the jury the question whether or not the plaintiff had received sufficient compensation for services actually rendered by him up to the time of his discharge. It is insisted that there is no evidence in the record to show that the plaintiff received any compensation. We agree that the judge ought not to have submitted this issue to the jury, but not for the reason contended for by the plaintiff in error. The contract set out in the plaintiff's petition, and relied on by him, was that he would take care of his aunt and her property during her entire life, and that, if he complied with this agreement, she would, at her death give to him all of her property. The main and controlling question in the case is whether such a contract had been made, and, if made, whether the testatrix was liable in damages for its breach. The judge submitted to the jury clearly and distinctly the contentions of the plaintiff, and also the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff's conduct had been such as to justify Mrs. Spence in refusing to carry out her part of the contract. If the plaintiff violated his contract at any time before the death of Mrs. Spence, and neglected her and her business affairs, and mistreated her, as the jury were authorized to find from the evidence, he was not entitled in this action to recover anything for a breach of this contract. He sued expressly on the contract, and not for compensation as upon an implied contract to pay for services rendered by him. Therefore his right to recover anything depended absolutely upon his proving that the contract alleged in his petition was made, and that Mrs. Spence wrongfully refused to carry it out. What has just been said makes it apparent that the court committed no error in refusing the requests to charge, set forth in the twelfth and thirteenth grounds of the motion.

[4] 4. The evidence fully authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

YOUNG v. COVINGTON CO. et al.
(No. 2530.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 20, 1922.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. Sufficiency of evidence.

The finding of the court, to whom the case was submitted without the intervention of a jury, upon the issue of fact involved, was not without evidence to support it.

2. Judgment \S 853(4)—Did not become dormant when execution entered on the only docket kept by the clerk of the superior court.

While, under the law prescribing what is necessary to prevent the dormancy of judgments, as it existed at the time the judgment under consideration was rendered, the clerk of the superior court should have kept both an execution docket of the superior court and a general execution docket, and should have made an entry of the fi. fa. upon the execution docket of the superior court, nevertheless, where he kept but one docket, upon which he made entries of executions, that was, to that extent, the execution docket of the superior court, and proper entries upon it would prevent the dormancy of a judgment upon which the execution thus entered was issued.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; P. W. Meldrim, Judge.

Garnishment by the Covington Company and others against J. K. Young. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Travis & Travis, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error.

D. W. Krauss, of Brunswick, and D. S. Atkinson and Hitch, Denmark & Lovett, all of Savannah, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. On March 14, 1905, Covington Company recovered, in Camden superior court, a judgment for $232.88 against J. K. Young. Upon this judgment an execution was issued, at the direction of the attorney for the plaintiff, for $532.88, on March 8, 1912, and was entered upon the execution docket. On April 1, 1918, an entry of nulla bona was made upon the execution, and entry thereof was made upon the same execution docket. In 1920 garnishment upon the judgment of 1905 was issued, returnable to the superior court of Chatham county, and the garnishees answered, showing indebtedness, but alleged that the judgment was for much less than the amount claimed in the garnishment affidavit, and that the judgment was dormant and unenforceable.

J. K. Young filed his equitable petition, praying that he might be allowed to intervene, and for injunction against the plaintiff. He also set up, as did the garnishees, that the judgment was for only $232.88; that when the judgment was entered on March 14, 1905, an execution was at once issued and entered on the general execution docket; that the execution issued in 1912 was a mere copy of the former, being issued without any proper order; that the only valid execution had been issued in 1905, and that the judgment was therefore dormant. The plaintiff admitted that only $232.88 was due upon the execution, and that the amount for which it was actually issued was a mistake. There was no controversy as to the mistake, and as to the actual amount being $232.88.

The case was submitted to the judge without the intervention of a jury, and he rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the judgment as correctly stated. The intervener excepted, insisting that the only valid execution was the one alleged by him to have been issued in 1905, and that the execution issued in 1912 was not valid, but that in either case the judgment was dormant.

[1] 1. Under the evidence the judge to whom the case was submitted was authorized to find that the only valid execution which had been issued upon the judgment rendered March 14, 1905, was the execution dated March 8, 1912.

[2] 2. The judgment upon which the execution was based was not dormant. This judgment was rendered in 1905, and under the law as it stood then it was necessary that the entries of the execution and the entries upon the execution intended to prevent dormancy should be made upon the execution docket of the superior court, that being the court which rendered the judgment, and the testimony of the clerk of the court is that the execution was entered upon the general execution docket. If there had been an execution docket of the superior court, kept separately, as the law contemplated, and a general execution docket, the entry upon the general execution docket of the fi. fa. and the entries thereon would not have been sufficient to prevent the dormancy of the judgment. But the clerk, while testifying that these entries were made upon the general execution docket, also testified that he kept no other execution docket; his testimony upon this subject being in the following language:

"The execution docket, on which the execution of March, 1912, and entries of nulla bona were recorded, was the only execution docket kept for the superior court of Camden county up to 8 years ago, and when the nulla bona entries were made. There has been no other execution docket of this court for the past 20 years."

In 1905 the clerk of the superior court was required to keep an execution docket of that court, and also a general execution docket; but we are of the opinion that, where he kept only one execution docket, making the entries appropriate to both the execution docket of the superior court and the general execution docket, the entries made upon the docket which he kept, and which would have been sufficient, if made upon an execution docket of the superior court, separately and properly kept, would have the effect of preventing the dormancy of the judgment upon which the execution was issued.

Judgment affirmed.

MIXON v. SAVANNAH & A. RY.
(No. 2653.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Railroads §95(1)—Statutory duty applicable to excavation crossing highway.

The provisions of section 2673 of the Civil Code of 1910 "apply to a railroad company where the public road is crossed only by an excavation made for the purpose of laying therein, across such public road, a railroad track of the company, and before any railroad track has been laid and before the work of constructing the railroad is completed across such public road."

Certified question from Court of Appeals.

Action between J. K. Mixon and the Savannah & Atlanta Railway. Judgment for the latter, and the former brought error to the Court of Appeals, which certified a question to the Supreme Court. Question answered.

W. L. Phillips, W. T. Revell, and Frank Hardeman, all of Louisville, for plaintiff in error.

Hitch & Denmark, of Savannah, and Phillips & Abbot, of Louisville, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The Court of Appeals desires instruction from the Supreme Court on the following question involved in this case:

"Section 2673, Civil Code 1910, reads as follows: 'All railroad companies shall keep in good order, at their expense, the public roads or private ways established pursuant to law, where crossed by their several roads, and build suitable bridges and make proper excavations or embankments, according to the spirit of the road laws.' See Ga. Laws 1888, p. 216; Cobb's Digest, 955. Do the provisions of this section apply to a railroad company where the public road is crossed only by an excavation made for the purpose of laying therein, across such public road, a railroad track of the company, and before any railroad track has been laid, and before the work of constructing the railroad is completed across such public road?"

While the question asked by the Court of Appeals does not expressly assert that the excavation was made by the railroad company, or by one as agent for the company, yet we are of the opinion that, properly construed, the question means that the excavation was made by the railroad company itself, or some one authorized to do so for it; and the question will be answered on that assumption. See, in this connection, Civil Code 1910, § 4415 (4); Atlanta, etc., R. Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, 167 (4), 13 S. E. 277, 27 Am. St. Rep. 231.

The section of the Code under consideration was codified from the act of 1888 (Acts 1888, p. 216). By reference to that act it will be observed that the caption is as follows:

"An act to amend the road laws of this state, so far as to cause to be kept in good repair all places where any railroad which now is or may hereafter be chartered, crosses or may cross, any public highway in this state."

The first section of the act provides that—

"It shall be the duty of all railroad companies, which now are or may hereafter be incorporated, * * * to put and keep in good traveling order and repair, the public roads, at such point or points where the same may be crossed by their respective railroads," etc.

It seems, therefore, both from the caption and the body of the act, that the purpose of the legislation was "to put and keep in good travelling order and repair the public roads, at such point or points where the same may be crossed by their respective railroads." Nothing is said in the act or in the caption thereof with reference to the actual running of trains or laying of rails before the public roads should be kept in good order.

In the case of Cleveland v. City Council of Augusta, 102 Ga. 233, 29 S. E. 584, 43 L. R. A. 638, the exact statute here under review was considered and commented on in the well-considered opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Little in that case, though the exact question involved in that case was different from the one under review. Among other cases cited by the learned Justice in that case with approval was Boston & M. R. Co. v. County Com'rs, 79 Me. 386, 10 Atl. 113, where it was stated that the Supreme Court of Maine, in passing upon the constitutionality of a statute similar in character to the one under review, said:

"The purpose of this statute was evidently to promote the safety of travelers both upon the railroad and the county way," etc.

And in the case of Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. City of Chicago, 140 Ill. 309, 29 N. E. 1109, the Supreme Court of Illinois says:

"The requirement embodied in section 8, that railroad companies shall construct and maintain the highway and street crossings and the approaches thereto within their respective rights of way, is nothing more than a police regulation. It is proper that the portion of the street or highway which is within the limits of the railroad right of way should be constructed by the railroad company, and maintained by it, because of the dangers attending the operation of its road. It should control the making and repairing [italics ours] of the crossings for the protection of those passing along the street and of those riding on the cars."

In the Cleveland Case, supra, it is said that—

"Statutes requiring railroad companies to make proper crossings are founded on the most obvious principles of equity and justice. By laying its ties and rails and making its grade, the railroad renders a crossing necessary where no such necessity would otherwise exist. It is but requiring the railroad to so operate its property as not to injure the public in its property or otherwise."

In the case of Palatka, etc., R. Co. v. State, 23 Fla. 546, 3 South. 158, 11 Am. St. Rep. 395, it was held that—

"A grant of power to a railroad company to make a new road or open a new way across an existing highway, in the absence of an express provision to the contrary, leaves the railroad company under obligation to leave every highway it crosses in a safe condition for the use of the public, and to cause as little injury as possible to the old highway."

In 22 R. C. L. 887, § 134, the rule is laid down as follows:

"A grant to a railroad company of the right to construct its road along, upon, or across, or to use, an existing highway, in the absence of express words to the contrary, is not to be construed as a power to destroy such highway. It cannot so construct the road as to block the highway, so that it cannot be used by the public, and while trains are not passing over it, or the company is not otherwise properly using the track. * * * The principle that one who unlawfully interferes with a highway creates a nuisance and is liable in damages to one who suffers a special injury applies to a railroad company which, though authorized to construct its road along or across a street or highway, exceeds its authority or fails to exercise a proper degree of care in such construction. * * * A railroad so constructing its road at a crossing of a highway as to make it dangerous to travelers is liable for an injury occasioned thereby."

From the foregoing authorities, and others which might be cited to the same effect, a railroad company operating under its charter with the right of eminent domain has no more right to make an excavation across a public highway before it begins the operation of its trains, and to leave the excavation in an open, exposed, and dangerous condition for the public who traverse the public highway, than it would have to do so after the road is completed and the trains are in operation on said railroad and over said crossing. The manifest purpose of the Legislature was to protect the traveling public while passing over the highways of the state against the negligence and carelessness of a railroad company both before and after the operation of its trains, but while exercising the powers under the charter which had been granted by the Legislature. The road laws provide that the crossings shall be kept in a safe condition, safe to the traveling public over the highways of the state; and this is so regardless of whether trains are being operated over the road or not.

From the foregoing we conclude that the question propounded by the Court of Appeals should be answered in the affirmative.

All the Justices concur.

ENGLISH et al. v. ROSENKRANTZ.
(No. 2486.)

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Corporations ~~§~~ 284—Agreement placing voting power in hands of one person and providing for election of salaried officers held contrary to public policy and void.

An agreement between members of one faction holding a majority of the capital stock of a private corporation organized under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 2823, whereby such members relinquish their right individually to vote their stock in the corporation according to the judgment of each individual, and contract that the voting power shall rest unqualifiedly and absolutely in one of such members, to the exclusion of the others, for a long period of time, and that during such time certain of the members shall hold salaried offices, whether or not it be for the best interest of the corporation and all its stockholders that the persons designated as officers should be elected and kept in office, or that the specified salaries be paid, and whereby persons holding a minority of the stock of the corporation who are not parties to the agreement may be excluded from participating in the management and control of the corporation, or holding any of such salaried offices during the term of the agreement, is against public policy, and therefore void. Applying the principle stated, it was error to overrule the demurrer to the petition as amended.

2. No error in ruling on cross-bill.

The assignment of error in the cross-bill of exceptions is without merit.

Certiorari from Court of Appeals.

Action by Reble Rosenkrantz against J. W. English and others. A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Appeals (26 Ga. App. 234, 105 S. E. 729) on defendants' bill of exceptions and plaintiffs' cross-bill, and defendants bring certiorari.

Reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

On the 16th day of April, 1918, Mrs. Reble Rosenkrantz instituted an action against James W. English, Sr., Harry L. English individually and as administrator of the estate of James W. English, Jr., deceased, James D. Robinson, Emily English Robinson, Jennie English Kiser, and John K. Ottley. The action was to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. The defendants filed general and special demurrers to the petition. Certain amendments to the petition were allowed, after which the demurrers were renewed. The court sustained a special demurrer to paragraph 10, and, with that paragraph stricken from the petition, overruled the demurrers upon all other grounds. The defendants excepted to so much of the judgment as overruled the demurrers; and the plaintiff filed a cross-bill of exceptions, assigning error on that part of the judgment which struck paragraph 10 of the petition. On review the Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment of the trial court on both bills of exceptions. The case comes to the Supreme Court by writ of certiorari, assigning error on the judgment rendered by the Court of Appeals. 26 Ga. App. 234, 105 S. E. 729.

It is to be gathered from the allegations of the petition as amended that James W. English, Sr., was the father of each of the other defendants, except James D. Robinson who was his son-in-law, and John K. Ottley, who was his close associate in business. The opinion of the Court of Appeals contains a statement of the substance of the petition and demurrers, which, with some change of expression and a substitution of a copy of the contract alleged to have been breached in lieu of a statement of its contents, is as follows: In the year 1885 petitioner's father, W. B. Lowe, Sr., associated with defendant James W. English, Sr., and others, organized the Chattahoochee Brick Company, a corporation engaged in general contract work and the manufacture and sale of brick. Its capital stock was 2,000 shares ($200,000) of a par value of $100 each. W. B. Lowe, Sr., died in 1900, leaving a will, and at the time of his death the stock was held as follows: The Lowe estate, 807 shares; James W. English, Sr., 813 shares; A. B. Steele, 380 shares. The Lowe estate was controlled by the executors appointed in the will, namely, his widow, Rebecca D. Lowe, his son, W. B. Lowe, Jr., and the petitioner. The petitioner had intermarried with James W. English, Jr., a son of James W. English, Sr., in 1896, and at the time of the death of W. B. Lowe, Sr., petitioner was the daughter-in-law of James W. English, Sr.; her married name being Reble Lowe English. She and her coexecutors differed as to the voting of the Lowe stock. The other two were opposed to the management of the company by the Englishes, and were unwilling to re-elect James W. English, Sr., as its president. Petitioner offered to vote one-third of the Lowe stock for him, but was advised that she could not, and that the other executors, being a majority, could vote the stock. The Lowe stock with Steele's stock was a clear majority. Steele encouraged Mrs. Lowe to stand for the office of president, and she was favorable considering the suggestion. In such circumstances the petitioner's then husband, James W. English, Jr., had an interview with Steele and made a contract in the name of James W. English, Sr., to purchase the Steele stock. This was done in pursuance of an agreement between James W. English, Sr., and James W. English, Jr., that the purchase should be in the Senior's name, but that petitioner should receive one-third of the Steele shares, James W. English, Jr., one-third, and James W. English, Sr., one-third. Petitioner's attitude had estranged her from her own family, and her relations with her husband's family were then close and friendly. After the purchase James W. English, Sr., refused to recognize the agreement mentioned above, and insisted on having for himself 220 shares of the stock acquired from Steele. This would give him 1,033 shares, being a majority of the total stock of the corporation in his own name. Of the remaining 160 shares the petitioner was allotted 80, and James W. English, Jr., 80. James W. English, Jr., for himself and his wife, the petitioner, protested against this arrangement, but their consent was finally obtained upon an agreement that the parties should enter into a contract which would fix the rights of the parties and protect them against the power of the majority of the stock, which thus went to James W. English, Sr. Under such circumstances James W. English, Jr., and petitioner entered into the contract which will presently be stated. After so obtaining such majority of the stock, James W. English, Sr., for reasons of his own, caused 7 shares of his total of 1,033 shares to be apportioned, one share each among members of his family, and one share to John K. Ottley. The names of the persons taking under such apportionment appear in the contract hereinafter set out, one of them being Edward English, the share going to him being taken in the name of John K. Ottley as his trustee. All of the other persons taking under such apportionment were parties to the contract; and all were made parties defendant to this action, except Edward English or John K. Ottley, as his trustee. On the 11th day of July, 1900, all of the stock of the corporation being held by the Lowe estate and by James W. English, Sr., and the members of his family and John K. Ottley, as hereinbefore stated, a written contract was entered into by all the persons owning all the stock of the corporation, except that held by the executors of W. B. Lowe, deceased. The executors of the Lowe estate, holding 807 shares (a minority of the entire capital stock of the corporation), did not enter into the contract. A copy of the contract was attached to the petition as an exhibit and was as follows:

"Whereas, James W. English is the owner of 1,026 shares of the capital stock of the Chattahoochee Brick Company, a corporation duly chartered and incorporated under the laws of said state, with its principal office in the city of Atlanta, state and county aforesaid, the said named shares being a majority of the capital stock of said company;

"And whereas, the following named persons are each the owners of the numbers of shares only of the capital stock of said company which is set opposite their names in the schedule below, they being therefore minority stockholders in the said corporation (the said Rebecca Lowe English, whose name appears in said schedule, being, in addition to the number of shares therein stated, likewise interested in the stock owned by the estate of W. B. Lowe, late of said county, deceased), that is to say, names of stockholders: James W. English, 1,026 shares; J. W. English, Jr., 80 shares; Rebie Lowe English, 80 shares; Emily A. English, 1 share; Emily English Robinson, 1 share; Harry L. English, 1 share; Jennie English, 1 share; James D. Robinson, 1 share; John K. Otley, 1 share; John K. Otley, as trustee for Edward English, 1 share;

"And whereas, the said shareholders above named are each of the opinion that the interests of the aforesaid corporation as well as their own, and the interests of all other stockholders who may be interested in said corporation, require unity of action on the part of the said shareholders above named in the matter of the conduct of the affairs of the said corporation, in order to insure the continuance of the wise, conservative, honest, and economical management of the affairs of said corporation, such as has characterized its management in the past, and in order to prevent said corporation from being in any manner exposed to the manipulations and devices of stock speculators and corporation wreckers;

"And whereas, it is believed by the shareholders above named that such unanimity of action and such protection of their respective interests and the interests of the other shareholders in the said corporation can be best assured by the manner and means herein provided:

"It is therefore, in consideration of the premises herein and in consideration of the advantages which will herefrom result to the stockholders generally, as well as for and in consideration of the special advantages which will result to the corporation itself and as well to the said shareholders, it is hereby mutually agreed between the said shareholders, each with the other, that until the 22d day of June, 1945, unless the said several parties hereto shall sooner in writing mutually otherwise agree, that said stock that is now held, or any of the said stock of said company which may hereafter be bought or acquired by any or either of the said several parties hereto, shall at all corporate meetings of said corporation be voted as a unit, and to that end the said owners of the several shares of stock herein mentioned do by these presents hereby constitute and irrevocably appoint James W. English, and his successors as herein provided, to be their lawful agent and attorney for them and in their several names to vote said shares of stock at all corporate meetings of the stockholders of said corporation, subject only to the conditions and limitations hereinafter expressed.

"Should the said James W. English depart this life prior to the expiration of this agreement, or otherwise become unable to discharge the duties herein imposed upon him as such agent and attorney, then and in that event it is agreed that such agency shall devolve upon his heirs, together with Rebie Lowe English, and they jointly are authorized to represent the said shareholders and vote said stock in all respects as though the same had been done by James W. English. In the event a disagreement should arise among the heirs of James W. English, together with Rebie Lowe English, as to how said stock shall be voted touching any business of the corporation which shall require a vote of the stockholders, then and in that event the minority and majority of the persons constituting the heirs at law of James W. English and Rebie Lowe English shall each select a disinterested person to whom the difference of opinion among the aforesaid parties shall be submitted; and, if these two parties so selected shall fail to agree, they shall select a third disinterested party, and they three shall pass upon the differences of opinion as submitted and decide the questions at issue, and their decision shall be final. The limitations and conditions above referred to and herein expressed are as follows:

"First. During the lifetime of the said James W. English said stock shall be voted by him annually for such one of the shareholders of the said company as he may designate for the office of president thereof. In the event of his death the said stock shall be by his successors, as hereinbefore provided, annually voted for James W. English, Jr., as the president of said company. And, should the said James W. English, Jr., die before the time limited for the expiration of this agreement, then the said stock shall thereafter be annually voted for Harry L. English as the president of said company. During the lifetime of James W. English the said stock shall be voted for James W. English, Jr., as the vice president of said corporation; and, should the said James W. English, Jr., in the meantime, depart this life, then the said stock shall be voted for Rebie Lowe English, his wife, as vice president of the said company.

"If under the provisions of this agreement as hereinabove stated James W. English, Jr., shall be chosen to be president of said company, then thereafter, during the life of the said James W. English, Jr., the said Harry L. English shall be elected vice president of said company. In the event the said James W. English, Jr., and the said Harry L. English should each depart this life during the continuance of this agreement, then the said shares of stock shall be voted in the election of president of said corporation for such person, being a stockholder of said corporation, as may be designated by the heirs at law of the said James W. English. And, should a disagreement arise between the said heirs at law as to the person to be elected president, then those of the heirs at law of the said James W. English owning a majority of the said mentioned stock and those of the heirs at law of the said James W. English owning a minority of the said mentioned stock shall each select a person who shall designate from those owning stock in the company a person to be elected president. Should those two persons so elected disagree as to whom should be elected president, then and in that event they shall select a third person to act as umpire; and the majority of the three persons so named are hereby authorized and empowered to cast the votes of the said stock for such person as they may designate for the office of president.

"It is further mutually understood and agreed by all the parties to this agreement that, in the event of the death of James W. English, Jr., the authority hereinabove conferred upon James W. English and his successors as herein provided to cast the vote of said stock shall be, and is hereby, vested in Rebekah Lowe English alone, in so far as the same shall relate to the election of a vice president of said corporation; and, should the said Rebekah Lowe English so desire, she is hereby authorized and empowered, and upon her to that extent all necessary authority is conferred, to cast the vote of the entire aforesaid stock owned or held by the aforesaid parties now, or which they may hereafter own or acquire, annually for such stockholder in said company as she may designate for the office of vice president of said company; and this authority is especially conferred to the end that she may, if she sees proper, vote the entire aforesaid stock for herself for the office of vice president annually during the continuance of this agreement, if she should so long desire, it being now and here admitted that she is, in the opinion of each of the parties hereto, in all respects well qualified and fully competent to discharge the duties of said office.

"Second. It is mutually agreed and understood between the parties hereto that, in the event of the death of Rebekah Lowe English, the stock owned or held by her in said corporation may, on demand, be delivered to her heirs at law, provided such heirs at law be persons other than James W. English, Jr., or the descendants of the said James W. English, Jr., and Rebekah Lowe English. In the event the said heirs be other than the said James W. English, Jr., or the descendants aforesaid, all relations between the said Rebekah Lowe English, as well as those of her heirs at law, shall cease and determine between herself and the other parties to this agreement, and her said stock and any stock to which she would have been entitled shall be withdrawn from the operation hereof and delivered to the representatives of her estate.

"Third. In the event of the death of the said James W. English, the said shares of stock shall be voted as to authorize, by a change of the by-laws, an increase of the number of directors to eight or more, and in such manner as to authorize the election of an attorney to represent the said corporation, if such an officer should be deemed necessary. In the event of the death or disability of any director, said number shall be diminished in like manner. And whereas in the event named, that is to say, the death of James W. English, the said persons whose names are hereinafter immediately written will in all probability then be more largely interested in the stock of said company, and whereas they do by these presents pledge themselves to co-operate each with the other in furthering the interests of said corporation, it is hereby agreed that the below named persons shall be annually elected directors of said corporation, if in life and they be then mentally competent to discharge the duties of the office, that is to say, Emily A. English, James W. English, Jr., Emily English Robinson, or her husband, J. D. Robinson, as they may decide, Harry L. English, Rebekah Lowe English, Jennie English, and John K. Ottley, who shall be annually elected until such time as Edward English shall attain his majority, at which time he, the said Edward English, may, if competent to discharge the duties of the office, be elected to succeed John K. Ottley as a director and be annually thereafter so elected.

"Fourth. The said shares of stock shall be voted in such a manner as to authorize the payment to the president and vice president of a salary of two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars per month, which salary shall be paid monthly on the 20th day of each month out of the net earnings of the said company after the payment of all current bills for the month preceding, which bills shall be paid on or before the 15th thence immediately preceding, and the said named salaries shall not otherwise be paid, and money shall not be borrowed for the purpose of paying salaries, nor shall they be increased during the continuance of this contract. Said stock shall not be voted during the continuance of this contract so as to authorize the creation for said corporation of any new salaried offices without the unanimous consent in writing of all the parties hereto, and then only when the interests of said corporation shall seem so to require, nor shall it without such consent be voted in such manner as to authorize the sale or incumbrance of the corporate business or franchises or an increase of the capital stock of said corporation. Said stock shall under no circumstances be voted in such manner as to render any shareholder in said corporation ineligible to election as director or officer therein, the rights of all shareholders being equal and entitled to be respected.

"Fifth. It is further agreed that during the continuance of this agreement neither of the shareholders herein mentioned will sell, hypothecate, transfer, or assign their said shares of stock or any part thereof or any which they or either of them may hereafter acquire, to any person other than one of the parties hereto, without first having given to each of the other parties hereto a fair opportunity to purchase said stock or such portion thereof as they might desire at its then market value; and, if disagreement shall arise between the person offering to sell and the person proposing to buy as to what is the market value of said stock, such disagreement shall be submitted to the appraisal of three disinterested persons, one to be selected by each of the parties disagreeing and a third by the two persons so chosen, and the appraisement of the three persons so chosen shall between said persons be conclusive as to the market value of said stock, and that all such shares of stock as may be hereafter owned or acquired by any of the parties to this agreement in addition to those now covered by this agreement shall be immediately merged with the other shares herein stated, and the agency herein created shall without further agreement extend to and cover said shares. In the event said stock or any part thereof shall be sold to any person not a party to this agreement, the same shall be herefrom immediately withdrawn, and the purchaser thereof shall not in any wise become a party to this agreement or entitled to any voice in the control of the stock covered hereby remaining in the hands of the parties hereto. It is further agreed that upon each certificate of stock issued to or held by the parties to this agreement there shall be indorsed thereon the following words: 'Within shares of stock are held subject to a contract and agreement executed in quadruplicate on the 11th day of July, 1900, by and between James W. English, James W. English, Jr., Emily A. English, Rebekah Lowe English, Emily English Robinson, J. D. Robinson, Harry L. English, Jennie English, John K. Ottley, and John K. Ottley as trustee for Edward English.'

"The said shares of stock shall be deposited with James W. English as trustee, who shall issue to each of the parties hereto a certificate setting forth that the entire number of shares of stock so deposited are held by said trustee subject to the joint instructions only of the said several parties hereto and to such instructions to be given as herein provided only; that the same cannot be withdrawn, sold, hypothecated, transferred, or assigned to any person not a party hereto, except with the unanimous consent in writing of the other parties hereto. And each of the parties hereto and their heirs are authorized to draw in person from said company such dividends as may accrue to him or her by reason of the shares of stock that such person may now own or may hereafter acquire. In the event of the death of James W. English, trustee, his successor in such trust shall be appointed by the remainder of the parties to this agreement who may be then in life; and in the event of a disagreement among the said parties as to the person to be chosen as trustee, a majority of them shall have authority to name the trustee. And the said trustee so named shall enter upon and assume all the duties and responsibilities imposed upon the said James W. English as trustee.

"This agreement may be changed or amended only in the following manner: During the lifetime of James W. English it may be changed and amended in any respect by and with the consent in writing of James W. English, James W. English, Jr., and Rebekah Lowe English; and in the event of the death of James W. English it may be changed or amended with the written consent of all the parties hereto, except in so far as the same makes provision for the payments of salaries for the president and vice president, and except in so far as the same provides against the sale and incumbrance of the corporate business or franchises and the increase of the capital stock of the said corporation, and with respect to these matters the said agreement shall not be changed, nor shall said stock be voted in such manner as to authorize any conduct contrary to those provisions of this contract during the term fixed for its continuance.

"Should any disagreement arise at any time among the parties hereto touching the meaning of this agreement or any clause thereof, then such disagreement shall be submitted in writing to three disinterested parties, who shall interpret said agreement with respect to the matter then in question, and their decision as to its intent and meaning shall be final. Said disinterested parties to whom the matter of such disagreement shall be referred shall be selected as follows: The minority and majority of the parties hereto shall each select a man; and if they fail to agree, the two so selected shall select a third man, and the decision of the majority of the board so chosen shall be final.

"In witness of all of which the parties hereto have each interchangeably set their hands and seals on this the 11th day of July, 1900."

The foregoing instrument was signed by each of the persons who are named as parties to the contract. At the time of execution of the contract petitioner, as a legatee under the will of W. B. Lowe, Sr., had title to an undivided one-third interest in the shares held by the Lowe estate; and on April 6, 1903, she became the sole holder of the legal title to all of the Lowe shares of stock, and remained such owner thenceforward; and the defendants knew of such ownership at the time of the alleged breach of the contract. James W. English, Jr., died in 1914. Prior to his death the petitioner had been granted a total divorce from him, and had intermarried with her present husband, Baron Marcus Rosenkrantz. Upon the death of James W. English, Jr., petitioner became entitled, under the above-quoted contract, to vote all the stock covered by the contract for the vice president, and could vote it for herself unless she chose to designate some one else. During the entire time up to the death of James W. English, Jr., James W. English, Sr., continued to exercise powers under the contract and to carry it out. As late as November 16, 1912, which was after petitioner's divorce from James W. English, Jr., and her marriage with her present husband, James W. English, Sr., wrote petitioner a letter referring to the contract, and stating: "I signed it and expect to live by it, as I do by all contracts I make." At a stockholders' meeting held July 2, 1914, petitioner, who had become sole executrix of the estate of William B. Lowe, Sr., in which name the 807 shares of Lowe stock stood, was represented by her husband, Baron Marcus Rosenkrantz, by proxy. At that meeting a resolution was offered providing that the officers of the company should be named and thereafter be elected by the board of directors, and their compensation be fixed by said board. Petitioner's husband offered as an amendment a resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Bidwell, representing one share of stock, that the above contract of July 11, 1900, be filed with the board, and that they should vote in accordance therewith for the officers named therein. This amendment was defeated by the vote of all shares except those voted by Baron Rosenkrantz; and the original resolution, without amendment, was carried by the same vote. Afterwards the petitioner attended the annual meeting of stockholders of the corporation, held on January 24, 1916, at which she proposed, under the terms of the contract, to cast the vote therein mentioned for herself as vice president, together with the shares of stock known as those of the W. B. Lowe estate; and she announced, by a written statement, that she did thus cast such shares for herself, the same constituting the entire capital stock of the company. At a meeting of the board of directors held immediately after the stockholders' meeting, that body ignored the action of petitioner and elected James W. English, Sr., as president and his son, Harry L. English, as vice president, all directors voting for the said Harry L. English as vice president except the petitioner, she stating that she claimed to have elected herself vice president of the company at the stockholders' meeting, and hence voted "No." Harry L. English was declared elected vice president. It was alleged that this action was in violation of petitioner's rights under the contract; that petitioner had been deprived of a salary of $250 per month, or $3,000 a year, attached to the office, which salary has been paid, since the inception of the agreement of July, 1900, to the persons recognized as vice president; that the defendants have expressly repudiated the contract and denied that it has any force or effect and petitioner is therefore entitled to sue for damages for the breach of the entire contract for the full term thereof; that the contract vests in her the right to receive the salary of $3,000 per year until and through the year 1945; and she asks damages in the sum of $100,000.

The grounds of demurrer to the petition were: (a) That the petition shows no cause of action and no right of recovery; (b) that the contract, Exhibit A, was illegal and void and contrary to public policy; (c) that there was no consideration for the contract, and it was nudum pactum; (d) that the petitioner, having remarried, was not entitled to the office, benefits, or emoluments of the contract, even if it was originally valid. After stating the facts, the division of the Court of Appeals having the case for decision rendered the following opinion, in which two of the judges concurred:

"The court did not err in any of its rulings on the pleadings. The petition set out a cause of action. The Chattahoochee Brick Company, referred to in the contract declared on, is a private business corporation which has no functions of a public character. The contract is based upon a sufficient consideration, is not void as being contrary to public policy, and is a valid contract binding upon the parties thereto; and the petitioner did not lose any of her rights under the contract by reason of her divorce and subsequent remarriage, nor by the death of her first husband, James W. English, Jr."

The other judge dissenting stated:

"I cannot concur with the conclusion reached by the majority of the court. See Morel v. Hoge, 130 Ga. 625, 61 S. E. 487, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1136, 14 Ann. Cas. 935."

Brewster, Howell & Heyman and Mark Bolding, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error.

V. A. Batchelor and Spalding, MacDougald & Sibley, all of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The action is for damages for alleged breach of the contract set forth at length in the statement of facts, by preventing the plaintiff as a stockholder from voting all of the stock of the corporation for herself as vice president under provisions of the contract, and thereby depriving her of stipulated salaries pertaining to the office. The action was instituted after the decision of this court in Rosenkrantz v. Chattahoochee Brick Co., 147 Ga. 730, 95 S. E. 225, being a suit for specific performance, in which the judgment of the trial court dismissing the petition on general demurrer was affirmed. A controlling question is whether the contract is void on the ground that it is contrary to public policy. Prior to the purchase of the Steele stock, which was arrayed against James W. English, Sr., the latter did not have a majority of the stock of the corporation. After acquisition of the Steele stock English and his family, including the plaintiff, who for convenience may be called the English faction, had a majority of the stock, which enabled them to dominate the corporation, while the Lowe estate, who for convenience may be called the Lowe faction, had a substantial minority amounting to more than one-third of the total stock of the corporation. While the plaintiff owned an undivided interest in the stock held by the Lowe faction, she allied herself with the fortunes of the English faction, and was a party to the written pooling contract of date July 11, 1900. By the terms of this contract all of the stock held by the English faction was pooled for voting purposes, so that one person might exercise the voting power for all of the stock, whether or not its business was being operated wisely and to the best interest of the corporation or the stockholders as a whole. The contract was irrevocable and unchangeable, except upon mutual consent of all the parties thereto. The corporation was organized in 1895, under the provisions of the statute which is now found in Civil Code, § 2823, and its period of existence fixed by statute was 20 years from the date of the charter subject to renewal. Under the provisions of the contract salaries to be paid out of net earning of the corporation were provided for the president and vice president, not to exceed $250 per month respectively; and the right to hold such offices in the corporation was confined to members of the English faction, and should exist during the full term of the contract, which was 45 years from its date, being more than twice the term of the life of the corporation. The order in which different members of the English faction should become entitled to hold the offices of president and vice president was provided for on the basis of survivorship of James W. English, Sr., James W. English, Jr., Harry L. English, and the plaintiff, during the period of the contract. The plaintiff should become entitled to the office of vice president on the death of her husband, James W. English, Jr. Salaried offices above mentioned were to be held as above indicated, irrespective of whether or not it would be to the best interest of the corporation and the stockholders as a whole to have such persons hold the offices or to pay the salaries attached thereto. While the salaries were payable out of net income, if the net income should not be more than sufficient to pay the specified salaries, it would be possible to consume the whole of the net income in paying salaries, thus leaving nothing to be paid as dividends upon any of the stock in the corporation. Under such circumstances the holders of the majority stock who were not president or vice president, and of course the minority stock held by the Lowe faction, which was outside the contract, would be under a great disadvantage. The plaintiff allied herself with the English faction, and indirectly through her husband, and directly as a prospective vice president herself, had peculiar advantages under the contract in which her co-owners of the Lowe stock did not share. They could have no voice in the management or policy of the corporation during the whole term of the contract, whether or not the faction in control wisely and successfully conducted the business of the corporation. In such circumstances the tendency of the contract was to depress the value of the Lowe stock while in the hands of Mrs. Lowe and W. B. Lowe, Jr., and cause it to gravitate towards the plaintiff or other members of the English faction, parties to the contract, who might be willing to buy at some reduced price. In the circumstances, while the facts differ somewhat from those involved in Morel v. Hoge, 130 Ga. 625, 61 S. E. 487, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1136, 14 Ann. Cas. 935, the principles there ruled are applicable and controlling. In that case all of the stock of the corporation was represented in a contract, which in effect gave one faction of stockholders the right to permanently elect a majority of the directors, and thus render it possible for a minority of the stockholders in the corporation to control the policies and affairs of the corporation, whether or not the management was for the best interests of the corporation or its stockholders as a whole. The contract was held to be void as against public policy. The opinion is so apposite that it will be restated:

"The contention of the Morel faction is that an agreement was entered into between it and the Hilton faction, which agreement was a condition precedent to the incorporation of the Sylvania & Girard Railroad Company, to the effect that, in consideration of the Morel faction subscribing for 50 of the total number of 100 shares of the capital stock of the company, the Morel faction should permanently have the right of selecting and having elected three of the five directors of the company, 'and thus exercise a control over the company and its affairs.' Granting that the allegations of the answer are sufficient to sustain this contention, the question for adjudication is whether such agreement is valid. The company was incorporated by the Secretary of State under the provisions of Civil Code, § 2159 et seq. In section 2163 it is provided: 'The board of directors shall select from their number a president, and may elect one or more vice presidents, and may appoint a secretary, a treasurer, and such other officers and agents as they may deem necessary.' Therefore, if the Morel faction has the right, by virtue of the agreement, to have elected a majority of the directors of the company, favorable to the interests of that faction and willing to carry out its policies in the management of the corporate affairs, and the members of the Hilton faction are bound by the agreement to so vote their stock as to enable the Morel faction to exercise such right, then the last-named faction may indefinitely control the entire management of the company, and accordingly name all its officers and agents, fix their compensation, and choose any of them from among the shareholders identified with such faction, even though it may own, as is now the case, only a minority of the corporate shares. In Shepaug Voting Trust Cases, 60 Conn. 579, 24 Atl. 41, Robinson, J., said: '* * * The duty which each stockholder owes his fellow stockholder [is] to use such power and means as the law and his ownership of stock give him, that the general interest of the stockholders shall be protected and the general welfare of the corporation sustained, and its business conducted by its agents, managers, and officers, so far as may be, upon prudent and honest business principles, and with just as little temptation to and opportunity for fraud, and the seeking of individual gains at the sacrifice of the general welfare, as possible. * * * He may shirk it perhaps by refusing to attend stockholders' meetings, or by declining to vote when called upon, but the law will not allow him to strip himself of the power to perform his duty.'

"In Cone v. Russell & Mason, 48 N. J. Eq. 208, 21 Atl. 847, the owners of a majority of the shares of a transportation corporation mutually agreed to execute, and did execute, a proxy purporting to be irrevocable for five years, authorizing the persons therein named to vote at all stockholders' meetings; and they on their part agreed to so vote that one of the parties to the agreement should be continuously employed as a manager of the corporation, at a salary specified in the agreement. This agreement was held to be against public policy, and therefore void, upon the ground that it was the obligation of corporators and shareholders to attend in person and execute the trust or franchise imposed upon them, and that the good of the public required that each stockholder should exercise his individual judgment as to all matters presented. In the opinion delivered for the court, Pitney, V. C., quoted the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Fuller v. Dame, 18 Pick. 484, as follows: 'Mr. Fuller was one of the original proprietors of the Worcester Railroad. His associates had a right to believe that, in all his acts as such stockholder, in choosing directors, in framing by-laws, and in doing other acts, pursuant to the powers of the corporation, he had a common, and, in proportion to his shares, an equal, interest, and they had a right to rely on his judgment, his recommendations of directors, and other acts, with all the confidence inspired by such a belief.' There are a number of other cases in which it has been held that agreements between stockholders that particular persons shall fill the offices of a corporation and draw designated salaries impair the duty of stockholders to choose for their officers such persons as are best adapted to promote the welfare of the corporation. Among them are Guernsey v. Cook, 117 Mass. 548; a. c., 120 Mass. 501; Woodworth v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309. In White v. Thomas, etc., Co., 52 N. J. Eq. 178, 28 Atl. 75, the holder of certain patents agreed with several capitalists to form a joint-stock company, a portion of the capital stock of which was to be issued to him in payment of patents to be assigned to the corporation, another portion to be issued to the capitalists for funds to be advanced by them in exploiting the patents, and the remaining shares were to be held in the treasury for sale. It was agreed that the shares other than those left in the treasury were to be transferred to a trustee, to be held for the term of ten years, and were by him to be so voted at the elections of the directors that the patentee should nominate and elect a minority of the directors, and the holders of the remainder of the stock should elect the majority. After the shares reserved in the treasury were sold and the purchasers thereof had also purchased of the patentee the greater portion of his stock, a suit was brought by such purchasers against the trustee to restrain him from voting at an approaching election the shares of stock thus held by him in trust, and to have the agreements under which he held them canceled and set aside. The court, relying upon the general principle that the right to vote stock 'cannot be separated from the ownership in such sense that the elective franchise shall be in one man, and the entire beneficial interest in another, nor to any extent, unless the circumstances take the case out of the general rule,' declared the trust in question void, and granted the relief sought by the complainants. In Harvey v. Improvement Co., 118 N. C. 693, 24 S. E. 489, 32 L. R. A. 265, 54 Am. St. R. 749, it was declared that 'each stockholder, whether by himself or his proxy, must be free to cast his vote for what he deems the best interest of the corporation, the other stockholders being entitled to the benefit of such free exercise of his judgment by each; and hence any combination or device by which a number of stockholders shall combine to place the voting of their shares in the irrevocable power of another is held contrary to public policy,' and 'power to vote is inherently annexed to, and inseparable from, the real ownership of each share, and can only be delegated by proxy with power of revocation.' So in Gage v. Fisher, 5 N. Dak. 297, 63 N. W. 809, 31 L. R. A. 557, one of the grounds upon which the transaction therein involved was held to be void was that each stockholder in a corporation has the right to demand that every other stockholder, if he desires to do so, shall have the right to exercise at each annual meeting 'his own judgment as to the best interest of all the stockholders, untrammelled by dictation and unfettered by the obligation of any contract.' We are aware that there are some cases in which a contrary principle is announced, but, in our opinion, the cases cited announce the better doctrine. One of the cases holding contrary to our opinion is Smith v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co., 115 Cal. 584, 47 Pac. 582, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, the soundness of which, we think, is very justly criticised in a note following a report of the case in 56 American State Reports, 119. In that case it may be noted that the contract involved was limited to five years.

"In the instant case the motives of Morel and those acting with him may be for the promotion of the prosperity of the corporation and the welfare of the majority of its stockholders, but, in passing judicially upon the question as to the validity of the contract set up by them, and under the terms of which they claim the right to indefinitely control the affairs of the corporation, we must look alone to what such contract permits to be done, if the parties, or any of them, choose to press the privileges which it confers. According to the authorities we have cited, it is the theory of the law that the holders of the majority of the shares of stock in a corporation may control its management, and every person who becomes an owner of stock therein has a right to believe that the corporation will, and to insist that it shall, be managed by the majority. Morel and his friends owned only 50 shares of stock, just half of the whole number of shares, at the time the agreement in question was entered into; now they own only 45 shares, one of their number, contrary to an agreement entered into by them among themselves, having sold his 5 shares; and it is this minority which claims to have the right to control the corporate affairs by dictating the majority of the directors to be elected. To illustrate how small a minority might exercise such right under the alleged agreement, suppose none of the other members of the Morel faction should sell, and they should agree among themselves to vote their stock as a unit, as determined by ballot; then 23 shares would control. If this could be done, then the owners of such 23 shares could agree among themselves that they would hold meetings, and by a majority of their shares determine how all the 23 votes should be cast in the meeting to be held to determine how the 45 shares should be voted; and, if so, then 12 shares could determine the whole policy of the corporation, though the Hilton faction should own 25 shares, Hoge 25 shares, and Mills 5 shares, as seems now to be the case, as the answer charges merely on belief that Hilton is the real owner of the shares standing in the names of Hoge and Mills.

"Our conclusion is that the contract set up by the respondents to the rule as cause why mandamus absolute should not be granted is against public policy, and therefore void, because it indefinitely deprives the owners of the stock constituting the Hilton faction, though they may have a majority of the stock, of the power to exercise their right as well as their duty to the other stockholders, present or future, and to the public, to so vote in the election of directors for the company as will in their judgment promote its prosperity and best enable it to perform its duties to the public, and because it gives the shareholders of the Morel faction, even though they may own but a small minority of the stock, the right to indefinitely control the affairs of the corporation, including the right to fix the compensation of its officers and agents and to fill any of such positions from among their own members. It follows that the court did not err in rendering the judgment of which complaint is made."

The connection in which the Court of Appeals uses the language, "The Chattahoochee Brick Company, referred to in the contract declared on, is a private business corporation which has no functions of a public character," shows a misconception of the foregoing opinion. It is true that in the concluding paragraph of the opinion, stating reasons why the contract was void as against public policy, it was said that the stockholders owed a duty "to the public, to so vote in the election of directors for the company as will in their judgment promote its prosperity and best enable it to perform its duties to the public," but that was only one reason, and the language employed did not mean that in order to make the rule applicable the corporation must be what is commonly called a public service corporation. Other reasons were stated, all of which were discussed in the opinion based on principles applicable to contracts of the character involved, irrespective of the quasi public or private character of the corporation, or whether its functions were private or public. Numerous prior decisions of other courts, not cited in the opinion, as well as subsequent decisions, might be cited, holding such contracts void as against public policy, without regard to the public or private character of the corporation. However, the decision above mentioned by this court is the law of this state, and it would be useless again to enter into further discussion of the case. The case was distinguished in Simmons v. Atlanta Telephone, etc., Co., 139 Ga. 488, 77 S. E. 377, but not on the ground of the character of the corporation the stock of which was involved. The corporation in that instance was a quasi public corporation, being a telegraph and telephone company. The nature of the contract upon which the present action is founded need not be again stated. Sufficient has been said of it to show that under application of the principles applied in the opinion in Morel v. Hoge, 130 Ga. 625, 61 S. E. 487, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1136, 14 Ann. Cas. 935, it is void because it is against public policy, and its breach does not afford the plaintiff a cause of action. Under this view it is unnecessary to deal with other grounds of attack on the contract raised by the demurrer.

[2] 2. The trial judge sustained a special demurrer and ordered paragraph 10 stricken from the petition. The cross-bill or exceptions assigns error on this ruling. The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment on the cross-bill of exceptions. The substance of paragraph 10 is not of such materiality as renders it necessary to be stated. It is sufficient to state that there was no error in the ruling made.

Judgment reversed on the main bill of exceptions, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

All the Justices concur.

HILL and GILBERT, JJ., concur specially in the judgment on the main bill of exceptions.

WILLINGHAM, WRIGHT & COVINGTON
v. GLOVER et al. (No. 12646.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 20, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error \S 917(3), 1139—Parties \S 88(3)—Pleading \S 205(4), 225(1)—When order sustaining demurrer is general, appellate court must consider special as well as general grounds; court not bound to give opportunity to amend on sustaining of special demurrer; court may grant plaintiff opportunity to correct defects subject to special demurrer; misjoinder is ground of special, and not general, demurrer.

The plaintiff law firm sued the defendants upon a quantum meruit for the value of legal services rendered under an alleged joint contract and employment in representing their interests in a factional contest with other stockholders in a corporation. The amended petition in effect charges that the three defendants expressly and simultaneously employed the plaintiffs to perform the services in question for the defendants, and that the purposes sought and results obtained from such employment were a common undertaking and for the common benefit of the defendants. Defendants demurred upon the grounds that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant and of causes of action, because the petition showed that the alleged contract was several, and not joint, as the pecuniary holdings and interests of the defendants were separate and distinct; that certain of the alleged benefits were received by the corporation or by other stockholders or persons, for which they, and not the defendants, would be liable; that certain of the alleged services were not such as would authorize a recovery against the defendants; and that the petition is defective in form in failing to itemize the amounts claimed for each particular service and for expenses incurred. The court passed the following order: "The within demurrer sustained, and plaintiffs' case dismissed, and judgment against plaintiffs for $—— costs." It does not appear that the plaintiffs tendered or sought to offer any amendment to avoid the order of dismissal, but they except thereto by direct bill of exceptions. Held:

Where a demurrer to a petition contains grounds both of general and of special demurrer, and the trial judge, without specifying the grounds or the basis of his decision, passes a general order sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition, the judgment will be treated as sustaining the entire demurrer upon all its grounds, and the special as well as the general grounds must be considered on review if the petition is not subject to the latter. McClaren v. Williams, 132 Ga. 352 (2), 64 S. E. 65; Herring v. Smith, 141 Ga. 825 (4), 82 S. E. 132; De Loach v. Ga. Coast R. Co., 144 Ga. 678 (1), 87 S. E. 889; Gunn v. James, 120 Ga. 482 (2), 48 S. E. 148; Huggins v. S. E. Lime & Cement Co., 121 Ga. 311 (1), 48 S. E. 933; Crittenden v. Southern Home Ass'n, 111 Ga. 268 (5), 36 S. E. 643; Atlanta Post Co. v. McHenry, 26 Ga. App. 341 (1), 106 S. E. 324. The rule is otherwise where the order of dismissal is expressly limited to the general grounds, or from its language may be so construed, in which event the special grounds will not be considered, but will be left to subsequent determination by the trial court. Linder v. Whitehead, 116 Ga. 206, 42 S. E. 358; Simpson v. Sanders, 130 Ga. 265, 271, 60 S. E. 541; Linam v. Anderson, 12 Ga. App. 735 (4), 739, 78 S. E. 424. While a peremptory judgment of dismissal is ordinarily not the proper disposition of a petition upon the sustaining of a special demurrer, but the result of sustaining the demurrer is only to eliminate the parts so held bad, so that under the better practice there should be no dismissal except where the plaintiff fails to amend in compliance with the court's terms affording opportunity to do so (White v. Little, 139 Ga. 523 [3], 77 S. E. 646; News Pub. Co. v. Lowe, 8 Ga. App. 333, 334, 69 S. E. 128), it is, however, the rule that, while the court may provide in its order sustaining a special demurrer that the plaintiff have an opportunity to amend so as to meet such special grounds, it is "not bound to do so, especially where no request is made for time in which to amend." (Lamar, Taylor & Riley Drug Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Albany, 127 Ga. 448, 452, 56 S. E. 488, 488; Wells v. Butlers Builders' Supply Co., 128 Ga. 37 [3], 39, 57 S. E. 55). But where a petition has on general order been dismissed, and the appellate court finds that it is not subject to general demurrer, or to certain of the grounds of special demurrer, but is subject to other special grounds, direction may be given that, before the judgment of this court is made the judgment of the court below, the plaintiff be allowed to amend his petition so as to cure the defects therein, that upon his doing so the case stand for trial upon the petition as thus amended, and that upon his failure to do this the judgment below be unconditionally affirmed. Sims v. Cordele Ice Co., 119 Ga. 597 (3), 46 S. E. 841; Herring v. Smith, 141 Ga. 825 (4a), 82 S. E. 132; Wilson v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 132 Ga. 215 (3), 68 S. E. 1121; Brown v. Bowman, 119 Ga. 153 (3), 158, 46 S. E. 410; Dunn v. Western Union Tel. Co., 2 Ga. App. 845 (1), 853, 59 S. E. 189; Ternest v. Ga. Coast & Piedmont R. Co., 19 Ga. App. 94, 96, 90 S. E. 1040; Ga. Fertilizer & Oil Co. v. Johnson, 18 Ga. App. 281, 89 S. E. 344.

(a) A misjoinder of parties or of causes of action is not a ground of general demurrer, but is a defect which should be taken advantage of by special demurrer filed at the first term. Ga. R. Co. v. Tice, 124 Ga. 459 (1), 462, 463, 52 S. E. 916, 4 Ann. Cas. 200; Riley v. Royal Arcanum, 140 Ga. 178 (1b), 78 S. E. 803; Neil v. Dow Law Bank, 138 Ga. 158, 74 S. E. 1027; Lippincott v. Behre, 122 Ga. 548 (2, 3), 546, 50 S. E. 467; Armuchee Pants Mfg. Co. v. Juillard, 14 Ga. App. 141, 80 S. E. 525. The former rule stated in Governor v. Hicks, 12 Ga. 189, that such a petition will be held bad on general demurrer, has been expressly modified by Ga. R. Co. v. Tice, supra, 124 Ga. 463, 52 S. E. 916, 4 Ann. Cas. 200. The grounds attacking the alleged misjoinder in the instant petition, while treated by counsel as a general demurrer, cannot, therefore, be so considered; but, as they point out the alleged defects with sufficient particularity, may be treated as a part of the special demurrer.

2. Attorney and client ~~—~~166(1)—Contract of employment presumed joint, though attorneys sued on quantum meruit.

Under the allegations of the petition, while the value of the alleged services can be recovered only under implied contract, upon a quantum meruit, yet since under the allegations the employment itself was express and specific and was the simultaneous act of the defendants in furtherance of a common purpose and for a benefit common to all, the contract must be taken as controlled by the general legal presumption that such an obligation is joint. Walker v. City of Rome, 6 Ga. App. 59, 61, 64 S. E. 310; Elliott v. Bell, 37 W. Va. 834, 17 S. E. 399; Knowlton v. Parsons, 198 Mass. 439, 84 N. E. 798; Pittsley v. King, 206 Pa. 193, 55 Atl. 920; Hill v. Combs, 92 Mo. App. 242; Turley v. Thomas, 81 Nev. 181, 101 Pac. 568, 135 Am. St. Rep. 667; Paige on Contracts (2d Ed.) 3584; 40 Cyc. 2838 (note 95); 18 Corpus Juris, 577-580; 6 Corpus Juris, 730-732; 2 Ruling Case Law, 1032. Although disproportionate interests of beneficiaries of a contract in the subject-matter and fruits of the employment, where the nature of the contract is otherwise doubtful, may sometimes be considered in construing its nature and character as several (Beck v. Pounds, 20 Ga. 37; International Hotel Co. v. Flynn, 288 Ill. 638, 87 N. E. 855; 15 Ann. Cas. 1069;

2 Elliott on Contracts, 1478; 18 Corpus Juris, 578), yet in a contract such as is set forth by the amended petition, the express and simultaneous employment of the plaintiffs by the defendants in pursuance of a common object must be taken as the controlling factor in its construction.

3. Attorney and client §161—Principal and agent §136(3), 145(4), 149(2), 150(3)—Employer of services cannot apportion liability where he does not disclose names of others interested; agent or undisclosed principal may be held liable; after election to proceed against agent or undisclosed principal the other cannot be held; agent acting beyond authority is personally liable; agent acting for benefit of principal may expressly bind himself.

One actually employing another to perform services, in the subject-matter or results of which others besides himself may have a beneficial interest, cannot avoid or apportion his personal liability for the compensation on the theory that he acted and assumed to act partly on behalf of the other beneficiaries, where he fails to disclose their names, although he may have informed the opposite contracting party that others besides himself had a beneficial interest. Siler v. Perkins, 126 Tenn. 380, 149 S. W. 1060, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 232, and case note; 21 R. C. L. 895, 896. If the employer is in fact merely an agent and acts with the authority of an undisclosed principal, either he or such principal may be held liable at the election of the opposite party; but the contractual liability of such agent and principal is not joint, and, after an election to proceed against one, the other cannot be held. Wylly v. Collins, 9 Ga. 223, 229; Lippincott v. Behre, 122 Ga. 543 (3), 545, 50 S. E. 467; Fontaine v. Eagle & Phoenix Mfg. Co., 52 Ga. 31, 33; Commercial City Bank v. Mitchell, 25 Ga. App. 837 (2), 105 S. E. 57. If in point of fact the employer has acted without or beyond the authority of an alleged principal, he alone becomes personally liable (Peebles v. Perry, 18 Ga. App. 369, 373, 89 S. E. 461; Haupt v. Vint, 68 W. Va. 657, 70 S. E. 702, 34 L. R. A. [N. S.] 518, and case note); and, even though he be acting in the capacity of agent and for the sole benefit of his principal, he may nevertheless by express undertaking bind himself personally (Civil Code 1910, § 3613; Phinizy v. Bush, 129 Ga. 479 [9], 492, 59 S. E. 259). See, also, on the general question of liability of the employer or beneficiary for attorney's fees, Daly v. Hines & Hobbs, 55 Ga. 470; Simms v. Floyd, 65 Ga. 719 [2]; Mathews v. Giles, 108 Ga. 364, 33 S. E. 1006; 40 Cyc. 2837, 2838; 6 Corpus Juris, 732, 734; 2 Ruling Case Law, 1032. Thus, under either of the foregoing principles, the petition was not subject to demurrer as failing to allege the names and interests of beneficiaries other than defendants, or the shares of stock represented by certain of the defendants in addition to their own shares in the corporation, or as showing liability by beneficiaries other than defendants; nor was it subject to the special ground that only the corporation was liable for the alleged service in preparing new corporate by-laws, since there are allegations which may be taken as indicating that such preparation was directed by the defendants for their own benefit.

4. Attorney and client §145, 167(2)—Attorneys may recover reasonable value of services in attacking combination of stockholders regardless of its legality; validity of combination of stockholders attacked as voting trust held for jury unless testimony clear and unequivocal.

While in this state a voting trust is illegal (English v. Rosenkrantz, 152 Ga. —, 111 S. E. 198; Morel v. Hoge, 130 Ga. 625, 61 S. E. 487, 16 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1136, 14 Ann. Cas. 985), it is unnecessary to determine whether the alleged agreement by other stockholders in the corporation, as set forth in the petition, was thus unlawful, since, if the plaintiffs' alleged successful attack without litigation upon such agreement and conduct of those stockholders was authorized by and beneficial to the defendants, plaintiffs might recover the reasonable value of this item of service, regardless of the legality of that combination. Nor can it be held, as matter of law, that the agreement of the defendants themselves as attached to the petition was itself such an illegal voting trust, which would preclude plaintiffs' recovery of compensation for preparing that agreement or for attacking the agreement and actions of other stockholders. So far as indicated upon its face, the defendants' agreement appears to be only defensive in character, and not such as is inhibited by law. Should the latter agreement be properly attacked by plea or answer as being thus illegal when taken in connection with sufficient other alleged facts and circumstances, the question thus raised would be for determination by the jury, unless the testimony be so clear and unequivocal that the trial court might construe the alleged agreement to be legal or illegal as matter of law.

5. Attorney and client §165—Petition should itemize claim for services and expenses.

The other grounds of special demurrer are without merit, except that the petition was subject to the ninth ground in failing to set forth what proportions of the total fee claimed were due for the respective items of service, and to itemize the amount charged as expenses. The defendants are reasonably entitled to have these items plead with particularity, in order to make their defenses.

6. Disposition of case.

The petition not being subject to general demurrer or to any of the grounds of special demurrer save that just stated, the judgment of the court below is affirmed, but with the direction that, before the judgment of this court is made the judgment of the court below, the plaintiffs shall be allowed to amend their petition so as to cure the defects alleged in the ninth ground of the demurrer, that upon their so doing the case stand for trial upon the petition as thus amended, but in the event of a failure so to do the judgment be unconditionally affirmed.

(No. 12758.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 20, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers \S 228(2)—Burden on carrier to show failure of shipper to give notice of injury as required by bill of lading pleaded and proved by it.

While a stipulation in a contract for the shipment of live stock that "before the property is removed from the possession of the carrier or mingled with other property, the shipper, owner or consignee shall inform in writing the delivering carrier of any injury to the property," is reasonable and valid, so that, in the absence of any express or implied waiver of it by the carrier, a recovery could not be legally had from the carrier for such an injury, where the evidence shows that the plaintiff did not comply with the stipulation (Southern Ry. Co. v. Tollerson, 129 Ga. 647, 59 S. E. 799; Roberts v. Ga., etc., Ry. Co., 10 Ga. App. 100, 72 S. E. 942), yet where the plaintiff does not sue upon the express contract of affreightment, but brings his action in tort, and where it is the carrier who sets up by its plea and introduces in evidence the bill of lading with its stipulation as to notice, the burden of proof lies upon the carrier to sustain its affirmative plea and defense by showing the failure of the plaintiff consignee, the shipper and the owner, to give the notice thus required. Southern Ry. Co. v. Bunch, 27 Ga. App. 689, 109 S. E. 523. The carrier here failed to offer such proof.

2. Carriers \S 218(8)—Stipulation in contract held not to relieve carrier of negligence in failing to provide proper facilities for unloading; risk in unloading assumed by shipper knowing of inadequate facilities but undertaking to unload.

While it has been held that a carrier of live stock may by special contract make reasonable stipulations in reference to matters which are merely incidental to the transportation of the animals, such as loading and unloading and caring for the stock, it is not the law that such a stipulation, obligating the shipper to unload the animals from the car at his own risk and expense, and providing that any helpers which might be furnished by the carrier for the shipper's accommodation should be "deemed employees of the shipper" while so engaged, can be construed as relieving the carrier from the result of what might be deemed to be its own negligence in failing to provide safe and proper facilities for unloading the stock. Brannon v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 4 Ga. App. 749, 751, 62 S. E. 468; Cranor v. Southern R. Co., 13 Ga. App. 86(2), 78 S. E. 1014. But where, as here, it is shown without dispute that the alleged inadequate facilities for unloading were known to the shipper, but he nevertheless undertook through his own special agent to unload the stock himself, according to a mode and method acquiesced in by him, then and in such event the risk of their being thus injured must be taken to have been assumed by the shipper (Brannon v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., supra, 4 Ga. App. 752, 62 S. E. 468); and it therefore follows that the verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs is without evidence to support it.

B. T. Moseley, of Danielsville, and John B. Gamble, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.
Clarence E. Adams, of Danielsville, for defendants in error.

JENKINS, P. J. [1, 2] There was undisputed testimony which showed that one of the plaintiff firm at the time of the injury to the mules in question had actual knowledge of the alleged safer facilities for unloading, but made no protest to the carrier or its agent, and sent to the carrier's depot the plaintiffs' own agent, who paid the freight, took charge of the animals and haltered some, accepted the carrier's existing place and facilities for unloading, without offering any objection, and himself (whatever under the disputed evidence the carrier's agent might have done in directing or suggesting the manner of unloading) acquiesced in the agent's suggestions, and actively assisted in, if he did not wholly direct, all of the processes of unloading.

It is not necessary to add anything further to the headnotes.

Judgment reversed.

BOWDEN v. VIRGINIA-CAROLINA CHEMICAL CO. (No. 12779.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
March 20, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Master and servant §177—One throwing lead from window under orders of foreman under whom plaintiff worked was a fellow servant.

The negligent act alleged and proved which injured the plaintiff was that of a fellow servant engaged in the same business, for which the common master is not responsible, except in cases of railroad companies. Civil Code 1910, § 3129.

2. Master and servant §139, 189(2)—Employee's foreman held a fellow servant; order to throw lead from window not proximate cause of injury caused by the lead.

The plaintiff and other employees, who were throwing lead out of the upper windows, and the foreman, who instructed them to do so, were each and all in the same service. Under the rulings of the Supreme Court in Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 609, 56 S. E. 839, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 772, and Brush Electric Light Co. v. Wells, 110 Ga. 192, 35 S. E. 365, the foreman was only a fellow servant. Besides, the order of the foreman to the employees was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, but the negligent manner in which the order was executed by these employees.

Error from City Court of Macon; Will Gunn, Judge.

Action by Rafe Bowden against Virginia-Carolina Chemical Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Bowden sought to recover for personal injuries received in the course of his employment. The trial court awarded a nonsuit, and he excepted. The petition made a case substantially as follows: The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a lead burner, in the repairing of lead tanks in the defendant's plant, and while so engaged, under the express orders of one designated as the vice principal or alter ego of the defendant, he was injured by a piece of lead, weighing approximately 200 pounds, falling upon him from a five-story building. By amendment he alleged that, while engaged in the scope of his duties, and while going to answer the roll call in obedience to the instructions of the superintendent, alter ego or vice principal of the defendant, he was injured as described. From the evidence it appears that the plaintiff had been employed by the defendant for a number of years as a fireman. On the day of his injury he was ordered to assist a lead burner in repairing the lead tanks of the defendant. This work was completed early in the day, and the plaintiff, without further instruction, proceeded to gather up the tools which had been used inside of the building and placed them behind the rear door, inside the building. This was his usual and regular work. The whistle blew at 4 o'clock as a signal for the employees, including the plaintiff, to report in front of and inside the building, for roll call. He opened the back door, stepped out in the yard at the back of the building, and was about to go around the building in order to get in front, to answer roll call. After getting outside the building, and proceeding to the front, he was injured by a piece of lead falling upon him from the third floor. This lead was thrown down from the upper story window by a coemployee, who was doing so in obedience to the orders of the same foreman who had ordered the plaintiff to assist the lead burner. No lead had ever before been thrown out on that side; "they" threw it out on the other side, next to the street." The plaintiff did not know that they were throwing lead out on that side, and on this occasion was not in any way warned of the danger. The defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the ground, among others, that the negligence, if there was any, was that of a fellow servant, for which the master was not responsible.

LEE v. HILL. (No. 13069.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. New trial \S 68—Verdict contrary to law and evidence, when findings adverse to plaintiff demanded.

The issue in this case was made by the filing of a counter affidavit to the foreclosure of a laborer's lien. Upon the trial the evidence demanded a finding, first, that the plaintiff was not a "laborer," within the meaning of the statute, and that he made the contract with the defendant in the capacity of a contractor, and not in the capacity of a laborer; and, second, that the contract had not been completed prior to the foreclosure of the lien. The verdict in favor of the plaintiff was therefore contrary to law and the evidence, and the court erred in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial. See, in this connection, Civil Code 1910, \S 3359; Savannah, etc., R. Co. v. Grant, 56 Ga. 68; Kline v. Russell, 113 Ga. 1085, 39 S. E. 477; Bruton v. Beasley, 135 Ga. 412, 69 S. E. 561.

2. Estoppel \S 88(1)—New trial \S 40(4)—Erroneous legal advice not "admission," constituting estoppel when acted on; erroneous charge, not excepted to, not law of the case on motion attacking verdict as contrary to law.

The ruling in the preceding note is not affected by the fact that the evidence authorized a finding that the plaintiff was advised by the defendant to take out a laborer's lien, or by the further fact that the judge erroneously charged the jury, in substance, that if they found that the plaintiff had taken out a labor-er's lien upon the advice of the defendant, the latter would be estopped from contending that the plaintiff had foreclosed under the wrong Code section, and that no exception was taken to this charge. Erroneous legal advice given by a person is not an "admission," within the meaning of section 5736 of the Civil Code (1910), although such advice may have been acted upon to another's injury and to the benefit of the party giving it. And especially is this true where, as in this case, it does not appear that the advice was given in bad faith or with intent to deceive or defraud. And the failure of the losing party in a case to except to an erroneous charge of the court does not make the charge the law of the case, where the motion for a new trial contains the ground that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence.

Vendor and purchaser \Leftarrow 334(3)—Rescinding vendee held entitled to recover amount paid less damages for breach.

This is an action for money had and received as part payment of the purchase money in a contract for the sale of land. There was sufficient evidence introduced by the plaintiff as to whether there had been a rescission of the contract to submit that question to a jury. Where there has been a rescission of a contract for the sale of land possession of which remained in the vendor, the vendee named in the bond for title may, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, recover from the vendor the amount of the purchase money paid, less any damage occasioned to the vendor by reason of the vendee's failure to perform the contract.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; M. C. Tarver, Judge.

Action by T. B. Goss against J. J. Finger. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant brings a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment reversed on the main bill, and affirmed on the cross-bill.

Goss bought the land involved in the case from Finger, and paid a portion of the purchase price in cash, and gave his promissory notes for the remainder. Finger gave Goss a bond for title. The bond for title contained no provision for the forfeiture of the money paid, nor was time made the essence of the contract. Possession of the land sold was refused to the purchaser. Goss thereafter returned the bond for title to Finger, accompanied by a letter demanding the return of the purchase money paid and the promissory notes given. No reply was ever made to this letter. Finger afterwards deeded the land to a third person as security for a debt. Goss then brought this action against Finger for the money had and received.

Lang & Lang, of Calhoun, for plaintiff in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Forfeitures are not favored by the law. Civil Code 1910, § 3717. No provision for a forfeiture of the money paid was in the bond for title given by Finger to Goss, nor was there any provision making time the essence of the contract. Time is not generally of the essence of the contract. Civil Code 1910, § 4268 (8). Usually the vendee is admitted into possession under a bond for title. Powell's Actions for Land, § 373. Goss, through his attorneys, returned the bond for title, with a letter containing the condition that Finger return to Goss the part of the purchase money paid to Finger and the promissory notes signed by Goss.

"In the ordinary course of business, when good faith requires an answer, it is the duty of the party receiving the letter from the other to answer within a reasonable time. Otherwise he is presumed to admit the propriety of the acts mentioned in the letter of his correspondent, and to adopt them." Civil Code 1910, § 5741.

Goss received no reply to his letter. Finger afterwards deeded the land to another party as security for a debt.

"If, without having completed the rescission by restoring the status, the vendor in a bond for title resells the property to a third person, who takes without notice of the vendee's equitable title, the vendee may treat the resale either as a rescission of the sale or as a breach of the bond. If he elects to treat it as a rescission, he may recover from the vendor the amount of purchase money he has paid, * * * less the damages which have been occasioned by reason of his (the vendee's) failure to perform the contract." Buck v. Duvall, 9 Ga. App. 656 (4), 72 S. E. 44.

The plaintiff had acquired an equitable title to the land under his bond for title. Whether there had been a rescission of the contract was a question of fact which should have been submitted to the jury. There was no evidence introduced as to the value of the land at any time. If the contract was rescinded, the vendor should have restored the status of the parties prior to the signing of the bond for title less any damage he may have sustained by reason of the failure of the vendee to perform the contract. This being an action for money had and received, if the contract was rescinded the vendor should restore to the vendee the purchase money paid and the promissory notes signed, less any damages occasioned to the vendor by reason of the failure of the vendee to perform his contract. Without a provision to that effect in the bond for title, or any agreement to that effect, the vendor could not arbitrarily forfeit the amount of the purchase money paid him. If the contract was rescinded the vendor could not, without any provision or agreement to that effect, keep the land, the purchase money paid, and the promissory notes given. The status of the parties prior to the contract should be restored as far as it is practicable to do so; that is to say, the equitable title of the vendee should be returned to the vendor, and the vendor should return to the vendee the promissory notes given and the purchase money which has been paid less any damage that may have been suffered by the vendor from the transaction. Lytle v. Scottish American Mortg. Co., 122 Ga. 458, 50 S. E. 402. There was sufficient evidence of a rescission for the question to have been submitted to the jury, with the right in the vendor to prove any damages occasioned him by reason of the failure of the vendee to perform his contract, if any, and the trial court erred in granting a nonsuit.

We do not think that any of the other rulings complained of, either in the main bill of exceptions or in the cross-bill, were erroneous for any of the reasons assigned.

Judgment on main bill reversed, on cross-bill affirmed.

1. Denial of continuance not abuse of discretion.

Under the facts shown on the motion to continue this case, we cannot say that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing to continue the case.

2. Criminal law §564(1)—Proof of venue held sufficient.

The proof as to venue was sufficient.

3. Criminal law §935(1), 1160—Intoxicating liquors §137, 236(19)—Evidence held to support conviction for manufacturing; making of intoxicating beer by fermentation is complete offense; trial judge has wide discretion in ruling on motion for new trial on weight of evidence; verdict, approved by trial judge, not disturbed.

The evidence authorized the verdict. The evidence clearly showed that liquor had been distilled at the place where the officers found the defendant with a ten-gallon keg on his shoulder, and in addition thereto a witness swore that "all indications were that the still had been operated the night before or the day before that. Everything was ready and the beer was ready to make. It was fermented and was intoxicating. Beer at that stage is an intoxicating liquor."

(a) "Under the prohibition law (Ga. L. Ex. Sess. 1917, p. 18), declaring it a felony to 'distill, manufacture, or make any liquors or beverages, any part of which is alcoholic,' the act of making an intoxicating beer, through the fermentation of syrup, corn meal, and water mixed for that purpose, is of itself an offense as complete and distinct as the further act of distilling from such beer a quantity of alcohol, whisky, or rum. Williams v. State, 24 Ga. App. 53 (2) (99 S. E. 711)." Belcher v. State, 25 Ga. App. 493 (1), 103 S. E. 852.

(b) "There was some slight evidence authorizing the verdict; and, the verdict having been approved by the trial judge, under the repeated and uniform rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, a reviewing court is powerless to interfere. When the verdict is apparently decidedly against the weight of evidence, the trial judge has a wide discretion as to granting or refusing a new trial; and whenever there is any evidence, however slight, to support a verdict, which has been approved by the trial judge, this court is absolutely without authority to control the judgment of the trial court." Bradham v. State, 21 Ga. App. 510, 94 S. E. 618, and citations.

defendant admitted that he rode on the back seat of the automobile with Cochran from Buckhead, Morgan county, Ga., to Atlanta, Ga., and that he had worked for the white man, Cochran, on his farm for two years, and was so employed by him at the time he left Buckhead, Ga., but denied that he had anything at all to do with the corn whisky; that the witness never saw the defendant in possession of any whisky; that all of this occurred in Fulton county.

The defendant made his statement, the substance of which was a general denial of any knowledge of the corn whisky; also denied that he made any statement to Deputy J. L. Millam that he rode in the car with the white man, Cochran. Here both sides closed.—Statement by editor.

A wife intrusted her husband with some money in the form of gold coins, for the purpose of having the money deposited in the bank for her for safe-keeping. A special deposit of the money was made in the bank by him in his own name and as his own money. It so remained for several months, and the bank had no notice that his wife was claiming title to the money, nor did the bank have any intimation whatever that the wife had any interest in the money. This money, along with other money that the husband had on deposit in the savings department of the bank and on general deposit with the bank, was pledged by the husband as security for the payment of a note executed by the husband to the bank. The wife brought suit in the municipal court for the money. The jury were authorized to find the verdict in favor of the defendant bank.

BAGLEY v. HINESVILLE BANK.
(No. 12766.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 20, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Usury §78, 146—When note was for usurious interest, entire amount forfeited; promise to pay usury unenforceable, whether as to interest already earned or to accrue.

The defendant executed on December 1, 1916, a promissory note for $1,000, due to the plaintiff bank on January 1, 1917, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum from maturity. No interest having been paid, the maker, on August 27, 1919, executed in favor of the bank another note for $360, due January 1, 1920, bearing interest at 8 per cent. from its date. The bank brought suit against the maker solely on the latter interest note. In the trial there was undisputed testimony by the defendant, in support of his plea of usury, to the effect that he gave the plaintiff the interest note sued on "to cover 12 per cent. interest on the $1,000 note * * * from January 1, 1917, to January 1, 1920," but that at the time he gave such interest note $218.86 was the correct interest at the lawful rate due and unpaid on the $1,000 note from its maturity, January 1, 1917, to the date of execution of the latter note, August 27, 1919. The court on its own motion directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $218.86, as representing the lawful interest accrued on the original note at the time the interest note actually sued on was given. Held, the act of August 18, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 48; Park's Ann. Code Supp. 1917, §§ 3438, 3438 [a]), provides that "any person, company, or corporation violating the provisions of sec. 3436, shall forfeit the entire interest so charged or taken, or contracted to be reserved, charged or taken." Since, under the undisputed evidence, the note sued on represents interest charged or taken upon the original note in excess of the 8 per cent. originally contracted for, the defendant was entitled to invoke the statutory forfeiture, not only as to the 4 per cent. excess charge, but of the entire interest represented by the note sued on, and it was error for the court to direct a verdict, against the defendant's plea of usury, in favor of the plaintiff in the amount of interest which had legally accrued at the time the usurious interest note actually sued on was given. A promise in which the sole obligation is for the payment of interest infected with usury is altogether incapable of enforcement, and it makes no difference whether such invalid and usurious promise relates back to the payment of an alleged amount on account of interest already earned, or whether it relates to usurious interest which shall accrue in the future.

March 20, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Schools and school districts §97(4)—Notice for 30 days in newspaper for publication of sheriff's advertisements is condition precedent to bond election.

As a condition precedent to the holding of an election for school bonds under section 143 of the Code of School Laws, approved August 19, 1919 (Ga. L. 1919, pp. 345, 346), a notice of such election must be published for 30 days next preceding the day of the election, in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements for the county are published.

Error from Superior Court, Johnson County; J. L. Kent, Judge.

Proceeding by Scott School District and others against J. W. Carter and others. Judgment dismissing the petition, and petitioners bring error. Affirmed.

Larsen & Crockett, of Dublin, and E. L. Stephens, of Wrightsville, for plaintiffs in error.

J. S. Adams and R. Earl Camp, both of Dublin, for defendants in error.

STEPHENS, J. This was a proceeding instituted in the superior court of Johnson county by E. L. Stephens, solicitor general of the Dublin judicial circuit, acting for and in behalf of the state of Georgia, for the purpose of validating a proposed issue of bonds authorized by an election held in Scott school district. The defendants in error regularly intervened and demurred to the proceedings, upon the ground that it does not appear from the petition that any notice of the proposed election was published in a newspaper for the space of thirty days next preceding the day of the election, as required by law. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and to this judgment the petitioners except.

Neither the petition nor the notice declaring the result of the election given by the trustees of the school district to the solicitor general shows that such notice was given. The election was called upon the question of issuing bonds for school purposes, and was held under the authority of section 143 of the Code of School Laws enacted by the Legislature of this state, approved August 19, 1919 (Ga. L. 1919, pp. 345, 346). This section provides that when an election is called under its authority the authorities named therein in the act shall "call such election in terms of law now provided for a county issue of bonds except as herein otherwise provided." It follows, therefore, that in the absence of any provision in this act as to any notice required as a condition precedent to the holding of the election, the provision as to notice required when an election is called for a county issue of bonds applies. The notice there required is publication in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements for the county are published for a space of 30 days next preceding the day of the election. Civil Code 1910, § 440.

It is contended by the plaintiffs that section 143 of the Code of School Laws adopted in 1919 contains a specific provision, otherwise providing that only 10 days' notice, under certain conditions, be given prior to the holding of an election called under this act, and that therefore such provision renders inoperative the provision as to 30 days' notice in Civil Code (1910), § 440, regulating the issuance of bonds by counties, and which would be otherwise applicable to elections held under the provisions of section 143 of the act of 1919. The provision of section 143 of the act of 1919 thus relied on by the plaintiffs reads as follows:

"Said board of trustees or board of education may order such election to be held on the school site or other suitable place in the school district, consolidated district or county, of which they shall give notice by posting same at three public places in said school district, consolidated district or county, not less than ten days previous to said election."

This provision as to 10 days' notice, by its very terms, applies only when the proposed election is to be held at some place other than the regular voting or election precinct in the district, without which notice the election must necessarily be held at the regular voting or election precinct as required by section 441 of the Civil Code (1910), governing an election for a county issue of bonds. This provision of section 143 of the act of 1919, providing for 10 days' notice that the election is "to be held on the school site or other suitable place in the school district," is not the notice required as a condition precedent to the holding of the election, and therefore does not supersede the provision as to 30 days' notice required for a county issue of bonds which, unless "otherwise provided," is applicable to elections held under section 143 of the act of 1919.

It not appearing that the required 30 days' notice was given of the intention to hold the election, the proceedings instituted by the solicitor general to validate the proposed issue of bonds was subject to the demurrer interposed. The court, therefore, did not err in sustaining the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

ROWNTREE BROS. v. BUSH. (No. 12624.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 9, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 1, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contracts \S 26—When offer made by mail, contract complete when acceptance mailed, though not received.

A person who by the United States mail sends to another an offer or proposal which requires only the latter's acceptance or confirmation to create a valid contract, and who says nothing as to how the answer of acceptance or confirmation shall be communicated, nor that it shall take effect only upon the actual receipt of the acceptance by the offerer, impliedly adopts the mails as his agency, and authorizes its use in the transmission to him of an acceptance. Where the recipient of the offer thus duly deposits his acceptance in the mail, in an envelope properly stamped and addressed to the offerer, the contract thereupon becomes complete and binding, without reference to whether or not the acceptance actually reaches the addressee. Civil Code 1910, § 4231; Levy v. Cohen, 4 Ga. 1(2); Bryant v. Booze, 55 Ga. 438(5); 6 Ruling Case Law, 610-613; 18 Corpus Juris, 800, 801, and cases cited.

2. Contracts \S 353(2) — Evidence \S 89 — Testimony as to nonreceipt of letter to be considered with other facts on question whether mailed; charge as to considering evidence of nonreceipt of letter on question whether it was mailed not erroneous.

The rule that, where a letter is written, properly addressed, stamped, and mailed, the presumption arising that it was received by the addressee is merely prima facie, and may be successfully rebutted by uncontradicted evidence of the addressee that he did not in fact receive it (Hamilton v. Stewart, 108 Ga. 472, 476, 34 S. E. 123; Cassel v. Randall, 10 Ga. App. 587[1], 73 S. E. 858; Strauss Bros. v. Pearlman, 15 Ga. App. 86[1], 82 S. E. 578; Parker v. Southern Ruralist Co., 15 Ga. App. 334[2], 337, 83 S. E. 158) has no application in a case such as here stated, except in so far as the addressee's evidence that he did not receive the letter of acceptance may be considered by the jury along with the other facts and circumstances, as negating the other party's evidence that it had been mailed. This in effect was what the court charged. Immediately after, and in the same connection with the excerpt complained of, wherein the court charged that, if the acceptance was properly addressed, stamped, and mailed, the presumption of law is that the addressee would receive it, he proceeded to make clear that the real question was not whether the acceptance was actually received, but whether it was thus addressed, stamped, and deposited in the mail, by informing the jury that, if it was not received, "then you can take that, in connection with all the facts and circumstances, in determining whether or not this acceptance on the part of the plaintiff was ever mailed in the manner in which I have designated to you."

On Motion for Rehearing.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

3. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 29—Whether acceptance of offer was mailed held a question for the jury.

The other facts and circumstances, in addition to the positive testimony for plaintiffs that a letter accepting defendant's offer was mailed, and defendant's positive testimony that it was not received, held to make a question for the jury as to mailing of the acceptance.

JENKINS, P. J. [1, 2] Judgment affirmed.

STEPHENS and HILL, JJ., concur.

On Motion for Rehearing.

JENKINS, P. J. [3] In the 2d division of the syllabus, it is held that—

"The addressee's evidence that he did not receive the letter of acceptance may be considered by the jury along with the other facts and circumstances, as negating the other party's evidence that it had been mailed."

It is contended by plaintiffs in error that "there was in the evidence in the cause no other facts and circumstances tending to negative the evidence of Rowntree that the letter in question was mailed," and that, therefore, the charge of the court (which in effect was as stated in the syllabus) was error, and the evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiffs. Their argument is that—

"Where a sender testifies that he properly mailed a letter to the addressee, and the addressee testifies that he did not receive it, then the presumption as to the regularity of the mails, which would call for the conclusion that the letter was duly received, must yield to the presumption that witnesses speak the truth, and the only conclusion admissible is that the letter was lost in the mails;" there being no facts and circumstances to corroborate the presumption that the letter was received, or to discredit the testimony that it was not received.

In Parker v. Southern Ruralist Co., 15 Ga. App. 334 (2), 83 S. E. 158, it was held:

"Where the evidence shows that a letter was written and duly mailed, properly addressed, a presumption arises that it was received by the addressee; but this presumption is successfully rebutted where there is uncontradicted evidence of the addressee that the letter was never received, unless the presumption is supported by such aliunde evidence that it was in fact received as is sufficient to raise an issue as to the credibility of the positive testimony that it was not received."

In Strauss Bros. v. Pearlman, 15 Ga. App. 86, 82 S. E. 578, it was held:

"While the presumption that a letter properly addressed, stamped, and mailed was in due course of mail delivered to the addressee is not conclusive, and may be rebutted by proof that it was not received, still the probative value of the testimony adduced in rebuttal is a question solely for the jury. Unless this presumption is supported either by circumstances or by direct proof showing that the letter was received by the addressee, positive testimony that it was not received, if neither contradicted nor discredited, is sufficient to rebut the presumption. But in any case where the presumption, aided and supported by evidence that the addressee in fact received the letter, comes in conflict with positive testimony that the letter was not received, the issue raised is one of fact only, for solution by the jury."

In such a case, the presumption that the properly mailed letter reached the addressee in due course "rests upon the inference, supported by experience, that the postal authorities, as the governmental agency for delivering mail matter, will perform their duty." In other words, there is a presumption arising both from the fact that the mails are an official agency of the government and from the daily facts of common experience, that properly mailed and addressed letters are not lost in the mails. This presumption comes to the aid of the sender's positive evidence as to the mailing of the letter, and authorizes, in the absence of other proof, a conclusion that it was actually received by the addressee. But where the addressee swears positively that he did not receive the letter, and there is no aliunde proof as to such actual receipt, the presumptive evidence yields to the positive, and the jury must find in favor of the addressee.

Whether, in a case where the question is not whether the letter was received, but, as in the instant case, whether or not it was mailed, the presumption of safe delivery would so aid the positive testimony of the addressee that he did not receive the letter as could permit such testimony, without any other facts and circumstances, to rebut the sender's testimony of proper mailing, it is unnecessary here to determine; this for the reason that in the case at bar there appear certain other facts and circumstances which the jury was authorized to consider in determining the issue as to whether the letter had been mailed. In a letter from plaintiffs to defendant, dated November 5, 1919, there is the following statement over the plaintiff's signature:

"We are just in receipt of your letter of the 3d inst., replying to our telegram of same date, in which you state that you have not sold us any cotton, that you tried to, but that we never confirmed purchase. Replying beg to advise that on August 16th we confirmed purchase from you of 20 bales of cotton as per your contract dated August 14th."

In the plaintiff's depositions there is a variance as to this alleged date of confirmation, as follows:

"The contract with F. A. Bush in which we purchased 20 bales of cotton from him was accepted by us immediately on receipt of his contract, which we received by mail on August 18th, when a letter of confirmation was sent him, Exhibit 2 being herewith attached, which is a carbon copy of letter of confirmation sent him."

This exhibit, which is the alleged letter in question, also bears date August 18, 1919. As an additional fact and circumstance, the addressee testified, without dispute, that the time required for a letter to go from Richland, Ga., to Bartlett, Tex. (the address of defendant to that of plaintiffs), was "not over 30 hours." As August 14 was the date of defendant's offer and letter to the plaintiffs, this evidence tended to rebut plaintiff's testimony that they accepted and confirmed defendant's offer "immediately on receipt of his contract" on August 18, by mailing to him on that date a confirmation and acceptance. The record does not disclose the price at which November cotton was quoted at the time the alleged contract was made on August 18. The record does, however, show that spot cotton on that date was worth but 27 cents; although the plaintiffs allege and testify that they then agreed to pay the amount of 33 cents, or an excess of 6 cents a pound, for cotton to be delivered about three months thereafter.

GEORGIA LAND CO. v. DAVIS.
(No. 12713.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 20, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Principal and agent §22(2)—Declarations of agent may be admissible as res gestæ to prove agency where there is other evidence of agency.

This is an action for damages against a corporation for an assault and battery by its alleged agent upon the plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that the defendant, through its superintendent and other laborers, was proceeding to construct wire fencing upon property owned and possessed by plaintiff, and after the defendant had been notified in writing of the plaintiff's title and possession; that when the plaintiff attempted to cut the wire, this agent and superintendent, without excuse or provocation, struck the plaintiff upon the hip with a club axe, felling him to the ground, and, when the plaintiff attempted to rise, again struck him with the axe, splitting open his face and otherwise injuring him, so that he was rendered unconscious; and that this agent repeated the assault while the plaintiff was on the ground, in a helpless condition, by kicking him and striking him on the body with a hammer. The plaintiff and the defendant corporation both offered evidence tending to show title in themselves to the property in question. The defendant sought to disclaim any agency on the part of the person committing the assault, but only on the theory that, while the fencing was being done upon property claimed by the corporation, it was for and on behalf of two of the corporate officers as individuals. The testimony for the plaintiff fully sustained his allegations; and there was uncontroverted evidence that after he had been felled to the ground and was lying in a helpless condition the alleged agent renewed the battery by striking the plaintiff with a hammer and kicking him. A verdict in the amount of $500 was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant excepts to the overruling of its motion for a new trial. Held:

"Declarations of an alleged agent are not by themselves admissible to prove agency, but it may be established by proving circumstances, apparent relations, and the conduct of the parties; and where the extraneous circumstances, independently of and without regard to the declarations of the agent himself, clearly tend to establish the fact of his agency, his declarations, though inadmissible if standing alone, may, as a part of the res gestæ of the transaction, be considered." Collier v. Schoenberg, 6 Ga. App. 496, 106 S. E. 581. The record discloses certain direct and positive evidence, as well as facts and circumstances, under which the declaration of the alleged agent was admissible, and from which the jury was fully authorized to find such agency.

2. Assault and battery §27, 32—Evidence §71—Muniments of title admissible in action growing out of property dispute; evidence that defendant was informed of plaintiff's claim to land in connection with which assault committed admissible; letter shown to have been mailed not inadmissible because not shown to have been received.

The defendant, as well as the plaintiff, introduced in evidence its muniments of title; but irrespective of whether under these circumstances the defendant can be heard to complain of such evidence in behalf of the plaintiff, the question is controlled adversely to the defendant by the ruling of this court in Zoucks v. State, 19 Ga. App. 744(3), 92 S. E. 228. Likewise, for a similar reason and as a circumstance affecting the right and amount of punitive damages, the letter written by plaintiff to derendant prior to the injury, in which he informed it of his claim of title and possession of the land on which the assault was committed, was admissible; nor was it inadmissible on the ground that there was no proof of its receipt by defendant before the injury, since it was shown to have been properly mailed in time to have been duly received before the alleged agent attempted to fence the land. Hamilton v. Stewart, 108 Ga. 472, 476, 84 S. E. 123; Rowntree Bros. v. Bush, 111 S. E. 217, and cases cited.

3. Remaining assignments without merit.

The remaining assignments of error, including the exceptions taken upon the instructions of the court and the failure to charge as requested by the defendant, are without merit; and, as we view the record, not only was the verdict for the plaintiff authorized, but under the evidence submitted a verdict in his favor was demanded.

Carriers \Leftrightarrow 66—Contracts \Leftrightarrow 346(12)—Judgment \Leftrightarrow 250—Plaintiff must recover on cause of action pleaded; no recovery on quantum meruit, when express contract pleaded; railroad is no contractual relationship to parties to whom another road furnishes a car.

A plaintiff must recover upon the cause of action as laid in the petition. Napier v. Strong, 19 Ga. App. 401(2), 91 S. E. 579. In the instant case the petition is in one count, and sues for a "debt contracted with petitioner" upon defendant's "obligation to pay" $1 per day for the use of a described car. Having thus sued on an express contract to pay a certain amount, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on a quantum meruit. Frierson v. Fincher, 134 Ga. 113, 67 S. E. 541; Baldwin v. Lesner, 8 Ga. 71; Haygood v. Perkins, 142 Ga. 168, 82 S. E. 544; Sylvania R. Co. v. Sylvania Lumber Co., 8 Ga. App. 656, 70 S. E. 51; Shropshire v. Heard, 27 Ga. App. 256, 107 S. E. 892. Moreover, even if the petition could be construed as being an action on a quantum meruit, the evidence fails to disclose any sort of actual or implied contractual relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant from which a promise to pay could be implied, since it appears that the car was in fact furnished by a different railroad company, and there is nothing to indicate that the defendant asked for or accepted the car from the plaintiff, or that in its dealings with the other company it was in fact dealing with the plaintiff through its agent.

HARRISON v. STATE. (No. 13118.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1, Feb. 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law \Leftrightarrow 424(1)—Statement of one jointly indicted with defendant held admissible.

Under the facts of the case the admission of the testimony complained of in the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial was not error.

2. Witnesses \Leftrightarrow 274(2)—Cross-examination of character witness as to having heard that defendant was charged with stealing property permitted.

There is no merit in ground 2 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial. The record shows that a witness for the defendant, who had just testified to the good character of the accused, was asked by the solicitor general, on cross-examination, the following question: "Did you know that this man Harrison, the defendant, is charged with the offense of stealing gasoline from a drug store out here in West End, breaking into the gasoline tank and stealing gasoline?" The witness answered, "I have just heard it." The admission of this evidence was not error for any reason assigned. Moreover, substantially the same evidence was subsequently given by the same witness without any objection.

3. Ground not approved.

Ground 3 of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is disapproved by the trial court.

4. Criminal law §1103—Ground complaining of failure to charge on impeachment by contradictory statements not sustained when brief of evidence shows no contradictory statements.

Complaint is made in the remaining special ground of the motion for a new trial that the court erred in its charge upon the impeachment of witnesses, because the charge contained no reference to the impeachment of a witness by proof of previous statements made by him which were material to the case and to his testimony and contradictory to his testimony upon the trial of the case. It is alleged in the ground that this omission was error because "the principal ground on which the principal witness for the prosecution was sought to be impeached was by proof of contradictory statements which were material to the issue on trial and which were made on a previous trial in the city court." There is no merit in this ground of the motion, as a careful examination of the brief of evidence fails to disclose any such contradictory statements.

5. Criminal law §935(1)—New trial properly denied when evidence sufficient.

The conviction was amply authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Jno. D. Humphries, Judge.

A. E. Harrison was convicted of robbery by intimidation, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The first ground of the amended motion for a new trial was as follows:

First. Because material evidence was illegally admitted by the court over objection of the defendant, to wit: Because the court permitted T. P. Thrallkill, a witness for the state, to testify that the day the offense for which the defendant was on trial was alleged to have been committed, one Cathey, jointly indicted with the defendant and who was not on trial, came to the witness' place of business and left with him some money; that the said Cathey was alone at the time, and the defendant was not with him, and the witness did not know the defendant, and permitted the witness to give the particulars of the conversation which the witness had with the said Cathey at the time the money was left with the witness, the witness stating that the said Cathey left with him $225, or told the witness that he had $225 in the roll of money which he handed him (the witness), the witness saying that he had never counted it; that the money belonged to his (Cathey's) wife and that he wanted him (the witness) to keep the money until he returned from a raid on which he was going; that this occurred on the morning of the day after the alleged crime was committed, and on the same day, about 11:30, Cathey came back and got the money and left. Defendant, through his attorney, objected to the aforesaid testimony: First, because there was no evidence showing any conspiracy whatever between Cathey and the witness and the defendant Harrison on the trial; second, the defendant, Harrison, was not present when the statement was made testified about; third, that if there was a common enterprise or conspiracy between the defendant, Harrison and Cathey, such enterprise and conspiracy had been ended, and any declaration made by Cathey was not admissible as evidence against Harrison under the statutes of this state, even assuming that the conspiracy had been entered into as alleged between Harrison and the witness; fourth, because there was no evidence whatever that a conspiracy had been entered into between Harrison, the defendant, and Cathey. Movant, says that the evidence thus admitted was illegal and extremely harmful and prejudicial to the defendant, and the court illegally admitted the same over objection of attorney for the movant which was then and there urged as herein set forth.

The defendant was convicted of forgery. The assignments of error upon the admission of testimony are without merit. The charge of the court was full and fair. The motion to declare a mistrial, as presented here, is also without merit. The defendant has had a legal trial, and his guilt was abundantly established. 1. Appeal and error \S 966(2)—Denial of continuance for illness of party present when motion made not disturbed, unless discretion abused.

Where a party to a cause makes a motion for a continuance upon the ground of his illness, and he is present when the motion is made, and his condition is passed upon by the court as by inspection, the discretion of the court in denying the motion will not be controlled, unless manifestly abused. Carter v. Pitts, 125 Ga. 792, 54 S. E. 695. Under this ruling, and the facts of the instant case, the refusal of the motion for a continuance was not error.

The defendant was convicted of a violation of the prohibition law. Upon conflicting evidence the jury were authorized to find him guilty. The defendant's special ground in his motion for new trial, which alleges that the court erred in permitting the state's witness to testify that he paid the defendant for the whisky which the defendant sold him by giving him a check, is without merit. The best evidence rule does not apply in an instance like this. The witness having sworn that he bought the whisky, it was not error to allow him to testify that he paid for the whisky by giving a bank check for it. The check was not the basis of the action, and was only collaterally involved. See, in this connection, Southern States v. McManus, 113 Ga. 982(2), 39 S. E. 480; Sasser v. Campbell, 9 Ga. MUMFORD v. STRIBBLING. (No. 12728.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 1.
March 7, 1922.)*(Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)1. Replevin \S 59—Description of cotton held insufficient.

In bail trover, a description of the property in the petition as a sufficient amount of cotton at 23 cents a pound, grown on B.'s place, to pay a specified principal sum with interest, which amount of cotton was above the amount due defendant as rent, defendant having no other cotton except that grown on the place, whether in the seed or in the field, or packed in jute bags or otherwise, was insufficient, as it would not enable the court to seize the chattels and did not isolate the thing sued for from the general class to which it belonged.

2. Pleading \S 34(4)—Taken most strongly against pleader when contradictory.

When the terms of a description of cotton in a petition in bail trover are contradictory, the pleading must be taken most strongly against the pleader.

O. J. Perryman, of Lincolnton, for plaintiff in error.

Burnside & McWhorter, of Lincolnton, for defendant in error.

BLOODWORTH, J. [1] This was a bail-trover case. In the petition as amended the description of the property for which suit was brought is as follows:

"A sufficient amount of cotton at 23 cents per pound, grown on the place of Joe Butler in Lincoln county, Georgia, to pay the principal sum of $280.21, besides interest on said sum at 8 per cent. per annum, which amount of cotton was over and above the amount said Mumford was due as rent of the premises on which same was grown in the year 1920, said Mumford having no other cotton except that grown on said place, whether in the seed or in the field, or packed in jute bagging or otherwise, which said cotton was raised on the place of Joe Butler in Lincoln county, Georgia, in 1920, the defendant having in his possession no other cotton than that raised on said place."

In bail-trover proceedings the rule as to the description of the property sued for, as laid down by this court and the Supreme Court, is that—

"The goods should be described with such particularity as would enable the court to seize the chattels for which the suit is brought, and hold them for restitution in the event of final recovery by the plaintiff." Gatlin v. Mathews, 16 Ga. App. 645, 85 S. E. 953, and citations.

See, also, Harper v. Jeffers, 139 Ga. 760 (2), 78 S. E. 172.

This rule is somewhat differently expressed in Collins v. West, 5 Ga. App. 429(1), 63 S. E. 540, where this court said:

"In an action of bail trover, the petition must definitely identify the property by a particular description, or by a general description coupled with such additional allegations as to the time and place or manner of the taking or conversion as plainly to isolate the thing sued for from the general class to which it belongs."

See citations.

Applying the ruling in the above-cited cases to the facts of the case now under consideration, the cotton sought to be recovered is not "described with such particularity as would enable the court to seize the chattels for which the suit is brought and hold them for restitution in the event of final recovery by the plaintiff;" nor is the description of the property such as "plainly to isolate the thing sued for from the general class to which it belongs." Had nothing been said in the description about interest, it would be easy to determine the number of pounds of cotton for which the plaintiff sued; but this cannot be done when the amount due for interest is uncertain. Even if the exact number of pounds of cotton could be arrived at, still the particular cotton represented by the number of pounds is not pointed out. Granting, but not conceding, that the amount of cotton which would be arrived at by such a calculation would be sufficient to cover all the cotton raised on the place of Joe Butler in

111 S.E.—15

1920, the officer would not be authorized to seize all of this cotton, because the petition shows that the cotton sought to be recovered by the plaintiff was not all of the cotton, but was that portion "over and above the amount said Mumford was due as rent of the premises on which same was grown in the year 1920."

[2] Some of the terms of the description of the cotton are contradictory, and in such a case the rule is that the pleadings must be taken most strongly against the pleader. Moreover, to say that the cotton was "in the seed, or in the field, or packed in jute bagging, or otherwise," leaves the description so indefinite that it would not permit of the seizure by the officer of any particular cotton. The court therefore erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition, and the subsequent proceedings were nugatory.

BAGLEY v. HINESVILLE BANK.
(No. 12766.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
March 20, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Usury \S 78, 146—When note was for usurious interest, entire amount forfeited; promise to pay usury unenforceable, whether as to interest already earned or to accrue.

The defendant executed on December 1, 1916, a promissory note for $1,000, due to the plaintiff bank on January 1, 1917, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum from maturity. No interest having been paid, the maker, on August 27, 1919, executed in favor of the bank another note for $360, due January 1, 1920, bearing interest at 8 per cent. from its date. The bank brought suit against the maker solely on the latter interest note. In the trial there was undisputed testimony by the defendant, in support of his plea of usury, to the effect that he gave the plaintiff the interest note sued on "to cover 12 per cent. interest on the $1,000 note * * * from January 1, 1917, to January 1, 1920," but that at the time he gave such interest note $218.86 was the correct interest at the lawful rate due and unpaid on the $1,000 note from its maturity, January 1, 1917, to the date of execution of the latter note, August 27, 1919. The court on its own motion directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $218.86, as representing the lawful interest accrued on the original note at the time the interest note actually sued on was given. Held, the act of August 18, 1916 (Acts 1916, p. 48; Park's Ann. Code Supp. 1917, §§ 3438, 3438 [a]), provides that "any person, company, or corporation violating the provisions of section 3436, shall forfeit the entire interest so charged or taken, or contracted to be reserved, charged or taken." Since, under the undisputed evidence, the note sued on represents interest charged or taken upon the original note in excess of the 8 per cent. originally contracted for, the defendant was entitled to invoke the statutory forfeiture, not only as to the 4 per cent. excess charge, but of the entire interest represented by the note sued on, and it was error for the court to direct a verdict, against the defendant's plea of usury, in favor of the plaintiff in the amount of interest which had legally accrued at the time the usurious interest note actually sued on was given. A promise in which the sole obligation is for the payment of interest infected with usury is altogether incapable of enforcement, and it makes no difference whether such invalid and usurious promise relates back to the payment of an alleged amount on account of interest already earned, or whether it relates to usurious interest which shall accrue in the future.

SCOTT SCHOOL DIST. et al. v. CARTER et al. (No. 13198.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2
March 20, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

Schools and school districts \S 97(4)—Notice for 30 days in newspaper for publication of sheriff's advertisements is condition precedent to bond election.

As a condition precedent to the holding of an election for school bonds under section 143 of the Code of School Laws, approved August 19, 1919 (Ga. L. 1919, pp. 345, 346), a notice of such election must be published for 30 days next preceding the day of the election, in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements for the county are published.

Error from Superior Court, Johnson County; J. L. Kent, Judge.

Proceeding by Scott School District and others against J. W. Carter and others. Judgment dismissing the petition, and petitioners bring error. Affirmed.

Larsen & Crockett, of Dublin, and E. L. Stephens, of Wrightsville, for plaintiffs in error.

J. S. Adams and R. Earl Camp, both of Dublin, for defendants in error.

STEPHENS, J. This was a proceeding instituted in the superior court of Johnson county by E. L. Stephens, solicitor general of the Dublin judicial circuit, acting for and in behalf of the state of Georgia, for the purpose of validating a proposed issue of bonds authorized by an election held in Scott school district. The defendants in error regularly intervened and demurred to the proceedings, upon the ground that it does not appear from the petition that any notice of the proposed election was published in a newspaper for the space of thirty days next preceding the day of the election, as required by law. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and to this judgment the petitioners except.

Neither the petition nor the notice declaring the result of the election given by the trustees of the school district to the solicitor general shows that such notice was given. The election was called upon the question of issuing bonds for school purposes, and was held under the authority of section 143 of the Code of School Laws enacted by the Legislature of this state, approved August 19, 1919 (Ga. L. 1919, pp. 345, 346). This section provides that when an election is called under its authority the authorities named therein in the act shall "call such election in terms of law now provided for a county issue of bonds except as herein otherwise provided." It follows, therefore, that in the absence of any provision in this act as to any notice required as a condition precedent to the holding of the election, the provision as to notice required when an election is called for a county issue of bonds applies. The notice there required is publication in the newspaper in which the sheriff's advertisements for the county are published for a space of 30 days next preceding the day of the election. Civil Code 1910, § 440.

It is contended by the plaintiffs that section 143 of the Code of School Laws adopted in 1919 contains a specific provision, otherwise providing that only 10 days' notice, under certain conditions, be given prior to the holding of an election called under this act, and that therefore such provision renders inoperative the provision as to 30 days' notice in Civil Code (1910), § 440, regulating the issuance of bonds by counties, and which would be otherwise applicable to elections held under the provisions of section 143 of the act of 1919. The provision of section 143 of the act of 1919 thus relied on by the plaintiffs reads as follows:

"Said board of trustees or board of education may order such election to be held on the school site or other suitable place in the school district, consolidated district or county, of which they shall give notice by posting same at three public places in said school district, consolidated district or county, not less than ten days previous to said election."

This provision as to 10 days' notice, by its very terms, applies only when the proposed election is to be held at some place other than the regular voting or election precinct in the district, without which notice the election must necessarily be held at the regular voting or election precinct as required by section 441 of the Civil Code (1910), governing an election for a county issue of bonds. This provision of section 143 of the act of 1919, providing for 10 days' notice that the election is "to be held on the school site or other suitable place in the school district," is not the notice required as a condition precedent to the holding of the election, and therefore does not supersede the provision as to 30 days' notice required for a county issue of bonds which, unless "otherwise provided," is applicable to elections held under section 143 of the act of 1919.

It not appearing that the required 30 days' notice was given of the intention to hold the election, the proceedings instituted by the solicitor general to validate the proposed issue of bonds was subject to the demurrer interposed. The court, therefore, did not err in sustaining the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

ROWNTREE BROS. v. BUSH. (No. 12624.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia, Division No. 2.
March 9, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 1, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Contracts \S 26—When offer made by mail, contract complete when acceptance mailed, though not received.

A person who by the United States mail sends to another an offer or proposal which requires only the latter's acceptance or confirmation to create a valid contract, and who says nothing as to how the answer of acceptance or confirmation shall be communicated, nor that it shall take effect only upon the actual receipt of the acceptance by the offerer, impliedly adopts the mails as his agency, and authorizes its use in the transmission to him of an acceptance. Where the recipient of the offer thus duly deposits his acceptance in the mail, in an envelope properly stamped and addressed to the offerer, the contract thereupon becomes complete and binding, without reference to whether or not the acceptance actually reaches the addressee. Civil Code 1910, § 4231; Levy v. Cohen, 4 Ga. 1(2); Bryant v. Booze, 55 Ga. 438(5); 6 Ruling Case Law. 610-618; 18 Corpus Juris, 800, 301, and cases cited.

2. Contracts \S 353(2) — Evidence \S 89 — Testimony as to nonreceipt of letter to be considered with other facts on question whether mailed; charge as to considering evidence of nonreceipt of letter on question whether it was mailed not erroneous.

The rule that, where a letter is written, properly addressed, stamped, and mailed, the presumption arising that it was received by the addressee is merely prima facie, and may be successfully rebutted by uncontradicted evidence of the addressee that he did not in fact receive it (Hamilton v. Stewart, 108 Ga. 472, 476, 34 S. E. 123; Cassel v. Randall, 10 Ga. App. 587[1], 73 S. E. 858; Strauss Bros. v. Pearlman, 15 Ga. App. 86[1], 82 S. E. 578; Parker v. Southern Ruralist Co., 15 Ga. App. 334[2], 337, 83 S. E. 158) has no application in a case such as here stated, except in so far as the addressee's evidence that he did not receive the letter of acceptance may be considered by the jury along with the other facts and circumstances, as negating the other party's evidence that it had been mailed. This in effect was what the court charged. Immediately after, and in the same connection with the excerpt complained of, wherein the court charged that, if the acceptance was properly addressed, stamped, and mailed, the presumption of and there was a very warm attachment and unusual devotion between the father and the son, the court, in granting the mother a divorce from the father, did not err in giving the father custody of the child each alternate week.

6. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 194—Wife entitled to counsel fees and expenses of brief on affirmance of decree on husband's appeal, in which she had assigned cross-error as to portion of decree relating to custody of child.

On husband's appeal from decree granting wife a divorce, in which the wife assigns as cross-error that portion of decree giving husband the custody of their child each alternate week, the wife on affirmance of the decree will be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee for services of her counsel in the appellate court and the expenses of the preparation and the printing of the counsel's brief.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Suit by Alice Smith Barnard against W. Frank Barnard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Williams, Loyall & Tunstall, of Norfolk, for appellant.

E. R. F. Wells, of Norfolk, for appellee.

BURKS, J. Alice Smith Barnard brought a suit for a divorce from bed and board against her husband, W. Frank Barnard, on the ground of cruelty, reasonable apprehension of bodily harm, and constructive desertion. The bill also prayed for the custody of their child, a boy about five years of age, for suit money and for alimony. The defendant answered the bill denying specifically every allegation thereof, and further charging his wife with various acts of incontinence and with conduct on her part entitling him to a divorce from the bond of matrimony. He prayed that his answer, in so far as it charged his wife with incontinence and misconduct, be treated as a cross-bill, and it was so treated, and the wife answered the same, denying specifically every allegation thereof. On the motion of the complainant (Mrs. Barnard) and with the consent of the defendant, the trial court ordered that the testimony in the cause (except that of certain witnesses beyond the jurisdiction of the court) be given orally in open court, and a day fixed for the hearing. The testimony was subsequently so taken, and 44 witnesses were examined in open court, and five, who were nonresidents, testified by depositions, after due notice. On October 23, 1920, the trial court entered a decree dismissing the defendant's cross-bill and granting to the complainant (Mrs. Barnard) a divorce from bed and board on the grounds stated in her bill. Costs were awarded to Mrs. Barnard, and she was given a decree against her husband for $100 a month for the support and maintenance of herself and of her child while the latter is in her custody, and the custody of the child was awarded to each of the parents for one week at a time, alternate weeks. The cause was retained on the docket until the further order of the court. From this decree the defendant, W. Frank Barnard, was awarded an appeal.

[1] The testimony in the case is of the most conflicting nature. There is hardly a material fact in the case upon which the testimony on the two sides is in harmony. It is necessary, therefore, in the outset to determine what weight is to be given to the decree of the trial court which heard the parties, and most of their witnesses testify orally, in open court. We have no interpretation of our statute on the subject. Section 5109 of the Code is as follows:

"In any suit for divorce the trial court may require the whole or any part of the testimony to be given orally in open court, and if either party desires it, such testimony and the rulings of the court on the exceptions thereto, if any, shall be reduced to writing, and the judge shall certify that such evidence was given before him and such rulings made. When so certified the same shall stand on the same footing as a deposition regularly taken in the cause."

This section is taken from Acts of 1914, p. 154, which is as follows:

"In all divorce cases pending at the time this law goes into effect, or thereafter instituted, it shall be within the discretion of the court to require the testimony, or any part of it, to be delivered ore tenus in open court, and testimony so delivered, together with exceptions taken to the rulings of the court on questions of evidence, together with the evidence taken in the cause, shall be preserved and put into the record of the cause for the purpose of an appeal, and the cause on appeal shall be heard as other chancery causes and not as on a demurrer to evidence, and within the same time as now provided by law."

[2] There is no revisor's note to section 5109 indicating what, if any, change was intended by the change in the phraseology of the act, which generally means that no material change was intended, as explained by the revisors in the preface to the Code, pp. xi, xii. There is, however, one material change made by the Code. The act of 1914 declared that the oral testimony taken on the hearing "shall be preserved and put into the record of the cause for the purpose of an appeal," whereas section 5109 of the Code only requires this to be done "if either party desires it." There was no necessity for this expense unless one of the parties, for some cause, desired it, and if no appeal was to be taken the parties might prefer that the testimony should be kept out of the permanent files of the court as well as to avoid the costs thereof. This difference between the two statutes is manifest and must be given effect even though not noted by the revisors. Other differences in the phraseology of the two statutes do not manifest an intent to change the meaning, and the presumption, supported by the statement of the revisors in the preface aforesaid, is that no change was intended. The act of 1914 declared that "the cause on appeal shall be heard as other chancery causes and not as on a demurrer to evidence," whereas section 5109 of the Code, referring to the certificate of the oral testimony, declares that "when so certified the same shall stand on the same footing as a deposition regularly taken in the cause." In other words, the suit was still a suit in chancery, and the rule requiring cases at law to be heard as on a demurrer to the evidence had no application. The language of the Code is not as apt as it might have been to accomplish this purpose, but it is fairly plain that the revisors did not intend any substantial change in this respect, and this view accords with the notes of the writer of this opinion who was one of the revisors. Other sections of the chapter on divorce clearly negative the idea that a suit for divorce could ever be heard "as on demurrer to the evidence." Section 5109, however, does not determine what weight shall be given to the decree of the trial court where the evidence has been given orally before it. When all of the evidence in a chancery cause, as well as the pleadings, have been reduced to writing, and that court has nothing before it but the written record, including the evidence prepared by others, it has little, if any, advantage of this court in determining the right of the cause. But the case is entirely different where the trial court has the witnesses before it and can observe their demeanor on the stand, and their manner of testifying. This is important in determining their credibility and the weight to be given to their testimony. It is something that cannot be photographed or otherwise placed on the record for review by an appellate court, and great weight has always been attached to the finding of the tribunal charged with weighing such evidence, whether it be a commissioner in chancery, a jury, or a court. Of these tribunals, the least weight is given to the findings of a commissioner in chancery, but even in that case it is said:

"When, therefore, the commissioner has seen and examined the witnesses, and the testimony is conflicting, and his conclusions are clearly supported by competent and unimpeached witnesses, the court will not set aside or disturb his report, unless the weight of the testimony which is contrary to his conclusions is such, on account of the number of the witnesses and the nature of their evidence, as to make it clear that the commissioner has erred." Shipman v. Fletcher, 91 Va. 473, 479, 22 S. E. 458, 460.

In enacting the act of 1914 the Legislature may have thought that, because the testimony was taken orally, some one might conceive the idea that it might be demurred to, or that on an appeal the case should be heard as on a demurrer to the evidence, and inserted the provision, out of abundant caution, in order to negative that idea, but no such idea could ever have been sustained. The suit for divorce is a chancery suit, where the court decides both the law and the facts, and no jury is needed, and, where there is no jury, there can be no demurrer to the evidence. Reed & McCormick v. Gold, 102 Va. 37, 45 S. E. 868. But, more particularly, there can be no demurrer to the evidence nor hearing of a case as on a demurrer to the evidence in a suit for divorce because the concessions required in such case are forbidden by section 5108 of the Code, which has been the fixed policy of this state for over three-quarters of a century. Code 1849, c. 109, § 9. There was no necessity, therefore, for the clause in the act of 1914 forbidding the hearing as on a demurrer to the evidence, and it was omitted by the revisors. The same principle now prevails, and the case cannot be heard as on a demurrer to the evidence. Whether, under the existing law, the finding of the trial court shall be given the same force as the verdict of a jury, as is done in actions at law where the whole case is submitted to the judge, without the intervention of a jury, it is unnecessary to decide, as we are of opinion that such finding is, at the least, entitled to the weight of the report of a commissioner in chancery, upon conflicting testimony, who saw and heard the witnesses testify, and whose report is supported by competent evidence and approved by the trial court. The provision of section 5109 of the Code putting the certified evidence on "the same footing as a deposition" could not have been intended to deprive the trial court of the chief benefit conferred upon it by that section, that of seeing the witnesses and hearing them testify. The judge was to hear the case and decide it on its merits, "independently of the admissions of either party in the pleadings or otherwise," and, in order to reach a righteous judgment, the statute, for the first time in this state, conferred upon the court the right to "require the whole or any part of the testimony to be given orally in open court." The object of the statute was not to save costs to the parties, nor to keep the testimony from the permanent files of the court, but to give the court the opportunity of seeing and hearing the witnesses. The right to have oral testimony in open court is not conferred upon the parties, but upon the court, and it could only have been for the reasons stated. To give to such testimony only the weight given to a deposition taken before some other officer would practically nullify the statute, which could never have been intended. A deposition of a witness must be reduced to writing. It must be signed by the deponent. It must be taken after due notice to the adverse party. It must be taken before an officer authorized by law to administer an oath, who must certify that he did administer the oath to the deponent, all exceptions to questions must be noted at the proper place, and he must then return the deposition to the officer and in the manner required by law. It must in some way appear from the record that the opposing party was afforded the opportunity to cross-examine the witness. In these respects the certified evidence is to stand on "the same footing" as a deposition regularly taken in the cause. But the two are not entitled to the same weight, and the language of the statute, when read as a whole as it should be, manifests a purpose on the part of the Legislature to put the trial court in a better position to decide the case, by hearing the evidence "orally in open court," than it was when confined to hearing the case on depositions only.

The evidence in this case is very voluminous, consisting largely of many charges and counter charges, explanations and counter explanations, and inculpatory or explanatory circumstances or corroboration of one side or the other. The record shows that the litigants are persons of character and good standing in the community in which they live, and, in our view of the statute aforesaid, a detailed examination and discussion of the evidence is unnecessary, and to place it upon the permanent records of this court would not be conducive to the happiness of the litigants or their offspring. It must be sufficient to say that it has been carefully read and considered, with an earnest desire to do justice between the parties. The learned and upright judge of the trial court was in a far better position than this court to correctly determine the rights of the parties, and, while there is much conflict in the testimony, there is abundant evidence to support his decree, and we are unable to say that even the weight of the testimony is contrary to his conclusion. Indeed, if the certified evidence was given no more weight than a deposition, we should still be unable to say that the decree of the trial court was erroneous. His finding, therefore, will be affirmed.

[3] The appellee assigns as cross-error the refusal of the trial court to increase the allowance of $100 a month to her for the support and maintenance of herself and child to $150 a month. In this there was no error. The appellant is a young lawyer with no fixed income, but a practice of variable value, with no income-producing property. His income from his practice for the year 1919 was about $3,500, but for the six months prior to the date of testifying did not exceed $100 a month. He lives in an expensive home which he had provided for himself and wife, but it is heavily mortgaged, and upon this he has the interest to pay besides the expense of the upkeep. He is also indebted from $1,000 to $1,500, and has now all the expense of both sides of this litigation to pay, and it is not clear what, if any, surplus would remain if these debts were paid. It must also be borne in mind that the appellee is a young woman, only 28 years of age, and that under modern conditions there is open to her practically every avenue for making money that is open to her husband; that by the decree of the court she is released from her former household duties; that her time is her own; that she has no right to remain idle at the expense of her former husband; and that it is her duty to minimize his loss, albeit it was through his fault that she was compelled to ask that the contract of marriage be rescinded.

[4, 5] The appellee also assigns as cross-error so much of the decree as gives to the appellant the custody of their child each alternate week. Of course, the welfare of the child is the question of primary importance. Conceding the suitability of the appellee and propriety of custody by her, it may be said on behalf of the father that it appears from the testimony that there is a very warm attachment and unusual devotion between the father and son; that it has been the habit of the father to undress him and to put him to bed at night, and to wash and dress him in the morning, and to be his constant companion when at home during the day; and that the father's home is out of the city, where the child can have abundant playground and fresh air. The record discloses that the custody of the father is as suitable and proper as that of the mother. It does not disclose any error on the part of the trial court in dividing the custody between them. The case is retained on the docket. The decree as to the custody of the child is temporary and may be changed at any time and in any manner that the best interest of the child demands. The subject of the custody of the child in a case of this kind is one of the most difficult that the courts have to deal with, and this is especially true of an appellate court. The only general rule that can be announced is that the welfare of the child is the primary matter for consideration, and that this rule is to be administered with as much consideration for the tender ties of affection of the parents as possible under the circumstances. When that appears from the record to have been done by the trial court, this court will not hunt for any other reason to affirm its decree.

[6] The appellee asks this court to give her a decree against the appellant for the clerical expense of the preparation of the brief of her counsel in this court and for the printing the same, aggregating $143.40, and also for a reasonable fee to her counsel for his services in her behalf in this court. She is entitled to this. The fee of her counsel in this case in this court will be fixed at $100, and a judgment will be entered in this court in her favor against the appellant for the aggregate of these two sums, and for her costs, and the decree of the circuit court of Norfolk county will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

ROGERS v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 16, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 3, 1922.)

1. Witnesses §40(2)—Competency of child discretionary with court.

There is no fixed age at which a child must have arrived in order to be competent as a witness; the question being discretionary with the trial court.

2. Criminal law §1153(2)—Trial court's determination as to competency of small child not disturbed except for manifest error.

Trial court's determination as to competency of child as a witness will not be disturbed on appeal except for manifest error.

3. Witnesses §40(1)—That child is too young to be convicted of perjury is not decisive of its competency.

That a child may be too young to be convicted of perjury is not decisive of its competency as a witness.

4. Witnesses §40(1), 45(2)—Rule as to competency of child stated; child witness must have consciousness of duty to speak truth.

To be competent as a witness, a child must have sufficient mental capacity to observe the data about which it has testified and record it in mind, and thereafter understand questions put to it and give intelligent answers, and must have a sense of moral responsibility, at least as to the extent of the consciousness of a duty to speak the truth.

5. Witnesses §77—Evidence held to show competency of 6 year old girl who had been victim of assault.

In prosecution for assault and battery on a girl not quite 6 years old, examination of the girl as to competency held to sustain action of court in permitting her to testify.

6. Assault and battery §91—Evidence held to sustain conviction of assault on 6 year old girl.

In prosecution for assault and battery on a 6 year old girl, in which the defendant claimed an alibi and produced character witnesses to prove his good character, evidence held to sustain conviction.

7. Criminal law §260(1)—Where jury was waived, judgment of court upon credibility of witnesses and weight of testimony stands on same footing as verdict.

Where a jury was waived, and the case was submitted to the judge, the judgment of the court upon the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony stands on the same footing as the verdict of a jury.

Error to Hustings Court of Portsmouth.

H. F. Rogers was convicted of assault and battery upon a girl less than six years of age, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Venable, Miller, Pilcher & Parsons, of Norfolk, and J. C. Foster, of Colonial Beach, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. The accused (plaintiff in error) was convicted of assault and battery upon a little girl less than 6 years of age. The case was heard de novo in the Hustings court of Portsmouth, on an appeal from the police justice, and, by consent of parties, a jury was waived and the case submitted to the judge of the court, who pronounced judgment against the accused and fixed his imprisonment at six months in jail. The chief witnesses for the commonwealth were the little girl, who lacked 2 months of being 6 years old, and her brother, of the age of 8 years. The assignments of error are, (1) the incapacity of these two children to testify, and (2) that the judgment is contrary to the law and the evidence.

[1-3] There is no fixed age at which a child must have arrived in order to be competent as a witness. Of course no one would think of calling a child 2 or 3 years of age as a witness in a case, but the whole question of competency must be left largely to the discretion of the trial court, and its judgment will not be reversed except for manifest error. He has the opportunity of seeing the child and its demeanor on the stand, which cannot be photographed in the record, and unless what is in the record clearly shows that he has committed error, his action will not be reversed. The child may be too young to be convicted of perjury, but this is not decisive of its competency as a witness. Commonwealth v. Robinson, 165 Mass. 426, 43 N. E. 121.

[4] In order to be competent as a witness, the child must have sufficient mental capacity to observe the data about which it has testified and record it in mind, and thereafter understand questions put to it and be able to give intelligent answers. There must also be a sense of moral responsibility, at least to the extent of a consciousness of a duty to speak the truth. 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 506.

In Wheeler v. United States, 159 U. S. 523, 16 Sup. Ct. 93, 40 L. Ed. 244, it is said:

"While no one would think of calling as a witness an infant only 2 or 3 years old, there is no precise age which determines the question of competency. This depends on the capacity and intelligence of the child, his appreciation of the difference between truth and falsehood, as well as of his duty to tell the former. The decision of this question rests primarily with the trial judge, who sees the proposed witness, notices his manner, his apparent possession or lack of intelligence, and may resort to any examination which will tend to disclose his capacity and intelligence as well as his understanding of the obligations of an oath. As many of these matters cannot be photographed into the record the decision of the trial judge will not be disturbed on review unless from that which is preserved it is clear that it was erroneous."

It is further said in the same case:

"Of course, care must be taken by the trial judge, especially where, as in this case, the question is one of life or death. On the other hand, to exclude from the witness stand one who shows himself capable of understanding the difference between truth and falsehood, and who does not appear to have been simply taught to tell a story, would sometimes result in staying the hand of justice."

In Commonwealth v. Ramage, 177 Mass. 349, 58 N. E. 1078, a child 6 years and 4 months old was received as a witness in a trial for an indecent assault upon her person; it being stated that the examination on the voir dire disclosed no unusual mental condition.

In Trim v. State (Miss.) 33 South. 718, a child 5 years of age was permitted to testify to the identity of a man who had killed her mother.

In State v. Blythe, 20 Utah, 378, 58 Pac. 1108, a little girl about 6 years old was permitted to testify on a prosecution of a defendant for assault upon her with intent to commit rape, and it was said that the appellate court would not interfere with the holding of the lower court if the lower court, upon examination made upon its voir dire, or upon all of its testimony, concludes that the child is competent to testify, unless there is clear abuse of its discretion apparent from the record.

In Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Co., 50 W. Va. 468, 40 S. E. 415, 55 L. R. A. 911, 88 Am. St. Rep. 884, the trial court refused to hear the testimony of infants 9, 10, and 14 years of age, respectively, on account of lack of capacity, and the appellate court said, in affirming the ruling:

"We cannot judge of the real character or degree of intelligence of these witnesses from their mere paper evidence. The judge of the circuit court had a means of decision in this matter not possessed by us, their presence face to face before him, affording him a superior means to judge, of which we are deprived. In almost every case that is the deciding test. In a great majority of cases the decision of the trial court in the matter of the competency of a child, depending as it does, not on age, but on intelligence, must be final, and 'it must be a very flagrant case of error to authorize this court to reverse the judgment.'"

Among other authorities cited are, Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 524; Wharton on Ev., § 368; State v. Edwards, 79 N. C. 648; State v. Manuel, 64 N. C. 601; State v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 565, 16 S. E. 803, 19 L. R. A. 610.

The case at bar was decided by an able and experienced judge, who had before him, not only the statements of the children on their voir dire, but also their testimony on the merits of the case. We need not go into the testimony of the boy 8 years of age, because he disclosed certainly as much intelligence and knowledge of the duty to tell the truth as his younger sister, and it is sufficient, therefore, to look to the testimony of the latter.

On the subject of the obligation of an oath, she testified that she was in regular attendance upon the Sunday school; that she did not know what it was to be a witness, or what was meant by the obligation of an oath. On this subject, however, she testified in part as follows:

"Q. Do you know what it means to tell the truth?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What would happen to you if you did not tell the truth?"

"A. Go to the bad man.

"Q. Go to the bad man?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. If you say anything here, are you going to tell the truth, or not to-day?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Everything you say will be true?"

"A. Yes, sir. * * *

"By the Court: Q. Do you know what the Bible is?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What is it?"

"A. It is learning to be good.

"Q. Whose book is it?"

"A. The Lord's.

"Q. The Bible is the Lord's book, and it teaches you to be good?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When you put your hand on the Bible, do you understand you are calling upon the Lord as bearing witness that you are telling what is true, and that you are not telling what is not true? Do you understand that?"

"A. Yes, sir."

During the course of the examination of the witness on the merits of the case she stated that she did not hear what was asked her when she was sworn, and thereupon the court said that it would swear her over again. Then the following questions and answers ensued:

"Q. Your name is Mildred Cherry?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. This is the Bible, and when you put your hand on the Bible it means you are calling on the Lord to bear witness to the fact that you are telling the truth. Now, put your hand on the Bible. Will you, in answer to all the questions that are asked you in this case, tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. All right. Now, in giving the answers to the questions that these gentlemen asked you and that these gentlemen who represent the defendant asked you, have you told the truth?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You have told the truth?"

"A. Yes, sir."

On cross-examination on this subject, the following questions were asked and answers given, while referring to something which the mother had said to the witness:

"Q. Did she tell you what to say when they asked you if you knew what it meant to tell the truth, and where you would go if you didn't?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did she say about that?"

"A. She asked me did I know where I would go if I didn't tell the truth, and I said yes.

"Q. Did she tell you that they would ask you that this morning?"

"A. She said they may and may not.

"Q. She said that they may and may not? Did she tell you if they did ask you that what you must say?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did she say you must say?"

"A. That I would go to the bad man.

"Q. That is the reason you told the judge that, wasn't it?"

"A. Yes, sir."

In view of the foregoing answers, we cannot say that the ruling of the trial court in permitting the witness to testify was plainly wrong.

On the argument of this case it was insisted by counsel for the accused that the witness had been coached by her mother, and that she simply gave categorical answers to leading questions. There are many such questions and answers in the record, but an examination of the testimony of this little child discloses an amount of intelligence which seems to be quite above the average. She was asked over 100 questions on her voir dire and examination in chief, and about 100 questions on cross-examination. She was in the courtroom before strangers, and her intelligence is displayed by her answers. She was asked many questions on cross-examination which it could not have been anticipated she would be asked, and hence could not have been coached as to them.

There is much confusion in the record in the testimony of a number of witnesses, especially the adult witnesses, about dates in connection with the offense charged; but it is fairly plain that the alleged assault and battery must have taken place on the 19th of March, 1921. The testimony showed that the assault and battery occurred in a moving picture show, in the city of Portsmouth, on Saturday night, March 19th. The little girl did not report it to her mother until the following day. On the following Saturday night the same two children were sent to the same moving picture show for the purpose, if possible, of catching the party who had committed the assault on the evening of the 19th, and it was arranged that if the party came and renewed his advances, the little girl should notify her brother and he should go out and get their father, who was working near by, and bring him in so as to apprehend the guilty party. In order to show the character of the testimony of the little girl on this subject, we make the following extract from the record of questions asked her on cross-examination, and her answers thereto, on matters about which it seems to be fairly certain she could not have been coached:

"Q. After that first Saturday, when did you next see the man?"

"A. It was the next Saturday night.

"Q. What time?"

"A. Mamma sent me there the same time as I went the first Saturday.

"Q. Had you told your mother what this man did to you?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And so you were going back to the pictures with your little brother?"

"Q. When you went in the theater that night, in the Pallace that night, was this man sitting there again?"

"A. No, sir; we went in, and he came in after we did.

"Q. He came in after you did?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Where did you sit the second night?"

"A. The same place.

"Q. When the man came in did he take a seat by you, or by your little brother?"

"A. By me.

"Q. How did he come and sit by you when you and your brother went—who went in the seats first, you or your brother?"

"A. Who went to the seats?"

"Q. Who went into the seat first when you and your brother got there the second night?"

"A. Me.

"Q. You went in first and your brother came in next?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was he nearer the aisle than you?"

"A. I came on the second seat, and he was the first.

"Q. When the man came in, did he have to pass your brother and then by you?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He passed by your brother and then by you, and took his seat next to you?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you say anything to him when he first came in?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Why didn't you and your brother get up and leave when he came?"

"A. Mamma wanted us to catch him.
 "Q. Wanted you to catch him?
 "A. Yes, sir.
 "Q. Had you seen the man since the last Saturday night?
 "A. No, sir.
 "Q. You had not seen him at all?
 "A. No, sir.
 "Q. Well, how long did you stay in the movies the second Saturday night?
 "A. No longer than we did the last Saturday night.
 "Q. You stayed in there an hour?
 "A. Yes, sir. * * *
 "Q. Well, could your little brother hear what he said to you?
 "A. No, sir.
 "Q. Did you tell your little brother that he was troubling you again?
 "A. He heard some of it, though, but he didn't hear it all.
 "Q. Did you tell your little brother that it was the same man, and that he was troubling you?
 "A. Yes, sir, and he knew it too.
 "Q. How do you know that he knew it?
 "A. Because he seen him.
 "Q. Well, why didn't you get up and leave when he commenced troubling you again?
 "A. Mamma told me to stay there and wait until brother got daddy.
 "Q. Stay there and wait until your brother got daddy. How long did little brother stay after this man started to fooling with you?
 "A. It wasn't long before he went and called daddy."

[5] We are satisfied from this testimony that the trial judge made no mistake in holding that the little girl was of sufficient mental capacity to testify as a witness.

We need not go into the same line of examination as to the boy, for he certainly disclosed as much intelligence as his younger sister, and evoked from counsel for the accused during the examination the remark that, "He is a pretty smart boy."

[6, 7] The remaining assignment of error is that the judgment of the court was contrary to the law and the evidence. After the commonwealth had introduced its evidence and had proved the assault by the little girl, and the identity of the accused by both the little girl and her brother on the night of March 26th as the same man who had sat by her on the night of March 19th, the accused introduced a number of witnesses to prove his good character, and also several witnesses to prove an alibi on the night of the 19th. In addition to this he testified himself, denying unqualifiedly that he was at the picture show on the 19th, or that he committed any assault at any time on the little girl. This testimony is directly in conflict with the testimony of the little girl, and also of her brother, as to his being at the theater on the night of the 19th. In addition to this the testimony of the little girl as to the injury done her is apparently corroborated by the testimony of her mother and that of the doctor who attended her, as to the injury which she had sustained. It is true that the doctor testified that the injury might have come from some other cause, but there is no doubt about the existence of the injury, and there was no evidence before the trial judge of any other cause which might have produced it. The question was one to be decided by the trial judge, and his judgment upon the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony stands on the same footing as the verdict of a jury. Martin v. Richmond, etc., 101 Va. 406, 44 S. E. 695; Hoster v. Stag Hotel Corp., 111 Va. 223, 68 S. E. 50; Carson v. Mott Iron Works, 117 Va. 25, 84 S. E. 12; Town of Appalachia v. Mainous, 126 Va. 423, 101 S. E. 359.

Under these circumstances the judgment of the trial court cannot be set aside for this cause.

Upon the whole case we are of opinion that the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

HARRISON v. GARDNER INV. CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 16, 1922.)

1. Evidence \S 121(3) — In purchaser's suit against vendor's agent for amount paid on execution of contract, contract held admissible as part of res gestae.

In purchaser's action against vendor's agent to recover amount paid on execution of contract subsequently rescinded for fraudulent representations, in which the defendant claimed the right to keep the amount under the provisions of the contract, the contract was admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestae.

2. Trial \S 134—Statute forbidding peremptory instructions not applicable where question is one of law.

Code 1919, \S 6003, forbidding peremptory instructions, does not apply where verdict depends necessarily and exclusively upon a question of law, such as the legal effect of a deed, or contract.

3. Trial \S 194(13)—Instruction directing verdict for defendant on ground that plaintiff was not a party to the contract held erroneous in view of contrary uncontradicted evidence.

In purchaser's action against vendor's agent to recover amount paid on execution of contract following a rescission thereof for fraudulent representations, instruction directing a verdict for defendant on the ground that the purchaser's agent in executing the contract had acted as the principal, and that the plaintiff was not a party to the contract, held erroneous, both because it took from the jury their consideration of the evidence on this question of fact and because under the uncontradicted evidence the contract, if binding, was one between the vendor and plaintiff.

4. Principal and agent \S 124(3) — Whether purchaser had authorized his agent to make contract held for jury.

In purchaser's action against vendor's agent to recover earnest money, on rescission for fraudulent representations, the question whether purchaser had authorized his agent to enter into such a contract held for the jury.

5. Principal and agent \S 174—Whether purchaser ratified contract by his agent held for jury.

In purchaser's action against vendor's agent to recover earnest money, on rescission for fraudulent representations, in which it was claimed that the purchaser had not authorized his agent to make such a contract, the question of whether the purchaser had ratified the contract held for the jury.

6. Vendor and purchaser \S 341(4)—Whether vendee had been induced to enter into contract by fraudulent representations held for jury.

In a purchaser's action against vendor's agent to recover earnest money, the question whether the purchaser violated the contract by refusal to proceed therewith on the ground that a contract had been induced by fraudulent representations held for the jury.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by W. H. Harrison against the Gardner Investment Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This is an action of assumpsit instituted by W. H. Harrison, the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called plaintiff), against the Gardner Investment Corporation, the defendant in error (hereinafter called defendant), the declaration containing the common counts of a declaration in assumpsit at common law; the object of the action being to recover the sum of $500, money of the plaintiff alleged to have been "had and received by the defendant to the use of the said plaintiff."

The defendant pleaded the general issue of nonassumpsit, on which issue was joined. The following grounds of defense were filed by the defendant:

"Each and every defense which may be made under the general issue, and in addition:

"That there is no privity between the parties to this case.

"That defendant acted merely as agent in the deal in question in this case.

"That nothing is due from defendant to plaintiff.

"That plaintiff has no standing or right of recovery in this case."

There was a trial by jury which resulted in a verdict for the defendant. The trial court entered judgment accordingly, and the plaintiff brings error.

Certain facts appearing from the evidence seem to be uncontroverted. Such of those facts as are material may be stated as follows:

On August 1, 1919, the plaintiff, being at the time at Tutwiler, Miss., saw in a recent issue of a newspaper published in the city of Norfolk, Va., the following advertisement of property for sale:

"Fairfax avenue—garage and lot, lot 25x125 feet, brick garage, tile roof, six garages renting for $42 month and about 15 or 20 more can be built; rental of these will be guaranteed, price $8,000. $2,000 cash, $2,550 six years, $2,500 ten years."

The evidence does not show whether or not the advertisement had any name signed to it, of the owner, or agent of the owner of the property, or why the plaintiff connected the defendant with the subject. But the fact was that on seeing this advertisement the plaintiff cut it out of the newspaper, and on August 1, 1919, from said place in Mississippi, wrote the following letter to the defendant, inclosing therein the said newspaper clipping:

"Gardner Invest. Corpn.: I will take it. Write up papers & let me know how much you want till we can get papers fixed.

"[Signed] W. H. Harrison."

The defendant did not reply to this letter.

Afterwards, on what date does not appear, the plaintiff wired to one W. L. Wagner, who was in the city of Norfolk, and who had money belonging to the plaintiff deposited in his hands subject to the order of the plaintiff, "to see" the defendant, the Gardner Investment Corporation, "in regard to this matter" and to "secure that property" by depositing with defendant money of the plaintiff of such an amount as the defendant might require, "until [the plaintiff] could get there." (Whether the authority to Wagner "to secure that property" limited him to merely making the deposit or commissioned him to enter into a contract as agent for the plaintiff, and, if so, what contract, are questions of inference left in doubt by the evidence, as hereinafter mentioned.) This telegram does not appear in evidence, nor does any witness undertake to give its language. The telegram was the only communication of the plaintiff to Wagner on the subject so far as appeared from the evidence. The plaintiff did not send Wagner any copy of the advertisement.

On receipt of the telegram Wagner went to see the defendant, not as acting for himself, but as the agent of the plaintiff; and the uncontroverted testimony is express that the defendant then, and in all the transactions with Wagner subsequently, "knew" that Wagner "was dealing" for the plaintiff, and not for himself. But the defendant required Wagner to sign an agreement in writing in which Wagner was named as the purchaser, without mention of the fact that he was such as the agent of the plaintiff, and to deposit $500, both of which Wagner did; the uncontroverted testimony, however, being that the defendant knew at the time that the $500 deposited consisted of money belonging to the plaintiff "and were deposited according to instructions [Wagner] received from" the plaintiff; and that Wagner was acting in signing the agreement as agent for the plaintiff and not for himself; so that the agreement was made by Wagner for the sole benefit of the plaintiff.

The agreement referred to, so far as material, was in the following form:

"This agreement of sale made in triplicate, this 11th day of August, 1919, between Gardner Investment Corporation, agents for E. H. Odend'hall (hereinafter known as vendor), and W. L. Wagner (hereinafter known as the purchaser).

"Witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the sum of five hundred no/100 dollars ($500.00), receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the vendor agrees to sell and the purchaser agrees to buy for the sum of eight thousand no/100 dollars, all that certain piece or parcel or lot of land described as follows, to wit: * * *

"The purchase price to be paid as follows:

"First. The five hundred no/100 dollars ($500.00) cash above received to apply to the purchase price.

"Second. Two thousand four hundred no/100 dollars ($2,400.00) cash when the deed is delivered and full settlement is made.

* * *

"Fourth. The purchaser further agrees to give a deed of trust to secure the payment of five thousand one hundred no/100 dollars ($5,100.00) evidenced by notes, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, as follows:

"One-half in five years, and one-half in ten years.

"The vendor agrees to deliver the above property with a general warranty deed and the usual covenants of title signed and executed by all parties interested in the property, same to be prepared at the expense of the vendor.

"All taxes, insurance, rents and interest are to be prorated as of date of settlement and settlement is to be made on or before September 1, 1919.

* * *

"It is understood that Gardner Investment Corporation are the agents for the vendor and he agrees to pay them a commission for making this sale of 5 per cent. on the first five thousand dollars and 3 per cent. on the balance of the total purchase price.

"It is further understood that should purchaser fail to consummate this contract, any amount paid will be refunded as liquidated damages at the option of the vendor. * * *

"Witness the following signatures and seals this 11th day of August, 1919.

"[Signed] Gardner Investment Corp'n,

 "J. W. Gardner, President. [Seal.]
 "W. L. Wagner, [Seal.]"

The plaintiff came from Mississippi by automobile. He engaged a certain title company to examine the title and represent him in closing the purchase of the property. On or about September 10, 1919, the attorney for Odend'hall, the owner of the property, had prepared a deed conveying the property to the plaintiff, not to Wagner, and had the deed with him duly executed and acknowledged, ready for delivery, and met the plaintiff at the office of the title company with a view to closing the contract. Meanwhile the deed of trust and notes provided for by the agreement in writing aforesaid had been drawn by the title company, at the direction of the plaintiff, but in accordance with the "dictation" of the attorney for Odend'hall, the owner, as that attorney himself testified. This attorney further testified on the subject of what occurred on this occasion as follows:

"We were about to go to the stage of carrying out the contract of prorating the taxes and the rents and so on, when Dr. Harrison [the plaintiff] raised the objection then that the contract, as he understood it, provided that the garages were rented, and that the rents for the garages were guaranteed for a year."

It may be here noted that the agreement in writing aforesaid contained no provision as to the property being rented, or as to guaranteeing the rents, those references appearing in the advertisement only; so that the plaintiff could not have been here referring to said agreement in writing as "the contract," if he knew its contents. The witness proceeded further with his testimony as follows:

"When he told me that, Mr. Odend'hall not being with me, I told them they would have to postpone the settlement, as I was not authorized by Mr. Odend'hall to carry out any such contract as that. Several * * * after that Mr. Odend'hall came to my office and directed me to carry out the terms of the contract with this modification, that he was to allow Dr. Harrison one year's rent on those garages, I think at $7.00 per month, and credit that as accrued interest on the back of the note. After receiving those directions I went back to the title company, at the hour designated, and waited for about three-quarters of an hour, and Dr. Harrison did not put in an appearance."

On the subject of what occurred after he got to Norfolk, and at his meeting with the attorney for the owner above referred to, when they failed to close the contract of purchase, the plaintiff testified as follows:

"In the first place, I understood I was to pay $1,500.00 more, but they wanted $2,400.00 more, I think it was. I passed that and was about—I did draw a check for $2,400.00, and then I found that the garages were not rented, that there were only three of them rented, and I tore the check up. That is my recollection.

"Q. Did they show you a copy of any contract that had been made in relation to this property?"

"A. Showed me a contract which says that the money shall be returned to me if not satisfactory. I think that is written in the contract."

Wagner testified on the same subjects as follows:

"Q. Please tell the court and jury what occurred as soon as he [the plaintiff] came here and found the condition of the property?"

"A. We first went to the office of the Gardner Investment Corporation to take up the matter of transferring the title. There was some difficulty in finding out whether or not the garages were rented. It was finally decided that that matter would be settled later, and we adjourned to meet later in the office of the Guaranty Title & Trust Company in order to transfer the title to the property, but upon finding that the garages were not all rented the deal was postponed.

"Q. Was the deal consummated?"

"A. No, sir.

"Q. Why was it not consummated?"

"A. It was not consummated because the property was not as represented, and we didn't want it."

It was also shown in evidence as an uncontroverted fact, that the defendant had the $500.00 in its hands at the time of suit, but had been instructed by Odend'hall not to turn it over to the plaintiff, and that at the time of the trial the defendant still had the money in its hands.

There are only three questions on which any conflict is perceived in the evidence. Those questions are: (1) Whether Wagner, by reason of the general terms of the telegram to him, was given such large discretion that he was authorized by the plaintiff to enter into the contract as expressed in the written agreement aforesaid, as agent for the plaintiff, so as to constitute that agreement the contract binding on the plaintiff? (2) whether the conduct of the plaintiff, after he arrived in Norfolk and knew of the agreement in writing, was such that he ratified that agreement? and (3) whether, if such agreement was binding on the plaintiff as his contract, there was a breach of that contract on the part of the plaintiff.

There may be further questions in the case whether the refunding of the money paid, mentioned in the contract, means what is there said, and, if so, whether the option there mentioned goes to the refunding or merely to the effect thereof; or whether there was a meeting of the minds of the parties on the meaning of "retained" instead of "refunded," the word used in the writing, there being in such case a mere clerical error and mutual mistake in using the word "refunded" instead of "retained." These may be questions of law, or mixed questions of law and fact, if fully developed by the evidence. They are not fully developed by the evidence in the record, and need not be further specifically mentioned.

Of the evidence bearing on the three questions of fact above stated, it is sufficient to say that the conflict is more in the inferences which may be contended should be drawn from the evidence than in the evidence itself; and what inferences should be drawn from the evidence, whether in favor of the plaintiff or defendant, upon these questions, are, under the circumstances disclosed, controverted matters of fact, about which reasonable minds may reasonably differ in conclusions.

The action of the trial court on the subject of the instructions appears from the record to have been as follows:

"The following instruction granted at the request of the defendant is the only instruction granted. It was granted over the objection of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff excepted:

"The court instructs the jury that under the law it is the duty of the court, that is, the judge, to construe the written contract in evidence in this case; so construing said written contract in this case, the court instructs you that the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff in this case."

"Before granting this instruction, the court stated to the plaintiff's counsel, in the presence of the jury, in response to objections to the instruction, which plaintiff's counsel argued:

"The Court: 'The defendant company is haled into court upon a claim that it has money belonging to plaintiff. Defendant admits having $500 paid him on account of property bought by a Mr. Wagner, with whom a sealed contract was entered into with one Odend'hall—neither one of these are parties to the suit. This contract has been admitted as evidence because defendant received the $500 in pursuance thereof. If the plaintiff, who is not a party to the contract, is permitted to recover, there is nothing to prevent Wagner, who is not a party to the suit, from proceeding on his contract in a separate action to recover the same $500.

"I feel constrained, therefore, to tell the jury that under this contract and the evidence connected therewith, there cannot be a verdict for the plaintiff."

The following instruction was requested by the plaintiff but refused by the court:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendants advertised the garages on Fairfax avenue for sale, and that by letter in writing, August 1st, the plaintiff agreed to take the property, and in pursuance thereto instructed a deposit of a sum of money to secure the property until he could come on and close the deal, and that after he came on to close the deal he found that the property was not rented, as stated in the advertisement, and refused to close the deal on the ground of material misrepresentations, that he is entitled to have his deposit returned in this case, and they should find for the plaintiff."

J. Edward Cole, of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

Jas. G. Martin, of Norfolk, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The questions presented for our decision by the assignments of error will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Did the court err in refusing to exclude from the jury the agreement in writing between the defendant, as agent for the owner of the property, and Wagner, as agent for the plaintiff, as the latter undertook to act and as dealt with by the defendant as an action in the matter, as shown by the uncontroverted evidence, although the last-named agency was not stated in the writing?

This question must be answered in the negative.

The defendant, according to the testimony in its behalf, received the $500 sued for, certainly partly in pursuance of the provisions of this writing. The execution of this writing was one of the circumstances which attended the payment of this money into the hands of the defendant. Clearly, therefore, the writing was properly admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestæ. Its effect as evidence—how far it would be relied upon by the defendant as authorizing it to hold the $500 sued for—was and is another question, dependent upon the question of fact whether the writing proved to be what the evidence for the defendant tended to show the defendant considered it to be at the time it received the money of the plaintiff, namely, a contract binding upon the plaintiff, and under the terms of which the defendant had the right to receive and hold possession of the said money of the plaintiff.

2. Did the court err in granting the single instruction which was given the jury at the request of the defendant, which is set forth above?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

[2] In the argument of the assignment of error involving this instruction it is urged that it was reversible error in the court to give it for the reason that it is a peremptory instruction, and hence in violation of the statute (section 6003 of the Code), forbidding peremptory instructions. But, as held in Small v. Va. Ry. & Power Co., 125 Va. 416, 99 S. E. 525, that statute is not to be construed as applying to cases in which the verdict of the jury depends necessarily and exclusively upon a question of law, such as the legal effect of a deed or contract. The instruction in question contained merely the construction of the written contract by the trial judge. Therefore it was not per se in violation of the statute just mentioned. However—

[3-8] The instruction under consideration, when read in the light of the statement of the trial judge before the jury in explanation thereof, and in the light of the evidence in the case, in effect, told the jury that the writing above mentioned was a contract between Wagner and the owner of the property sold, and could not be considered as a contract between the defendant, as agent of the owner, and Wagner, as agent of the plaintiff, in any aspect of the case. The uncontroverted evidence before the jury was to the effect that if the writing was a binding contract at all, it was a contract between the parties last named, and not a contract between Wagner and the owner. The instruction was therefore erroneous, both because it took from the jury their consideration of the evidence on this pure question of fact, and because it embodied a conclusion of fact which was directly contrary to the uncontroverted evidence.

There is only one hypothesis upon which we could decline to reverse the case because of such erroneous instruction, and that is this: If the evidence was such that, regarding the agreement in writing as having been entered into by the defendant with Wagner, as agent of the plaintiff, the jury would not have been warranted in coming to any other conclusion than that the plaintiff was bound by such writing as his contract, either because (1) he had authorized Wagner to make it for him, or (2) he had ratified it after it was made; and further, that the plaintiff had unjustifiably broken the contract, and as a result had forfeited the $500. In such case the instruction might be considered as harmless error. But the evidence before the jury on all three of those questions of fact (not to here mention the difficulties in the way of arriving at the result just referred to upon the meager facts pertaining thereto appearing in the evidence), was such that they were seriously controverted questions of fact, about which reasonable minds may reasonably differ in conclusions. They are therefore peculiarly jury questions, and they should have been left to the decision of the jury, under suitable and proper instructions, if asked for by either of the parties. Hence the instruction under consideration cannot be considered as harmless error, and the hypothesis mentioned cannot save the case from reversal.

3. The only remaining question presented by the assignments of error is whether the court erred in refusing to give the instruction set forth above, asked for by the plaintiff.

The instruction contains obvious defects. However—

As it is not probable that an instruction in this precise form will be asked for by the plaintiff upon a new trial, we deem what we have said above in general terms in regard to the instructions which should be given upon a new trial sufficient to dispose of the subject for all practical purposes, should the issues and the evidence on a new trial be the same as upon the one already had, and we feel that it is unnecessary for us to say anything further concerning the precise instruction last mentioned, either in approval or disapproval of it.

The verdict and judgment under review will be set aside and annulled and a new trial de novo will be awarded the plaintiff. Reversed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

(132 Va. 368)

WASHINGTON-VIRGINIA RY. CO. v. STRUDER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 16, 1922.)

1. Railroads §316(2)—Speed ordinance inapplicable to street terminating at track.

A city ordinance prohibiting the operation of trains over grade crossings at more than five miles an hour and requiring warning signals is not applicable at a point where there was no grade crossing, but the street ended at the railroad track, and only a cinder path led therefrom to the station platform on the other side of the track.

2. Railroads §348(4)—Negligence in failing to have headlights held not shown.

A charge that an electric railroad company was negligent in failing to have headlights on the train which struck decedent is not sustained where the motorman's testimony that the lights were burning was contradicted only by testimony they were not burning when the train was still 1,000 feet from the place of the accident, and where it was still daylight, so that no lights were necessary.

3. Carriers §305(2)—Failure to have station lighted held not cause of accident.

Negligent failure of an interurban railroad company to have its station lighted does not impose liability for the death of a passenger who was killed in attempting to cross the track to the platform on the opposite side from the station, where there was no showing that the absence of station lights in any way contributed to the accident.

4. Trial §156(3) — Demurrer to evidence admits truth of adverse party's evidence and all inferences therefrom.

A demurrer to the evidence admits the truth of all the adverse party's evidence and all just inferences that can be properly drawn therefrom, and waives all the demurrant's evidence which conflicts with that of his adversary or which has been impeached and all inferences from his own evidence which do not necessarily result therefrom.

5. Evidence §588—Testimony of motorman held not impeached.

The testimony of the only eyewitness, the motorman of an interurban train which struck decedent, is not impeached by the fact that he testified decedent was thrown right down the track, while another witness testified he saw what he thought was a bundle of rags fly out of the car in the air, and by the motorman's testimony that he did not hear decedent groan after she was struck, though other witnesses did hear her.

6. Carriers §346(1)—Evidence held to show contributory negligence of intending passenger in crossing track without looking.

Evidence that an intending passenger crossed an interurban railroad track to reach the station platform where she intended to take a car without looking for a car approaching on the first track, though she was familiar with the situation and with the schedules of the cars, and could have seen down the track 280 feet before she stepped on it, held to show contributory negligence as a matter of law.

7. Carriers §327—Circumstances held not to warrant assumption no train was approaching.

Where there was no evidence that there was a train immediately preceding the interurban train which killed decedent, and no other unusual circumstances to warrant a belief no train was approaching, it was contributory negligence for an intending passenger to attempt to cross the track without looking for an approaching train.

8. Carriers §327—Passenger going to station must exercise ordinary care to avoid injury by trains.

Though an intending passenger going to a railroad station may rely on the railroad company to use ordinary care to protect her against injury by its trains, the passenger owes the corresponding duty to use ordinary care to protect herself, and the failure to use such care on her part is negligence.

Error to Circuit Court, Arlington County.

Action by James A. Struder, administrator of Julia Della Struder, deceased, against the Washington-Virginia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and judgment entered for defendant.

Carlin, Carlin & Hall and Geo. B. Vest, all of Alexandria, for plaintiff in error.

Edmund Burke, of Washington, D. C., for defendant in error.

WEST, J. This is a suit brought by Julia Della Struder's administrator against the Washington-Virginia Railway Company to recover damages for her death resulting from the alleged negligence of the defendant company.

The plaintiff's intestate was a young woman, 19 years old, in the full enjoyment of all her faculties. She resided in the town of Potomac, between Alexandria and Washington, and was employed by the Bureau of Engraving in Washington. Her home was near St. Elmo station, where the accident occurred, and she traveled almost daily from St. Elmo to Washington and return over the defendant company's road, and was well acquainted with the conditions and surroundings at St. Elmo station, and with the schedule of the cars over said road.

The defendant company's road at St. Elmo has two parallel tracks and runs nearly north and south, the east track being used by north-bound cars and the west track being used by south-bound cars. Just south of St. Elmo station these tracks pass under an overhead bridge, and the abutments to this bridge obstruct the view of the tracks to the south from any one approaching the station from the east until he arrives near the east track. St. Elmo station is approached from the east by a path which runs just north of this embankment, and the station is on the west side of the west track. There is a cinder platform on the east side of the east track and on the west side of the west track.

The accident occurred just before dark on the afternoon of October 21, 1919. Plaintiff's intestate walked toward the station, approaching it from the east side, to take the train on the west track for Alexandria. One of the defendant company's electric trains, consisting of one freight car, had left Alexandria at 6:27 p.m. and made the run to St. Elmo, a distance of 3.11 miles, in about 16 minutes. As plaintiff's intestate attempted to cross the east track, on her way to the station, she was struck by this train, and died of her injuries the next day, without regaining consciousness.

Upon the trial, after all the evidence on both sides had been introduced, the defendant filed a demurrer to the evidence, which was overruled, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, the amount of damages assessed by the jury, subject to the decision of the court.

The only assignment of error relied on by the plaintiff in error is the action of the court in overruling its demurrer to the evidence.

The only eyewitness to the accident was the motorman, Edward D. Groves, who testified as follows: That he was standing at the time of the accident in the motorman's stand on the front of the car; that he blew his whistle, two longs and two shorts, a warning, before reaching the Washington & Old Dominion overhead bridge; that his car was running 12 or 15 miles an hour with his headlights burning, when he approached St. Elmo station; that when he first saw the lady he applied the brakes, rang the bell, and blew the whistle, two short jerks; that the lady walked deliberately on the track 12 or 15 feet in front of the car; that she was walking with her head down like she was in deep study and was not thinking where she was, and never made any move to get out of the way or step up when he blew the whistle, but "just went along looking down like she was studying," and was about the middle of the track when the car struck her.

Witness Groves also testified that he blew the station whistle at the regular place, south of the embankment, which statement was not contradicted by any other witness.

The undisputed evidence of witness Sinclair, chief engineer of the defendant company, is that a trolley pole on the east side of the north-bound track, approximately opposite the station at St. Elmo, is $8\frac{1}{2}$ feet from the center of the north-bound track, and that a person standing by and on a line with that trolley pole and looking south can see 280 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet down the center of the north-bound track without obstruction.

Witness had made a sketch and measurements of the physical conditions at St. Elmo station, and there is filed with his evidence a sketch and plat showing the physical conditions to be as stated by him.

Was there any primary negligence on the part of the defendant company, as claimed by the defendant in error, consisting of five specific violations of the law, as follows:

1. Running the car past the station at a reckless and dangerous rate of speed.

Groves, the motorman, testified that his car left Alexandria at 6:27 p. m. and made the distance of 3.11 miles to St. Elmo station in about 16 minutes, which was about 12 miles per hour. He said he looked at the clock on the office wall just as he started and at his watch between Del Ray and Mt. Ida, and it was then 6:41, and that the accident happened about two minutes thereafter, or at 6:43.

No other witness testified as to the time the train arrived at St. Elmo, or as to the rate of speed the car was running, except plaintiff's witness Beall, who testified that he first saw it at the overhead bridge, and it was "going fast"; how fast, he did not know. It is true plaintiff's witness Conlon, who arrived 15 minutes after the accident, gave testimony as to where he found the car after his arrival at the station, but he could not say "for sure" where the car that struck deceased was standing when he got there, "for the simple reason that I was sort of excited at the time."

In Springs v. Virginia Ry. & P. Co., 117 Va. 826, 86 S. E. 65, this court said:

"As to the speed of the car, plaintiff in error in testifying in the case gave no estimate as to its speed, while other witnesses for him who undertook to speak in comprehensible language vary in their estimates of the speed of the car at from 25 to 35 miles an hour; while others use such expressions as 'going a considerable rate of speed,' 'pretty rapid,' 'running like lightning.' None of these witnesses, however, gave any evidence capable of conveying to the ordinary mind a definite conception of the physical fact, viz. the actual speed of the car."

[1] 2. Violation of the ordinance of the town of Potomac as to speed.

The answer to this question involves the construction of the ordinance referred to, which reads as follows:

"Railroad Regulations.

"(1) Speed Limit.—No locomotive engine or motorcar shall be propelled over and upon any grade crossing at a greater rate of speed than five miles per hour, and all such engines shall be provided with a spark protector or apparatus to prevent danger of fire from their passing through the town.

"The person or persons having charge of such locomotive engines shall ring or cause to be rung, and the person or persons having charge of such motor car shall sound or cause to be sounded a gong or other bell or signal while approaching any such crossing. For violation of this section the person or company so violating shall pay a fine of not less than five nor more than twenty dollars."

The undisputed evidence shows that the town of Potomac has no street which crosses the Washington-Virginia Railway at or near St. Elmo station, and that Braddock avenue, or, as it is sometimes called, La Verne avenue, terminates at the eastern boundary of its right of way. The only approach to the station is by two footpaths, which lead to the cinder sidewalk on the east of the tracks, or by coming down stairs, on the west side, from the right of way of the Washington & Old Dominion Railway. It is manifest, therefore, that there is no grade crossing at St. Elmo, within the meaning of this ordinance, and that the ordinance has no application to this case.

3. Violation of the ordinance requiring the sounding of a gong or bell or signal while approaching the crossing.

For the reason just stated this part of the ordinance has no application here.

[2] 4. Failure to have headlights on the car.

Motorman Groves testified that the lights were burning when he reached St. Elmo, and is not contradicted by the testimony of any other witness. Hatton, plaintiff's witness, testified there was "no headlight lit" when the car passed Hume, but made no statement as to the lights when the car arrived at St. Elmo, which is 900 to 1,000 feet north of Hume. Besides, the car arrived at St. Elmo at 6:43, daylight saving time, or 5:43 sun time, and therefore before dark, making the lights unnecessary.

[3] 5. Omission to have station lighted as required by law.

The plaintiff's intestate was injured before she reached the station, and there is nothing in the record to show that lights in the station would have in any way prevented the accident. If the lack of lights in the station was negligence, it was in no way the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

[4] The familiar law applicable to demurrers to the evidence is stated by this court in Duncan v. Carson, 127 Va. 319, 320, 103 S. E. 665, 669, thus:

"On a demurrer to the evidence, the demurrant is considered as admitting the truth of all his adversary's evidence and all just inferences that can be properly drawn therefrom by the jury, and as waiving all his own evidence which conflicts with that of his adversary or which has been impeached, and all inferences from his own evidence (although not in conflict with his adversary's) which do not necessarily result therefrom. This admission embraces the credibility of the demurree's witnesses and the existence of all facts which demurree's evidence (which includes testimony) conduces to prove, or which may be reasonably inferred from his whole evidence, direct and circumstantial; and, if several inferences may be drawn from that evidence, differing in degrees of probability, the court must adopt those most favorable to the demurree, provided they be not forced, strained, or manifestly repugnant to reason. The court, however, is not obliged to accept as true what it knows judicially to be untrue, nor what in the nature of things could not have occurred in the manner and under the circumstances mentioned, nor what is not susceptible of proof."

[5] We cannot accede to the contention of the defendant in error that the testimony of Motorman Groves was impeached. In fact, it was not contradicted, except in a few instances, and as to matters immaterial to a proper decision of the case. To illustrate, Groves testified that he did not hear Miss Struder moan or groan while lying unconscious on the station bench, and Mrs. Underwood, the plaintiff's witness, testified that she heard her moaning and groaning. And again Groves testified that when the car struck decedent she was thrown "right down on the track on the rail," and Beall, plaintiff's witness, testified that he saw, as he thought, a "bundle of rags or clothes fly out of the car in the air." Both statements are probably true.

A fair consideration of his testimony as a whole will not lead an impartial mind to the conclusion that Groves has testified falsely in any respect. His testimony being true, and the physical conditions at St. Elmo's being as shown in evidence, we have no difficulty in reaching a just and proper conclusion on the question of contributory negligence.

[6] Having due regard for the demurrer to the evidence rule, it conclusively appears from the evidence that Julia Della Struder came to her death by thoughtlessly and negligently stepping on the defendant company's railroad track just in front of one of its moving trains, under such circumstances that the company was powerless to save her from injury and death, when, by simply looking down the track to the south, before reaching the east rail of the track, she could have seen the approaching train for a distance of 280 feet and saved herself from injury.

[7] The exception to the rule of negligence per se relied on by the defendant in error exists only "when the circumstances are so unusual that the injured party could not have reasonably expected the approach of the train at the time he went upon the track." In the instant case no such circumstances exist, for, as stated, the physical conditions at St. Elmo and the schedules of the regular trains were well known, and the fact of running extra trains is presumed to have been well known to the plaintiff's intestate.

The situation alluded to in the opinion of the court in Wilmouth v. Southern Ry. Co., 125 Va. 520, 99 S. E. 665, and in the authorities there cited, relied on by the defendant in error, as being a situation in which the action of a person going on the track without looking to see if a second train is coming is not negligence per se, was the immediately preceding passage of another train. In the instant case there is no evidence that any train immediately preceded the one which killed the deceased. So far as the evidence discloses, the next preceding train was on its schedule time, which was seven minutes ahead of the train which struck the deceased.

Sims, J., speaking for the court in the Wilmouth Case, says:

"The conduct of the plaintiff's intestate in stepping upon the track in front of such visible danger, almost immediately upon him, must, under all of the authorities, be regarded as negligence per se, which was the proximate cause of his death"—citing Thompson on Neg., 1666, 1667, 1672.

[8] It is contended by defendant in error that plaintiff's intestate was on the premises of the defendant company by its invitation to become a passenger on its trains, and that she had a right to assume that the railroad company would so operate its trains as not to put her in peril, and that in such cases the strict rule as to looking and listening does not apply.

It is true that passengers going to or from railway trains, at railroad stations, may rely upon the railway company to use ordinary care to protect them against injury from the operation of its trains, but this puts upon the passenger the corresponding duty to use ordinary care to protect himself, and a failure to use such care on his part is negligence.

In the case of Gordon v. Director General, 128 Va. 431, 104 S. E. 797, which was the case of a passenger who was killed soon after she stepped from the train, Prentiss, J., speaking for the court, said:

"If one who is in the full possession of his faculties steps upon a railroad track, in full view of and immediately in front of a rapidly approaching train, and thus meets death, his administrator cannot recover because the decedent's own negligence is the proximate cause thereof."

This authority, if authority be necessary, is conclusive of the instant case.

Upon the whole record, for the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff in error was guilty of no negligence which was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, and that the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate was the direct and proximate cause of her death and bars a recovery.

It follows, therefore, that the circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer to the evidence relied on by the defendant; and the judgment complained of will be reversed, and judgment entered here for the plaintiff in error.

Reversed.

VIRGINIA RY. & POWER CO. v. DRESSLER.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)1. Carriers ⇐320(1)—Whether place of accident was proper transfer point for injured passenger held for the jury.

Whether the place of an accident was a proper transfer point for an injured passenger, notwithstanding the regulations of street railway company to the contrary, held to be a question for the jury.

2. Carriers ⇐289—Street car passenger can assume transfer given without comment was the one called for.

Where a passenger asked a street car conductor for a transfer from a given point for a given direction, and he punched a transfer and handed it to her without objection or comment, she had the right to assume that the conductor had complied with her request, and that the transfer was one that she could use.

3. Carriers ⇐320(2)—Whether person transferring to another street car is a passenger is question of law if facts are undisputed.

The question whether a person, while in the street for the purpose of transferring from one street car to another, is a passenger, is a question of law where the facts are undisputed, so that it was error to submit such question to the jury.

4. Courts ⇐107—General expressions in opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which they are used.

In determining the authority of precedents, general expressions used in an opinion are to be taken in connection with the case in which they are used, and, though such expressions are entitled to respect, they are not controlling.

5. Carriers ⇐247(5)—Person transferring to another street car is not a passenger after reaching place of safety.

A person who has alighted from a street car for the purpose of transferring to another car and has reached a place of safety on the highway or the sidewalk, so that the street car company has no control over her movements or over provisions for her safety, is not a passenger to whom the street car company owes the high degree of care of a carrier to its passenger, but is entitled only to the same degree of care from the street car company as any other pedestrian upon the highway.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1178(6)—Cause remanded for determination of question of negligence and proximate cause only.

Where a judgment must be reversed because the case was submitted to the jury on the erroneous theory that plaintiff was a passenger at the time of her injury, the verdict established plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence and the amount of the damages, so that, under Code 1919, § 6865, the case will be remanded, with directions to submit only question whether defendant failed to exercise toward plaintiff the degree of care it owed to a pedestrian, and whether such failure was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries.

Error to Hustings Court of Richmond.

Action by Naomi C. Dressler against the Virginia Railway & Power Company to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded, with directions to impanel a jury to determine whether defendant was negligent, and whether such negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

E. R. Williams and T. Justin Moore, both of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

Fulton & Wicker and J. M. Turner, all of Richmond, for defendant in error.

BURKS, J. This is a personal injury case in which the defendant in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff) recovered a judgment against the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant) for the sum of $7,500, which we are asked to reverse for the reason hereinafter stated.

Naomi C. Dressler (the plaintiff) had resided in South Richmond for several years prior to the injury complained of, and she and her sister for about two years had been working in the factory of the British-American Tobacco Company, located near Broad street, west of First, in the western end of the city. In going to and from their place of business they traveled on cars of the defendant company, which operated a double-track electric street car line between the points mentioned. The defendant operated several different lines over Main and Broad streets between Fourteenth street and First street, among them a line known as Oakwood and Broad. The main line operated in South Richmond was known as the Hull street line. During the period aforesaid, about two years, the plaintiff had regularly boarded the Hull street car, asked for and obtained a transfer over the Main street line at the intersection of Fourteenth and Main streets, and been carried to her destination. On March 3, 1918, the defendant established and put into operation a through route by which certain Hull street cars entered the Main street line at Fourteenth street, and, passing over designated portions of Main and Broad streets, went to the western suburbs of the city. On this route, Fourteenth and Main was a transfer point for passengers going east, but not for passengers going west. According to the regulations of the company, the only proper transfer point for a passenger going West on Broad beyond First street was First and Broad.

On March 30, 1918, the plaintiff and her two sisters and a friend, all of whom worked at the factory of the British-American Tobacco Company, boarded one of these through cars in South Richmond, paid their fares, and asked for transfers at Fourteenth and Main west. The conductor punched and handed to each of them a transfer, without explanation or suggestion that the transfers were not what they desired, or could not be used for the trip desired. Fourteenth and Main was a proper transfer point for cars on the Hull street route known as "trippers," or cars that turned back at that point. It does not appear that the plaintiff and her companions had notice of the establishment of the new through route and the regulations as to transfers therefrom, but the plaintiff's sister testified that after March 3, 1918, as well as before, they had obtained and used (without notice to the contrary, or demur) transfers west at Fourteenth and Main. The testimony for the defendant is clear that no one had authority to issue a transfer west at Fourteenth and Main, but the testimony of the conductor who issued the transfer is not altogether satisfactory as to transfers issued by him, for, after testifying that "I didn't give them west Main at Fourteenth," he was asked by counsel for the defendant company, "Would you have given a transfer there at all west?" He replied: "I don't think I would, but, as to remembering whether I did or not, I don't remember." Brice, the division superintendent of the defendant company, also testified that he had heard "since the trial was on" that some of the company's men had accepted transfers west on Main at Fourteenth street and some had refused them, and that, if the plaintiff had asked for a transfer west at Fourteenth and Main, the conductor should have given her one at First and Main, and that "he should have told her."

The plaintiff and her companions accepted the transfers as usual without examining them to see how they were punched. The transfer actually given was lost in the confusion of the subsequent collision and was never found. An unpunched transfer of the same class was offered in evidence. The Hull street car on which the plaintiff was riding stopped in Fourteenth street at the usual stopping place for passengers to alight a short distance south of Main street. The point where the plaintiff actually alighted to the pavement on Fourteenth street was approximately 40' to 50 feet south of the southern curb line of Main street. She was one of the first passengers to alight from the car at this point, and was the first of her party. After alighting to the street on Fourteenth street, she walked over to the eastern side of Fourteenth street and waited on the sidewalk for her companions to join her there. She and her companions then walked along the sidewalk on Fourteenth street towards Main street until they reached the south curb of Main street, and then undertook to cross Main street from the south sidewalk to the north side of the street, where she and her companions intended to board the west-bound Broad and Main street car, which would carry them to their destination on Broad street west of First. There was no Broad and Main car standing for passengers to board at Fourteenth and Main streets at that time, but such a car was approaching in sight some considerable distance east of Fourteenth street.

The plaintiff and one of her half-sisters walked ahead, and the other half-sister and her friend came along just behind. The plaintiff and her companions intended to go to the usual stopping place for west-bound cars along Main street at Fourteenth, which was a short distance east of Fourteenth street, and to await for this approaching Broad and Main car to arrive, then to board the same, and to tender in payment of their fares on the Broad and Main car the transfers which they had received from the conductor of the Hull street car. The front of the Hull street car had then gotten on the east-bound Main street track, and, according to the plaintiff's testimony, completely obstructed her view and that of her other three companions west. When the plaintiff and her companions were about 5 feet from the track which they were going to cross they looked west and saw the Hull street car rounding the curve out of Fourteenth street into Main. About this time the motorman of the Hull street car looked west and saw the Oakwood and Broad car No. 138 west of Twelfth street, and before it had reached Thirteenth he realized that car No. 138 was running wild at a very high rate of speed towards the Hull street car, and thereupon reversed and quickly backed the front end of his car off the east-bound Main street track just far enough into Fourteenth street to get out of the way of car 138, which dashed by the front of the Hull street car, just missing it, running at 40 or 50 miles an hour, and ran into and struck the plaintiff, who was then about a car length east of the Hull street car and almost across the east-bound main street track, inflicting the injuries here complained of. The testimony as to whether the plaintiff and her companion looked west for approaching cars just before stepping on the track is conflicting.

Most of the assignments of error relate to the rulings of the trial court in granting or refusing instructions. They embody the principles of the case and the theory upon which the trial was had. It is unnecessary to quote these instructions, as the determination of the underlying principles will settle the propriety of the trial court's ruling thereon. As the relations of a carrier to a passenger are different from those of a carrier to a pedestrian crossing its tracks, it was important to determine whether the relation between the defendant and the plaintiff was that of carrier and passenger or of carrier and pedestrian in the street; the plaintiff insisting that she was a passenger, and the defendant that she was not: (1) "Because she was attempting to transfer at a place which was not the transfer point"; and (2) because, at the time of the injury she was a mere pedestrian walking along the public street over which the defendant had no control." Of these two in their order.

[1] For nearly two years the plaintiff had been boarding the defendant's cars at the same point, transferring at Fourteenth and Main, and riding to the same destination, without question or objection or objection on the part of any one. She had no notice, so far as the record disclosed, of any change in the regulations of the company, and, if the company had any intention of insisting on the change, the conductor (in the language of the division superintendent) "should have told her." Furthermore, from March 3, 1918, the date of the change, till the date of the injury, the plaintiff had been receiving and riding on such transfers without objection. If the plaintiff's transfer had been punched for First and Broad, and she had offered it for passage from Fourteenth and Main, and been refused, the rule laid down in Va. & Southwestern R. Co. v. Hill, 105 Va. 729, 54 S. E. 872, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 899, that as "between the passenger and conductor the terms of the ticket are conclusive" might have been applicable. But no such question is here involved, and we do not wish to be understood as holding that the rule applies to transfers issued by street railways. Notwithstanding the regulations of the defendant company, and the testimony of several of its witnesses, a number of witnesses, one of them a witness for the defendant, testify that Fourteenth and Main was a regular transfer point for passengers going west, and certainly the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses shows that they regularly obtained such transfers. The testimony on the subject was conflicting and it was not error to refer to the jury the determination of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony.

[2] If the jury believed the witnesses for the plaintiff, she was in the same position as if Fourteenth and Main was a regular transfer point and her ticket duly punched. She asked for a transfer "at Fourteenth for west," and the conductor punched a transfer and handed it to her without objection or other indication that she could not use it. She had the right to assume that the conductor had complied with her request, and that she could use the transfer as she had theretofore done. Memphis St. Ry. Co. v. Graves, 110 Tenn. 232, 75 S. W. 729, 100 Am. St. Rep. 803; Morrill v. Minneapolis St. Ry.

Co., 103 Minn. 362, 115 N. W. 395, 123 Am. St. Rep. 341. Under the circumstances, we cannot say that "she was attempting to transfer at a place which was not the transfer point."

[3] The other question, the relation of the defendant to the plaintiff while walking along and across the public street from the car she had left towards the car she had expected to take, is one of more difficulty, and one upon which the cases are not in entire harmony. Here there is no dispute about the facts, except as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, which will be noticed later. The facts which determine the relation of the defendant to the plaintiff are not disputed. On this question nothing is left for the determination of the jury. The rights, duties, and liabilities of the respective parties present a pure question of law to be determined by the court, and the trial court erred in referring them to the jury. W. S. Forbes Co. v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. (Va.) 108 S. E. 15; Dun v. Seaboard, etc., R. Co., 78 Va. 645, 658, 659, 49 Am. Rep. 388. In brief, the facts, so far as they need be stated on this subject, are that the plaintiff alighted from the Hull street car at the usual stopping place, which was 40 or 50 feet south of the south curb line of Main, and walked over to the eastern sidewalk on Fourteenth street and waited for her companions to join her. When they did so, they walked along the sidewalk of Fourteenth street 40 or 50 feet to the south curb of Main street, and then attempted to cross Main street to board a west-bound car on Main street at the usual stopping place of the latter car. While attempting to cross Main street, the plaintiff was struck by an Oakwood and Main car which had gotten from under control of the motorman, and was running wild on the east-bound track at a rate of 40 or 50 miles an hour or more. The car which struck the plaintiff was not the one from which she alighted, nor the one which she expected to take, and at the time the plaintiff was struck she was in the middle of Main street, and had not reached the point at which she was to take the Main street car west. She was not in a proper place to board any car, but was caught in the act of crossing the street while attempting to reach the point at which she could properly board her car. At the time she was struck she had her transfer in her hand. Was she a passenger?

[4] There have been many dicta, but comparatively few decisions, on the subject, and, while these dicta are entitled to respect, especially if supported by reason, we have always to bear in mind the oft-quoted statement of Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 399, 5 L. Ed. 257:

"It is a maxim, not to be disregarded, that general expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in the subsequent suit, when the very point is presented for decision. The reason of this maxim is obvious. The question actually before the court is investigated with care, and considered in its full extent. Other principles which may serve to illustrate it, are considered in their relation to the case decided, but their possible bearing on all other cases is seldom completely investigated."

The propriety, if not the necessity, of this observation becomes apparent when we examine a number of the cases relied upon to uphold the view that the relation of passenger continues during a transfer from one street car to another in favor of one holding a transfer. Keator v. Traction Co., 191 Pa. 102, 43 Atl. 86, 44 L. R. A. 546, 71 Am. St. Rep. 758, decided in 1899, is much relied on by the plaintiff and is regarded as a leading case on that subject, and is cited in nearly all of the subsequent cases in which the statement is made that the relation of passenger continues during the transfer, and yet the case does not decide that, but, on the contrary, just the opposite is stated in the opinion. In that case a passenger, with a transfer ticket, was at the proper place for boarding her car and was about to board the same when a piece of trolley pole of the car she was about to board fell on her head and inflicted the injury complained of. The decision was rested on the ground that she was at the proper place to board the car and was injured by the fall of the trolley of the very car she was to take. It is distinctly stated in the opinion that "she was not a passenger while on the sidewalk going from one point to the other."

In Walger v. Jersey City R. Co., 71 N. J. Law, 356, 59 Atl. 14, the plaintiff was a passenger on one of the defendant's cars. He alighted from the car for the purpose of transferring to another, and a transfer ticket was given him. The place at which he alighted was a regular transfer point, but he had not yet had the opportunity to reach a place of safety after alighting before he was struck by the car which he had just left as it was going around what is described as "the loop." The rear end of this car struck him and knocked him down, and for this injury he brought his action. The accident is said to have been immediately after he got off the car and before he had taken a single step away from it. Under such circumstances he was held to be still a passenger. This holding accords with the decisions of this court and need not be further considered. Virginia Trust Co. v. Raymond, 120 Va. 674, 91 S. E. 613; Houston v. Lynchburg Traction Co., 119 Va. 136, 89 S. E. 114; Ellis v. Virginia Ry. & Power Co. (Va.) 110 S. E. 382.

In Whitt v. Public Service Corporation

(1908) 76 N. J. Law, 729, 72 Atl. 420, 74 Atl. 568, a passenger obtained a transfer at a point where it was necessary for him to walk a city block before reaching the second car. In alighting from the first car he undertook to walk around the rear of the car, and in doing so fell into the fender on the rear of the car, which was down, though there was evidence from which the jury might properly infer that the usual practice of the company was to have the rear fenders fastened up against the end of the car. In the course of the opinion it was said:

"It is the rule in this state that in the ordinary case of a transfer from one car to another the traveler continues to be a passenger during the transfer. Walger v. Jersey City, etc., R. Co., 71 N. J. Law, 356, 59 Atl. 14. * * * Whether the relation of passenger and carrier was suspended during any part of the time plaintiff was passing along Seventh street it is not necessary to decide, for the accident happened before plaintiff had reached the sidewalk, or passed from that part of the street where the defendant was operating its cars, and the injury was caused by contact with the very car he had left, and immediately thereafter. The defendant knew that it was necessary that the plaintiff cross the street in order to reach the second car by the usual and most direct route, and was bound to exercise toward him the care due to a passenger, at least until he reached a point sufficiently distant to avoid any danger resulting from negligent management or condition of defendant's appliances. We are therefore of opinion that when this accident happened plaintiff was still defendant's passenger, and entitled to have it exercise reasonable care, skill, and foresight in carrying him to his destination, and, if it failed to do so, it was negligent."

It will be observed on reading this case that, while it is stated that in the ordinary case of a transfer from one car to another the traveler continues to be a passenger during the transfer, yet it plainly appears that the decision was rested upon the ground that the defendant had not had an opportunity after leaving the car upon which he was first traveling to reach a place of safety before being injured.

In Colorado Springs, etc., R. Co. v. Petit (1906) 37 Colo. 326, 86 Pac. 121, plaintiff was a passenger for hire on an electric road. A section of 250 feet of track was out of repair and not in use, and passengers had to walk over this distance to other cars. It was dark and the way dimly lighted. About 2 a. m., when plaintiff was walking along the side of the track to make the connection, he stepped into an open hole made for a trolley pole and sustained the injury complained of. There was evidence sufficient to sustain the finding that the hole was dug by the defendant. The hole was dug the day before, and the defendant knew that the way would be traveled by its passengers in the darkness of the following night. Held:

"It was guilty of negligence in not using reasonable care to see that the way was reasonably safe before the night came on. * * * Further, the relation of carrier and passenger existed between plaintiff and defendant when he was passing from one car to the other, and it was the duty of defendant to use reasonable care to have the way over which the plaintiff was to pass in a reasonably safe condition. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Winters, 175 Ill. 293, 51 N. E. 901; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Griffith, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 631, 35 S. W. 741; Balto. & O. R. Co. v. State, 60 Md. 449, 463."

It seems manifest from the degree of care it is said the carrier owed and from the cases cited that the court did not use the word "passenger" in a technical sense, but that it meant to hold the carrier bound for only ordinary care.

We have reviewed the foregoing cases at this point not only because they are relied on by the defendant in error, but because they are the only cases cited by the Supreme Court of Illinois in Feldman v. Chicago Rys. Co. (1919) 289 Ill. 25, 124 N. E. 334, 6 A. L. R. 1291, to support the statement that the weight of authority holds that a passenger on a continuous journey maintains his character as passenger while making the transfer from one car to another. The court also relies upon its own prior decisions to sustain the same view. This reliance is best answered by the following extract from the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Dunn and Cartwright, Judge, which saves a review of these cases by this court:

"We do not agree with the conclusion that the plaintiff, as a matter of law, was a passenger while walking on the public street. The rule of law as to what will constitute the relation of passenger and carrier has been firmly established by text-books and decisions, which were carefully reviewed and considered in the case of Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad Co. v. Jennings, 190 Ill. 478, 60 N. E. 818, 54 L. R. A. 827. Upon such review and consideration it was said to be uniformly held that the condition must be such that the passenger is under the care of the carrier and must be at some place under the control of the carrier provided for passengers, so that it may exercise the high degree of care exacted from it. The plaintiff, having safely alighted from the defendant's car, started to the place where he expected to take another car, and while walking on the street was not under the care of the defendant nor on any place provided for passengers or using any of the facilities furnished for passengers, but was exercising his right as one of the general public by crossing the street, as he lawfully might. In the Jennings case the doctrine of the Massachusetts court, which is now abandoned, was indorsed and adopted. This court has never decided that the relation of carrier and passenger existed under the facts of this case. In Chicago & Alton Railroad Co. v. Winters, 175 Ill. 293, 51 N. E. 901, the plaintiff was accompanying his carload of sheep to Chicago, and at Bloomington the car was placed in another train being made up for Chicago. The plaintiff was walking on the east side of the freight train toward the switchyards on the grounds of the railroad company, intending to continue his journey in the caboose of the new train. There is no resemblance between this case and that of North Chicago Street Railroad Co. v. Kaspers, 186 Ill. 246, 57 N. E. 849, except that the plaintiff had a transfer ticket. That ticket entitled him to ride on the cable car line to his destination, and he had got on the step at the front end of the car and was stepping up on the front platform when the speed * * * was increased, and he fell off and suffered the injury for which he sued. In Chicago City Railway Co. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N. E. 1087, a trolley pole on the Wentworth avenue car from which the plaintiff had alighted or was alighting fell from that car and struck him on the head. He had not got away in safety from the car, as the plaintiff had in this case, in which the plaintiff was not within the care and control of the defendant or on a place provided for passengers, and therefore was not a passenger. Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. O'Keefe, 163 Ill. 115, 48 N. E. 294, 39 L. R. A. 148, 61 Am. St. Rep. 68."

So far as the majority opinion in the Feldman case is rested upon authority, it appears to have rather frail support. The case, however, is so confidently relied on by counsel for the defendant in error, that some further notice of it seems proper. Feldman and another, Burke, were passengers on a street car in the city of Chicago, from which they alighted at Cicero avenue and Twelfth street. That was the end of Burke's journey, but Feldman held a transfer which he intended to use on another car and thereby continue his journey. They had safely alighted from the car to the ground, and had just cleared the car when it moved forward, but the front wheels split the switch and caused the rear end of the car to sweep to one side and strike both of them and injure them. They had reached a point five or six feet from the side of the car from which they had just alighted when they were struck. Feldman claimed to be a passenger at the time he was injured, and that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the carrier. The case was tried on this theory, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff. On appeal to the Appellate Court of Illinois (212 Ill. App. 484) that court reversed the case, holding that the plaintiff was not a passenger while transferring along the public street, over which the defendant had no control. The court delivered an elaborate opinion. That court, after a careful examination of the authorities, adopted the view of the Massachusetts court in Niles v. Boston Electric Ry. Co., 225 Mass. 570, 114 N. E. 730, hereinafter more particularly mentioned, and also approved the Tennessee case of Chattanooga Electric Ry. Co. v. Boddy, 105 Tenn. 666, 53 S. W. 646, 51 L. R. A. 885, and reversed the judgment of the trial court. The case was then carried by certiorari to the Supreme Court, which reversed the judgment of the Appellate Court. In the opinion of Judge Holdom of the Appellate Court it was said, among other things, that—

"To constitute a person a passenger it is necessary that such person should be under the control of the carrier in order to be entitled to its care. Such passenger must be at some place provided for passengers under the control of the carrier, so that it may exercise the high degree of care exacted from it under the law. * * *

"The fact that plaintiff had a transfer and intended to pursue his journey on another car did not make him a passenger after he had safely alighted from and cleared the car on which he had been riding. Such relationship did not continue during the time he was walking upon the public highway to the car for which he had a transfer. While the plaintiff was walking upon the public highway from the car from which he alighted to the car upon which he intended to continue his journey he was not a passenger, notwithstanding the fact that, if he had reached the car for which he had a transfer and had boarded it, the relation of passenger and carrier would then have been restored."

This holding accords with the Massachusetts doctrine in such cases, but probably goes further than was necessary. Under the decisions in this and other states the case might have been safely rested by the Supreme Court on the ground that Feldman and his companion had not had an opportunity of reaching a place of safety after alighting from the car, and under such circumstances that the company should be held liable, but the majority opinion in the Supreme Court did not take this view of the case, but held generally that the plaintiff was a passenger while transferring from one car to the other. It does not appear from the report of the case whether any suit was instituted by Burke or not, but, upon the theory of the Supreme Court that Feldman's right of recovery was based upon the fact that he held a transfer to another car, Burke would not be entitled to recover, although the only difference between his case and that of Feldman's was that Feldman held a transfer and he did not. Under the doctrine in this state and other states holding the same doctrine, each would have been entitled to recover, but the recovery would have been based upon the ground that they continued to be passengers until a reasonable opportunity had been afforded them to reach a place of safety. The grounds upon which the Supreme Court rested its conclusion and the fact that there were two dissenting judges in that court, and that the majority holding was opposed by the decision of the Appellate Court, detracted greatly from the weight to be given to the case.

In Pins v. Conn. Co. (1917) 92 Conn. 310, 102 Atl. 595, the plaintiff was under the immediate control and direction of the conductor of the car at the time she was injured. There was a break in the line, and it was necessary for passengers to get out of the car and walk past this break in order to reach another car and continue their journey. When the car on which Mrs. Pins was a passenger reached the break the conductor got off the car, saying, "This way, please," and led the way along the path which the passengers were to travel in order to reach the car they were to take. In making this journey under the direction of the conductor she fell and sustained the injury complained of. It was said in the course of the opinion that—

"The place at which she alighted was not the terminus of her trip. She did not alight because she had reached her destination, but in order that she might reach it. She alighted when she did because she could not proceed further as the defendant's passenger without doing so, and because she was directed by the defendant's agent to do so in order that it might be enabled to carry out its contract with her to transport her to New Haven. She traveled a path under the direction of the conductor and followed his leadership and guidance. When she fell she was doing just what she had been told to do to accomplish her trip, and was just where she had been invited and directed to be as incidental to her transportation."

It is plain from the foregoing statement that Mrs. Pins was acting under the immediate control and direction of the agent of the street car company, which was not the fact in the instant case.

Killmyer v. Wheeling Traction Co., 72 W. Va. 148, 77 S. E. 908, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1220, is in some respects similar to the Connecticut case just reviewed, in that it appears that the passenger was acting under the direction of the servant of the defendant company. It is said by Judge Lynch in the course of his opinion:

"While there is conflict in the evidence in some respects, later noticed, it sufficiently appears that plaintiff, about midnight on the day of the injury, was a passenger on defendant's traction lines, and as such entitled to transportation from Moundville to Wheeling, he having paid the necessary fare for the trip. On the arrival of the car at Bogg's Run, an intermediate point, those in charge thereof, finding the track submerged by reason of a freshet, directed plaintiff and other passengers to alight and to proceed on foot by a way designated by the employees to another of defendant's cars then, or soon to arrive, at a point on its lines beyond the obstruction, which would carry them to their destination without further charge. Finding the way so designated also obstructed, they returned to the first car, when, as the plaintiff seeks to prove and the defendant to deny, the employees directed them to follow another course likewise designated in order to reach the second car, and that in following the same that plaintiff fell from a high wall and received the injury for which he seeks recovery. There is no denial that the employees directed the car first designated and abandoned."

The court further said:

"The evidence relating to directions by defendant, while not convincing beyond doubt, is nevertheless sufficiently clear to sustain the jury's finding in that respect."

It would seem from these quotations that this branch of the case is rested upon the fact that the plaintiff was acting under the immediate direction and control of the servants and employees of the street car company. The other ground upon which the decision was rested is founded upon a state of facts so essentially different from the instant case that it does not seem to require notice.

In Wilson v. Detroit United Railways, 167 Mich. 107, 132 N. W. 768, while containing general statements to the effect that a person is a passenger while transferring along a public street, the question of whether or not the plaintiff was a passenger of the company which injured him was not involved. In that case a blind man with a transfer was told by the conductor of the car from which he had alighted that the street was clear to the end of the line, and, acting upon this advice, he started across the street, but was struck by a car of a connecting line, and recovery was denied on the ground of his contributory negligence.

In Clark v. Traction Co., 188 N. C. 77, 50 S. E. 518, 107 Am. St. Rep. 526, the plaintiff had a transfer from one car to another. He had one hand on the rail at the rear of the car he was to enter, and one foot on the rear step of the car, and he was injured by being thrown from the car by a sudden start without warning. This state of facts is clearly within the holdings of this court in Va. Trust Co. v. Raymond, 120 Va. 674, 91 S. E. 613, and in Virginia, etc., Co. v. Arnold, 121 Va. 204, 92 S. E. 925, the latter holding that a person standing at a proper place to board an approaching car and intending to board and pay his fare is entitled to the rights of the passenger even before boarding or attempting to board the car.

In Loggins v. Southern Public Utility Co., 181 N. C. 221, 106 S. E. 823, a young boy holding a transfer alighted from the car at a regular transfer point. As soon as he alighted he discovered he had left a basket in the car and went back to get it. When he alighted from the car the second time and had taken only one step he was hit by a passing automobile. The company was held liable on the ground that it was the duty of the carrier to discharge the passenger in proper manner and at a proper time and place reasonably safe for the purpose. Two judges dissented. While the majority opinion contains expressions in accord with the views of the defendant in error in this case, it is distinctly held that whether a person under a given set of facts should be considered in law a passenger while transferring from one street car to another although holding a transfer ticket, must be determined ultimately by the facts and circumstances attending the transfer in each particular case. In other words, in that particular case it was a question for the jury whether under all the circumstances the carrier had discharged the plaintiff in the proper manner and in a reasonably safe place. The question involved would really seem to be whether the plaintiff had been afforded a reasonable opportunity for reaching a safe place after alighting from the car.

It will be observed that practically all of the foregoing cases belong to one or the other of two classes: Where the passenger is boarding or about to board the car, or is alighting or has just alighted from the car, and has not had the opportunity of reaching a place of safety, and in either case is injured either by the car from which he has alighted or the one he is about to board. The other class is where the passenger is within the physical control of the carrier, or the latter has undertaken directly or indirectly to direct the movements of the passenger. There is still a third class of cases which we have not noticed: Injuries to passengers at the stations or on the platforms of commercial steam railroads. Such are Balt. & O. R. Co. v. Hauer, 60 Md. 449, and Parsons v. New York, etc., R. Co., 113 N. Y. 355, 21 N. E. 145, 8 L. R. A. 683, 10 Am. St. Rep. 450. Such railroads own and have complete control over not only their roadbeds, but their station platforms, yards, and sidings, and for these reasons stand on a different footing in many respects from other railways in their relation to passengers.

[5] There seems to be good reason and also authority for holding that the relation of passenger is not sustained while a passenger with a transfer is outside of the direction and control of the carrier and walking along the public highway. The reason for the high degree of care required of carriers of persons is the tender regard the law has for human life and limbs, and the fact that the carrier has the selection, control, management, and operation of the whole instrumentalities of carriage, and a limited control over and direction of the conduct of the passenger. It may make and enforce reasonable rules for the protection of passengers, but, if the passenger may place himself outside of the pale of influence of the carrier, beyond its control and direction, and still retain his character as passenger, such rules would be wholly inoperative and useless, and the carrier would be without means to protect the passenger from injury, or itself from liability. A transfer ticket imposes no liability on the carrier to make the transfer. The passenger himself makes the transfer, and generally without direction or suggestion from the carrier. The transfer ticket is simply an undertaking on the part of the carrier to continue the carriage further without additional charge if the passenger, in accordance with its terms, again presents himself at the proper place for carriage. It generally designates the point at which the journey is to be renewed, but contains no contract, express or implied, for safety in making the transfer. In the interim between leaving the car and offering himself as a passenger on another, the passenger is not under the care or custody of the carrier, nor subject to his direction or control, and may be far from the carrier's powers of observation. It would seem unreasonable, therefore, to hold the carrier liable to one as a passenger during such interval.

In Niles v. Boston Electric Ry. Co., 225 Mass. 570, 114 N. E. 730, it appears that the plaintiff held a transfer from a Watertown car to a Newton car, and that when the car on which she was riding arrived at the place of transfer a number of passengers from the Watertown car went forward to take the Newton which was waiting. The Newton car was waiting about three car lengths further on a direct line. When the Watertown car stopped the conductor said, "All change here; all change; all change for Newton." The passengers then alighted, the plaintiff being the last one on the car, and leaving at the rear end. While she was walking along the street in the direction of the Newton car, but after she had been afforded a reasonable opportunity to reach a place of safety, the Watertown car from which she had alighted started, and, as it rounded the corner to enter the barn, struck her. The trial court left it to the jury to determine whether or not the plaintiff was a passenger, to which the defendant excepted. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, to which exceptions were alleged, which exceptions were sustained by the Supreme Judicial Court. It is said in the opinion:

"In her declaration the plaintiff alleged that while transferring from the Watertown to the Newton car she was a passenger. The presiding judge left it to the jury to decide whether, on the fact shown, she was such, and the defendant's exceptions to this part of the judge's charge presents the only question for decision.

"The plaintiff, when injured, was not on the defendant's premises, nor at a station or platform in use for the purpose of transferring passengers and within the control of the carrier; neither was she under its direction and within its care. She was upon a public highway where she was exposed to dangers not caused by the defendant. In passing from one car to the other she could go on either side of the car, she could choose her own way, and her movements were entirely under her own guidance. While so walking on a public highway and in transferring from one car to the other, as matter of law, she was not a passenger.

"There may be cases where there is evidence to show that the carrier assumes to direct the movements of persons while upon the highway, or where such a duty rests upon it, and where the acts justify the finding that, although upon the highway, they are in the care of the carrier and the relation of passenger and carrier exists. But there are no such facts in the case at bar.

"In Wakeley v. Boston Elevated Railway, 217 Mass. 488, the passenger was injured while in the act of alighting from a car, by stepping into a depression. In Powers v. Old Colony Street Railway, 201 Mass. 66, the running of the defendant's cars was interrupted by the abolition of a grade crossing, and it was necessary for the passengers to leave the cars and go around the obstruction on foot, to take other cars in order to continue their travel. The defendant prepared a way over adjoining land for its patrons to pass. It pointed out this way to them, invited them to use it, and by so doing assumed an obligation to provide reasonably for their safety; it was held that the question of the defendant's care was for the jury. In the case of Gurley v. Springfield Street Railway, 206 Mass. 534, the plaintiff was upon the defendant's premises when injured. In Tompkins v. Boston Elevated Railway, 201 Mass. 114, the plaintiff stepped from the front vestibule of a crowded surface car to permit other passengers to alight, and was injured by the car starting when he had one foot on the step and was putting up the other foot. It was there held that he was a passenger.

"All these cases are to be distinguished from the one before us. In none of them was the injured person a traveler on a public street. In the case at bar there was no assumption of the duty of directing the movements of passengers, nor was there any holding itself out as a carrier of passengers in protecting the safety of those who were traveling from one car to the other.

"If the defendant was guilty of negligence, it was, of course, liable to the plaintiff; but it cannot be held to that high degree of care required of a carrier toward its passengers."

In Finseth v. City & S. R. Co., 32 Or. 1, 51 Pac. 84, 39 L. R. A. 517, a woman was transferring from one car to another, on a regular transfer ticket, and was injured while using a temporary passageway erected by the company for the use of its passengers over some water in the street. It was held that, in making the transfer, there was an interruption of the relation of carrier and passenger from the moment of leaving one until the other was reached, and that the duty owing by the carrier as to the passageway was ordinary care.

Chicago, etc., v. Jennings, 190 Ill. 478, 60 N. E. 818, 54 L. R. A. 827, was the case of a commercial steam railroad, which is required to provide safe stations and platforms for its passengers, and the question was whether the plaintiff had become a passenger. He had a commutation ticket in his pocket.

It was held that a person with a commutation ticket, crossing the track of a railroad along a street to take a train, but who has not yet reached the station or platform provided for boarding trains, is not a passenger.

In completing this review of the cases relied on by counsel on the one side or the other, we wish to acknowledge our indebtedness to counsel for their excellent briefs and critical examination of the cases which have greatly lightened our labors and which we have practically followed.

Massachusetts and the courts of a number of other states hold that the relation of carrier and passenger terminates as soon as the passenger alights in a public street and gets a firm foothold there. Creamer v. West End Street Ry. Co., 156 Mass. 320, 31 N. E. 391, 16 L. R. A. 490, 32 Am. St. Rep. 456; Finseth v. Street, etc., Ry. Co., 32 Or. 1, 51 Pac. 84, 39 L. R. A. 517; Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Boddy, 105 Tenn. 668, 58 S. W. 646, 51 L. R. A. 885; Welsh v. Spokane, etc., R. Co., 91 Wash. 260, 157 Pac. 680, L. R. A. 1816F, 484; Chesley v. Waterloo, etc., R. Co., 188 Iowa, 1004, 176 N. W. 961, 12 A. L. R. 1366. But that question is not involved in the instant case, as it sufficiently appears that the plaintiff had reached a place of safety after alighting from the car upon which she took passage. Nor is such holding at all essential to the view taken in the Niles Case. In the Niles Case, as in Ellis v. Virginia Ry., etc., Co., supra, the plaintiff had been afforded reasonable opportunity to reach a place of safety, but had not availed herself of that opportunity. In the instant case the plaintiff had reached a place of safety on the sidewalk, and then continued of her own volition to approach the place of re-embarkation in any way she saw fit. She was not in any wise under the direction or control of the street car company. Nor was any invitation, directly or indirectly, extended to her as to what route she should take. In making the transfer she was exercising her own judgment, and was not at that time a passenger of the street railway company. She was simply a pedestrian in the street to whom the street car company owed the same duty that it owed to other pedestrians crossing its tracks, but no greater.

Certain ordinances of the city of Richmond relating to the operation of street cars were introduced in evidence over the objection of the defendant, and an instruction based thereon was given by the court, which was duly excepted to by the defendant. It is unnecessary to pass on the admissibility of these ordinances, as the trial court expressly limited their application to a case where the jury believed from the evidence that the plaintiff was a passenger, and this limitation cannot occur on another trial.

The verdict of the jury determined the fact that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that the damage sustained by her amounted to $7,500.

[6] This disposes of all the questions necessary to be decided in this cause, except the question of whether or not the defendant exercised ordinary care for the protection of the plaintiff as a pedestrian in the street, upon which the evidence was conflicting. The verdict of the jury will therefore be set aside, and the judgment of the trial court thereon reversed, and, in pursuance of section 6365 of the Code, the case will be remanded to the trial court, with direction to impanel a jury to determine the following question: Assuming that the plaintiff was a pedestrian in the street, and not a passenger, was free from negligence, and sustained damage by reason of the injury in the declaration mentioned to the amount of $7,500, was such injury proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant? If this question shall be answered in the affirmative, the trial court shall enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the sum of $7,500, with legal interest thereon from May 14, 1920, till payment; if in the negative, it shall enter judgment for the defendant.

Reversed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

(132 Va. 166)

CANADA et ux. v. C. H. BEASLEY & BROS., Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Sales ~~§~~ 17—Creditor held not entitled to sue wife of bankrupt for goods supplied to business managed by bankrupt.

Defendant transferred his land and goods to his wife for a nominal consideration, but remained in control and possession. Plaintiff sold him goods on credit. Defendant's wife retransferred the land and goods to defendant, who selected and set apart the land as his homestead exemption and became a bankrupt. Plaintiff entered the bankruptcy proceedings and shared in the distribution. In a suit by him seeking to subject the homestead to his claim remaining unpaid, on the theory that the business at the time he supplied goods was owned by defendant's wife, and that the retransfer to defendant was in fraud of creditors, held that, under neither Code 1904, § 2414, relating to fraudulent transfers, nor section 2460a, pertaining to sales of merchandise in bulk, was the transfer by defendant's wife to him fraudulent as to plaintiff, since plaintiff had sold goods to the defendant while he was in control of the business, and not to his wife.

2. Estoppel \Rightarrow 91(1)—Creditor held estopped to claim that property belonged to bankrupt's wife and to sue her for goods supplied.

Where a creditor took part in the bankruptcy proceedings and did not object to the allowance of a homestead exemption to the bankrupt, he cannot thereafter claim that the property constituting the homestead at the time the creditor supplied goods to the bankrupt belonged to the bankrupt's wife, and subject the homestead to his claim on the theory that the debt to him was owed by the bankrupt's wife, to whom the bankrupt had transferred the business before plaintiff sold him the goods, and by whom it was re-transferred to the bankrupt.

3. Bankruptcy \Rightarrow 400(1)—Court of bankruptcy has jurisdiction to determine claim of bankrupt to his exemption.

Under U. S. Comp. St. § 9586, bankruptcy courts have jurisdiction to determine the claims of bankrupts to their exemption, and when the claims are determined the conclusion cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding.

4. Bankruptcy \Rightarrow 400(1) — Bankruptcy court held to have no jurisdiction of specific liens or other claims against property of bankrupt paramount to the homestead.

Under U. S. Comp. St. § 9586, the court of bankruptcy has jurisdiction to determine claims of a bankrupt to exemption, but has nothing to do with the enforcement of specific liens or other claims against his property paramount to a homestead.

5. Bankruptcy \Rightarrow 400(4)—Creditor by failure to attack allowance of homestead exemption to bankrupt waives his right to attack it.

Where a creditor present in the bankruptcy proceedings made no attack on the allowance of a homestead exemption to the bankrupt, he lost his right to assail the exemption, and may not attack it in a collateral proceeding except for the enforcement of some prior lien or some claim paramount to the exemption.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Halifax County.

Suit by O. H. Beasley & Bros., Inc., against R. C. Canada and wife. From a decree for complainant, respondents appeal. Reversed.

James H. Guthrie, of South Boston, for appellants.

Frank L. Thomasson, of Lynchburg, and Jas. S. Easley, of Halifax, for appellee.

KELLY, P. In essentials, the case is this: On September 12, 1917, R. O. Canada, a merchant, conveyed to his wife, Annie C. Canada, for a consideration expressed in the deed as "$10.00 cash in hand and the further consideration of love and affection," a certain lot on which was situated his storehouse and dwelling attached; and by the same conveyance he transferred to his wife his stock of goods and fixtures in the storehouse. This deed was duly recorded, either on its date or within a few days thereafter. There is a statement in the brief for appellee, and a suggestion in a question in one of the depositions in the case, to the effect that the date of recordation was September 22d, but according to the copy of the deed in the transcript before us, it was recorded on the 12th day of September, the day of its execution. The deed contained a condition subsequent, upon the happening of which all the property thereby conveyed would revert to R. O. Canada. Simultaneously with, or immediately after, the execution of the deed, by written contract of that date, Annie C. Canada "contracts and agrees to sell to the said R. C. Canada all of the merchandise in said storehouse which was formerly owned by the said R. O. Canada for the sum of $2,000.00, which sum is evidenced by a certain note of even date herewith drawn by the said R. O. Canada and payable to the said Annie Canada one year after date with interest after maturity." There was, in fact, no valuable consideration either for the conveyance of the lot and buildings and stock of goods, or for the resale of the goods; and there was no actual transfer of the possession of the goods from Canada to his wife and in turn from her to him. He was in possession at the time of the execution of the above-mentioned deed and contract, and so remained, continuing his business as a merchant until February 20, 1918. Subsequent to September 12, 1917, and before the end of that calendar year, he purchased of O. H. Beasley & Bros., Inc. (appellee), various bills of merchandise amounting in the aggregate to $623.48, and during the same period purchased other like bills from other parties, the whole of which, including the Beasley Bros. bill, amounted to $4,523.18. All of these purchases were made on credit extended solely to him in the regular course of trade, were evidenced by open accounts, and remained wholly unpaid when the petition in bankruptcy hereinafter referred to was filed.

On January 26, 1918, Annie C. Canada made a deed to R. C. Canada for an expressed consideration of "five dollars and other valuable considerations," whereby she (1) conveyed to him the lot and buildings aforesaid, and (2) recited the contemporaneous interchange between them of the title to the stock of goods as above set out, and then proceeded to "grant, release, and convey" to him "all of the stock of general merchandise and fixtures now on hand and contained in the storehouse aforesaid." This deed was duly recorded on January 28, 1918. On the 20th day of February, 1918, by a writing duly executed, R. C. Canada selected and set apart as his homestead exemption the aforesaid lot and buildings, valued in the homestead deed at $1,800 and certain articles of personal property valued therein at $184.75. This claim of homestead was recorded on February 21, 1918.

On the last-named date, February 21, 1918, R. C. Canada was adjudged a bankrupt upon a petition filed by him on the day before. In the schedule of assets filed in the bankrupt court he included the lot and buildings and personal property described in his homestead deed and all other property of every kind owned by him, but indicated in the schedule, conformably to the forms and practice in bankruptcy proceedings, his claim under the state law to the exemption already set apart by him under the homestead deed.

At the first meeting of the creditors, March 4, 1918, before the referee in bankruptcy, three appraisers were appointed for the estate, and William Leigh was named as trustee and took charge of the property. The appraisers subsequently valued the stock of goods at $2,800, fixtures and furniture in the store at $165.70, personal property in Canada's dwelling house $226.70, and real estate (lot and buildings aforesaid) $2,000—total $5,192.40.

At the creditors' meeting on March 4th, mentioned above, C. H. Beasley & Bros., Inc., among others, appeared by counsel and filed its proof of claim for $623.48.

On March 27th the trustee made his report in which he recited, among other things, the conveyance of September 12, 1917, from Canada to his wife, and her reconveyance to him of January 26, 1918, and then said:

"Under these circumstances the trustee has grave doubt as to whether the bankrupt's claim of exemption should be allowed. He has set apart the property in the foregoing schedule merely in the automatic performance of a ministerial duty. And he respectfully asks leave of the court to litigate the question of the bankrupt's right to said exemption, and to employ counsel to assist him in said litigation."

On April 8, 1918, Quinn-Marshall Company, one of the creditors represented by the same counsel as Beasley & Bros., excepted to the allowance of the homestead exemption. The exception, however, was not based upon the ground indicated in the trustee's report as his reason for questioning the exemption, but on the ground that the property claimed in the homestead deed amounted in the aggregate to more than $2,000. The referee on July 31, 1918, passed upon this exception, the only one made by any creditor to the allowance of the exemption, as follows:

"I am therefore of the opinion and decide that the trustee's report setting apart the homestead exemption should be, and the same is hereby, approved and confirmed. It is therefore ordered that the trustee deliver the property in his hands if any there be, to the bankrupt in accordance with said report."

The stock of goods surrendered by the bankrupt, valued in his schedule at $3,000, and appraised at $2,800, was sold by the trustee for $2,025.53; Beasley Bros. & Co.

claiming and being allowed its share therein as a general creditor of R. C. Canada.

[1] The decrees from which this appeal was taken were rendered in a suit instituted in September, 1918, after all of the foregoing events and proceedings had transpired, by C. H. Beasley & Bros., Inc., "on behalf of itself and on behalf of and for the benefit of all other creditors of Mrs. Annie C. Canada who may come into this cause and prove their claims and pay their proper share of the costs." After alleging the transactions between the husband and wife and the bankruptcy proceedings hereinbefore set out, and specifically showing that the complainant had proved its claim in the bankruptcy court and would share in the distribution of the proceeds of the estate to be therein distributed, the bill made the following allegations: That Mrs. Canada's attempted retransfer of the stock of goods to her husband on September 12, 1917, was void by virtue of the provisions of section 2414 of the Code of 1904; that the goods purchased as aforesaid by R. C. Canada after September 12, 1917, were purchased for Annie C. Canada and placed in the stock of goods owned by her, and therefore she became thereby liable to the creditors for the amount of said purchases; that her conveyance to him of the stock of goods by deed of January 26, 1918, was void because it was a transfer of merchandise in bulk without compliance with the terms of section 2460a, of the Code of 1904, and that therefore, under the statute, R. C. Canada became also personally liable along with his wife for the debt owed by the latter to the complainant amounting to $623.48, which, as stated in the bill, would be "subject to the credit of the amounts to be received upon the distribution to creditors of the assets of the estate of R. C. Canada in bankruptcy as above set out"; that the complainant by reason of the above-alleged facts became a creditor of Mrs. Canada before she made the deed to her husband for the real and personal property therein described; and that the last-named deed was for a consideration not deemed valuable in law and was made to hinder, delay, and defraud her creditors. The bill makes no attack on the deed of September 12, 1917, from Canada to his wife, but expressly relies thereon and avers that it "created in Annie C. Canada a fee-simple title in the above-described house and lot," subject to the conditions therein named.

The prayer of the bill is that R. C. Canada and Annie C. Canada be made parties defendant; that the deed of January 26, 1918, be set aside and declared null and void as to the complainant and other creditors of Annie C. Canada; that the homestead deed of February 20, 1918, be likewise set aside and declared null and void as to the creditors of Annie C. Canada; that the property included in the homestead deed be sold or rented, and the proceeds be held by the court for the benefit of complainant and other creditors of Annie C. Canada "subject to the terms and conditions of the said deed from Canada to his wife bearing date September 12, 1917."

To this bill R. C. Canada and his wife filed certain so-called exceptions, and also filed their separate demurrers and answers, and in addition thereto R. C. Canada filed a plea of res judicata; this plea being based upon the bankruptcy proceedings hereinbefore set out. Evidence was taken in the cause, and the court entered the several decrees appealed from, the effect of which was to overrule the "exceptions," demurrers, plea of res judicata, and all defenses set up in the answers, and hold that Annie C. Canada was the owner of the property embraced in the homestead deed, that both Canada and wife were liable to the plaintiff, and that the lot and buildings embraced in the homestead deed should be sold and subjected to the payment of the complainant's debt.

There is no real merit in the appellee's position. It has realized every cent it could have obtained on its debt if none of the transactions between Canada and wife upon which it relies had ever taken place. Its claim was merely that of a general creditor of R. C. Canada without lien of any kind and without waiver of exemption, and not only is it true that no effort is being made in the pending suit to reach the property on account of any personal liability of R. C. Canada (the suit resting entirely upon the alleged indebtedness of Mrs. Canada), but the homestead deed under the facts of this case cut off the appellee's right to subject the real estate. The exemption as above pointed out, had been claimed and duly perfected before any of the transfers involved in this suit had been attacked or challenged.

There is no substantial foundation for the contention that the transactions between Canada and wife operated to constitute Mrs. Canada a debtor as to purchases made by her husband after September 12, 1917. It is conceded that these purchases were made by Canada in his own name and solely on his own credit; and the evidence clearly shows that the so-called agreement to resell the stock of goods was made and accepted on September 12, 1917, and that R. C. Canada was then and thereafter continued in actual possession. Under these circumstances it would seem clear that neither section 2414 nor section 2460a, Code 1904, in any way affected the title which R. C. Canada took under the contract, and that the clause in the deed of January 26, 1918, with respect to the stock of goods amounted to no more than a surplus and wholly unnecessary confirmation of the contract. (The debt of the appellee and the debts of the other creditors for whose benefit the appellee claims to sue were not in existence on September 12, 1917, and there is no contention that section 2460a affected the resale as of that date.)

[2] Should there be any doubt, however, about the soundness of the above answer to the claim of liability against Mrs. Canada, a conclusive answer is found in the course pursued by the appellee. It certainly knew, when its claim was filed in the bankruptcy proceedings, of the deed of January 26, 1918, recorded January 28, 1918, and that deed expressly recited the former deed and contract between Canada and wife. Counsel representing appellee filed in the bankruptcy proceedings on behalf of another creditor a certain exception hereinbefore recited to the trustee's recognition of the homestead, and this exception was overruled by the referee, and no appeal from that ruling was taken. The trustee's report, calling specific attention to the deed of January 26, 1918, and expressing doubt arising from its terms as to the right of Canada to claim the exemption, was not excepted to on any ground by the complainant. Notwithstanding all this, the appellee with full knowledge of the facts, elected to treat the entire property, real and personal, as belonging to R. C. Canada, and to assert its debt against him alone. Under these circumstances we have no hesitancy in holding that this creditor cannot now assume a different attitude, and claim that the property belonged to Mrs. Canada, and that the debt was due from her.

"A party is forbidden to assume successive positions in the course of a suit or series of suits, in reference to the same fact or state of facts, which are inconsistent with each other and mutually contradictory." C. & O. R. Co. v. Rison, 99 Va. 18, 31, 37 S. E. 320, 324.

The effort to hold Mrs. Canada as a creditor has therefore, in any view, entirely failed, and this is conclusive of the whole case. The complainant is not seeking to set aside the deed of September 12, 1917, from Canada to his wife, but expressly relies thereon, and the sole purpose of the suit is to set aside the deed of January 26, 1918, from her to him, basing this effort solely upon the theory that Mrs. Canada is a debtor of the complainant. As we have just seen, she is not such debtor, and this destroys the foundation of the suit. There is an averment in the bill to the effect that R. O. Canada, by reason of his purchase through the deed of January 26, 1918, of the goods in bulk, became indebted by virtue of the provisions of section 2460a, supra, for the debt upon which the complainant sues, but the only purpose of that allegation, as clearly shown by the context, was to justify the complainant's conduct in going into the bankruptcy case as a creditor of Canada and claiming its pro rata in the distribution of the fund realized from sale of the stock of goods which Canada had surrendered and which were being administered in that proceeding. The suit before us was aimed exclusively at Mrs. Canada and depended absolutely upon establishing a liability against her. The effort to show such liability having failed, no case has been made against her, and an order dismissing the bill is the only order which can properly be entered in the cause.

[3] It is perfectly clear that in this proceeding, and under the allegations and facts above disclosed, the homestead exemption claimed and perfected by R. C. Canada and allowed to him in due course in the bankruptcy case cannot be disturbed. There can be no doubt about the proposition that a court of bankruptcy has jurisdiction to determine the claim of a bankrupt to his exemption. This is expressly declared in section 2, c. 2, 30 Stat. 546 (U. S. Comp. St. § 9586), wherein it is said that—

"Courts of bankruptcy * * * are hereby invested * * * with * * * jurisdiction at law and in equity * * * to * * * to determine all claims of bankrupts to their exemption."

There may be some doubt as to whether this an exclusive jurisdiction, but none as to the power of the court to determine the question, and when it is determined then it is settled once for all and cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding. See In re Allen (D. C.) 134 Fed. 620; McGahan v. Anderson, 113 Fed. 115, 51 C. C. A. 92; 3 Remington on Bankruptcy, 2868.

[4] The jurisdiction of the bankruptcy courts, however, does not extend further than the determination and allowance of the exemption. It had nothing to do with the enforcement of specific liens or other claims against the property paramount to the homestead. Newberry Shoe Co. v. Collier, 111 Va. 288, 68 S. E. 974; Lockwood v. Exchange Bank, 190 U. S. 294, 23 Sup. Ct. 751, 47 L. Ed. 1061.

It is not necessary for us to go in this case as far as did the learned judge of the District Court for the Western District of Virginia in a very careful and instructive opinion in the case of In re Allen, supra, holding that section 191 of the present Constitution cannot be construed so as to invalidate a homestead exemption claimed in property fraudulently conveyed unless the conveyance of such property has been annulled by decree of court at the time the claim is asserted. It may be that the decisions of this court in Dickenson v. Patton, 110 Va. 5, 65 S. E. 529, and Newberry Shoe Co. v. Collier, supra, are in conflict with this holding of the District Court, although neither the Dickenson Case nor the Newberry Shoe Co. Case makes any reference to the Allen Case. But we have before us now a situation very different from that with which the courts were dealing in either of these three cases. In the instant case the transfers which are challenged had never been in any way questioned when the homestead exemption was claimed and set apart in the manner allowed by law, and the exemption was thereafter duly allowed, without challenge by the complainant, in the bankruptcy proceedings.

[5] Under these circumstances we have no difficulty in holding that the complainant, if it ever had any right to assail the homestead, lost that right by its course in the bankruptcy court, and that the exempted property cannot now be successfully attacked except for the enforcement of some prior lien, or some claim paramount to the exemption.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the decrees complained of are erroneous, and should be reversed. An order will be entered in this court dismissing the complainant's bill.

Reversed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

EWING v. HAAS, Circuit Judge.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Prohibition ~~§ 40~~—Writ will be awarded to prevent disqualified trial judge from sitting.

Where a trial judge is in fact disqualified to sit in a case but, notwithstanding such disqualification, is allowed to sit therein, a writ of prohibition may be awarded, although the court over which respondent presides has jurisdiction of the cause.

2. Attorney and client ~~§ 63~~—Contract of employment express or implied necessary to create relation.

To establish the relation of attorney and client, there must be a contract of employment, express or implied, between the attorney and the party for whom he appears, or some one authorized to represent him.

3. Judges ~~§ 40(2)~~—Trial judge held not disqualified to sit because of aiding in preparation of brief on appeal.

Where a trial judge, after having decided that a cause before him was triable at law and not in equity, furnished data for appellee's brief on appeal, and the case was affirmed, a writ of prohibition to prevent him from sitting in the law case will be refused, there being a mere bias arising as to the conclusion on the purely legal question as to whether the case was triable at law or equity, which had previously been decided on appeal.

Petition by one Ewing against T. N. Haas, Judge of the Twenty-Fifth Judicial Circuit, for a writ of prohibition. Petition refused.

Ed. C. Martz, D. O. Dechert, and Jno. T. Harris, all of Harrisonburg, and Hugh A. White, of Lexington, for petitioner.

H. W. Bertram, Geo. S. Harnsberger, Geo. N. Conrad, all of Harrisonburg, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prohibit Hon. T. N. Haas, judge of the Twenty-Fifth judicial circuit, from hearing an action of law pending in his court under the style of Ewing v. Dutrow.

The facts and circumstances leading up to the controversy are as follows: A suit in chancery had been brought by Ewing and others against the Dutrows, to recover damages for deceit alleged to have been practiced in the sale of certain corporate stock. There was a demurrer to the bill, and several grounds of demurrer were stated, but the chief ground of demurrer relied on, and the one upon which Judge Haas rested his decision, was that equity was without jurisdiction in the premises and that the complainants' remedy was at law. On this ground the complainants' bill was dismissed. An appeal was taken to this court (128 Va. 416, 104 S. E. 791), which affirmed the judgment of the trial court. Thereupon Ewing brought his action at law in said circuit court against the Dutrows. Before the latter case was called for hearing, Ewing applied to Judge Haas, by motion in open court, supported by his affidavit, to certify to the Governor that he was so situated, with reference to the case, as to render it improper in his judgment for him to sit, and to ask for the designation of another judge to sit in the case. This application was promptly denied. Thereupon the present petition for a writ of prohibition was filed in this court. The petition alleges, as the ground of the writ:

"That Hon. T. N. Haas, judge of this court, who passed upon the demurrer in said chancery suit, and entered said decree dismissing the same, wrote the greater portion of the brief for appellee upon said appeal; and as affiant believes, by reason thereof, is not now in the unbiased position which, under the law, a judge should occupy in presiding at the trial of this case; and as affiant believes, said Judge is not capable of presiding fairly at such trial."

Judge Haas and the Dutrows were made defendants to the petition and answered the same. Depositions were taken on each side, and the case is now before us for decision. Judge Haas, in his answer and also in his deposition, details fully his connection with the brief filed for the Dutrows in this court and denies any bias or other reason that would render it improper for him to sit in the case. In his answer he says:

"At the time of deciding the case in the circuit court, this respondent prepared a written opinion containing his decision and the reasons for it, but this opinion was not present with the papers of the case when the decision was announced in court, having been left lying on a basket on respondent's desk, in his study, at his home, when the papers in this case along with other cases were put into his bag and carried to court. The case was decided in January, 1919. Some time afterwards, how long respondent does not remember, the opinion which had been prepared as aforesaid was handed by respondent to counsel for defendants (appellees) in the case to make such use of as he might see fit on the hearing of the case in the Court of Appeals. The greater portion of this opinion was embodied in the brief of counsel for the appellees (the Dutrows), with matter of his own interspersed in it here and there. The portions of the opinion used (some of it not being pertinent to the matter of a brief) commences on page '5' of the printed brief and ends at the top of page '8,' and would aggregate, if all the parts of the opinion were brought together, about two pages. The opinion aforesaid is all the matter of which respondent was the author, that went into the brief of counsel. The printed brief contains 16 pages. This respondent knows nothing about the preparation of the brief or what it contained until a day or two before the argument of the case in the Court of Appeals, in September, 1920, when Mr. George N. Conrad, counsel for the appellees, handed him a copy of his brief, already printed and filed, and at the same time, as respondent believes, a copy of the reply brief for appellants, which also had already been printed and filed. As your Honors well know, it is not an uncommon thing for counsel to furnish copies of their briefs in the Court of Appeals to the judge of the lower court.

"In the opinion prepared by respondent when deciding the case in the circuit court, respondent had referred to the jurisdiction exercised by the court of chancery to decree an abatement of purchase money for a deficiency in the quantity of land sold, and said that was a different case from a demand for damages such as was made by the bill in the Ewing case—proceeding further to distinguish the two cases briefly. Counsel for appellants in their reply brief, commenting upon the chancery jurisdiction to abate or compensate for a deficiency in the quantity of land sold; and seeking to draw from it an argument to support the jurisdiction in chancery of a demand for damages for deceit, said: 'Appellees admit that equity has jurisdiction of a bill for an abatement of purchase money on a sale of land for a deficiency, and say, "But that is a different case from the one made by the bill in the case." They fail, however, to differentiate between them.' And further: 'The equitable jurisdiction being established to decree an abatement of purchase money, even in a case of mistake, not induced by fraud, how much more reason is there for the power, in equity, to restore to the injured party the loss occasioned by an actual fraud.'

"On reading the reply brief for appellants, respondent, who had made a more exhaustive examination of the question at the time of writing the opinion than was expressed in the opinion, told Mr. Conrad that he would give him an answer to the two paragraphs above quoted, and proceeded to elaborate in a pencil note the treatment of the question contained in the opinion, and gave it to Mr. Conrad, counsel for appellees, this note citing and quoting from the case of Blessing's Adm'rs v. Beatty, 1 Rob. (40 Va.) 287, 296, a case which respondent is sat-issued he examined when the case was before him in the circuit court, though it was not cited in the opinion, probably because the reference was not immediately at hand when the opinion was written. What use Mr. Conrad made of this memorandum (which makes about a page and a half of typewritten matter) respondent did not know definitely until the 21st day of September, 1921, when he caused an examination to be made of the files of the case in the records of the clerk's office of the Supreme Court of Appeals, at Staunton, and, upon information obtained in that way, as well as from the recollection of Mr. Conrad, himself, respondent avers that the note furnished by respondent was never filed in the case at all, but the case of Blessing's Adm'rs v. Beatty, referred to in the note was cited by Mr. Conrad, with a statement of its purport, in a typewritten 'insert' comprising something less than nine lines, which was inserted in the paging of the brief, as respondent is informed, with the consent of counsel for the appellants.

"In the course of 15 years of service as judge of the Twenty-Fifth Judicial circuit of Virginia, respondent has, on a number of occasions, given authorities and suggested arguments to counsel for use on appeal from his decisions, and sometimes has given written memorandums. He has given such authorities and suggestions to counsel for the appealing party, to combat his own decisions with, as well as to counsel who were for affirming his decisions. He does this sometimes from the bench, and sometimes in conversation with the counsel, together or separately, indifferently, as it may happen or as occasion may arise. His object has been to give such material as he had at hand, as the result of his study and research in reaching his own decisions, to the elucidation of the question involved. Respondent's interest is an intellectual and professional interest, not singular or unusual, and even involving little if any pride of opinion, though of course he desires to be right, and to be confirmed in his opinion that he is right by the approval of this honorable court.

"Respondent denies that he is in a position of bias or prejudice by reason of his action in the premises, or because of anything else, and submits that the cause assigned for this proceeding is without merit and an empty thing."

It appears from the testimony that the opinion of Judge Haas was not made a part of the record, nor filed with the papers in the cause in the clerk's office; that Mr. Conrad is a brother-in-law of Judge Haas; that counsel for Ewing had no knowledge or information about the delivery by Judge Haas to Mr. Conrad of the copy of his opinion, or the pencil memorandum in answer to appellants' reply brief, but that they recognized Judge Haas' style in the brief for the Duntrows, and brought it to his attention, when he admitted the giving of said opinion to Mr. Conrad, and in this way they learned for the first time what had been done. A number of lawyers of the Rockingham bar testified that they had never received from Judge Haas assistance such as he sets out in his answer he had "on a number of occasions" given to counsel.

The parties waived all questions as to the jurisdiction of this court to award the writ and have asked us to decide the case on its merits. Any order we could make in the case, except to dismiss it, would be the assumption of jurisdiction, hence we must pass on the question. Bragg v. Justus (Va.) 106 S. E. 335.

In 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 223, it is said:

"A writ of prohibition will lie to restrain a judge from presiding in an action in which he is disqualified by reason of interest, although the court over which he presides may have jurisdiction of cause."

The following, among other cases, are cited to sustain the text: North Bloomfield Gravel Min. Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315; Conolly v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 328; State v. Wear, 129 Mo. 619, 81 S. W. 608; State v. Board of Education, 19 Wash. 8, 52 Pac. 317, 40 L. R. A. 317, 67 Am. St. Rep. 706. But in People v. Jerome, 86 Misc. Rep. 256, 73 N. Y. Supp. 306, the writ was refused when sought, upon the ground that the judge was biased where no interest on the part of the judge was shown. It is also said in 32 Cyc. 607, that, where a judge is disqualified by reason of interest, prohibition will lie, although the court over which he presides has jurisdiction.

In Coal Co. v. Doolittle, 54 W. Va. 210, 46 S. E. 238, the above quotation from 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law is cited with approval. In the latter case the disqualification was on account of interest in the subject-matter and not mere bias, and in paragraph 3 of the syllabus it is said:

"In order to disqualify, the interest of the judge must be in the subject matter of the cause, and not merely in a legal question involved in it."

But the text of the opinion hardly warrants the opinion.

[1] In the instant case the circuit court of Rockingham has jurisdiction of the case, but the allegation of the petition is that Judge Haas is disqualified to sit by reason of the fact that he "wrote the greater portion of the brief for the appellee" and "is not capable of presiding fairly at such trial." If Judge Haas is in fact disqualified to sit in the case, but, notwithstanding such disqualification, is about to sit therein, it is a proper case for awarding the writ, although the court over which he presides has jurisdiction thereof.

[2] The peculiar feature of this case is that the objection to the judge is not on account of interest in the subject-matter, nor of relationship, by consanguinity or affinity, to any of the parties, but on account of bias on a purely legal question which has been settled and determined, and cannot again arise in the present controversy. Counsel for the petitioner seem to realize this, and have very earnestly argued before us that the position of Judge Haas is that of attorney for the Dutrows in the case, and that he has thereby incapacitated himself to sit as judge. In this view we cannot concur. In order to establish the relation of attorney and client there must be a contract of employment, express or implied, between the attorney and the party for whom he appears or some one authorized to represent him. 2 R. C. L. 953, § 25; 3 Cyc. 926; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 316. The evidence falls far short of establishing the relation of attorney and client, and counsel for the petitioner distinctly disavow any intention of charging the judge with lack of integrity. The following cases have been cited by the petitioner on the subject of judicial conduct and the necessity for public confidence therein: Boswell v. Flockheart, 8 Leigh (35 Va.) 364; Bowers' Adm'r v. Bowers, 29 Grat. (70 Va.) 697; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Taylor, 93 Va. 226, 24 S. E. 1013; also note 2 Va. Law Reg. 376; Davis v. Beazley, 75 Va. 491; Bowden v. Parrish, 86 Va. 67, 9 S. E. 616, 19 Am. St. Rep. 873; Corey v. Moore, 86 Va. 721, 11 S. E. 114; Moses v. Julian, 45 N. H. 52, 84 Am. Dec. 116; Coal Co. v. Doolittle, 54 W. Va. 210, 46 S. E. 238; Findley v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 299, 26 S. E. 370; State v. Cottrell, 45 W. Va. 839, 32 S. E. 162; State v. Hocker, 34 Fla. 25, 15 South. 581, 25 L. R. A. 117. There is also cited Constitution of Virginia, § 105; Code 1919, § 5975; Berger v. U. S., 255 U. S. 22, 41 Sup. Ct. 230, 65 L. Ed. 481.

[3] In the view we take of the facts of the case it is unnecessary to review these or other cases on this subject. There is no charge here of proprietary interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, nor of relationship to the parties, nor of fraud or corruption, nor of lack of integrity on the part of the judge, but simply a charge of bias, or leaning of the mind of the judge to a certain conclusion upon a purely legal question which was decided at the trial of the first case, and which cannot again arise on the trial of the second case; and that the conduct of the judge in maintaining his view of the legal question had been such as to place him in the position of counsel for the Dutrows. As already stated, the evidence does not at all warrant the charge that the judge occupied such a position, but it does disclose conduct on his part that was indiscreet, unwise, and injudicious, as is manifested by the present controversy. If he did not care to make his written opinion a part of his judgment, but wished counsel to have the benefit of it in the preparation of a brief in maintenance of his views, he should have filed it with the papers in the cause, so that it might have been accessible to counsel on both sides, and have refrained from further connection with the controversy which had passed from his jurisdiction and was then pending before this court. The record in this cause does not disclose any reflection upon the honesty, the uprightness, purity, or integrity of Judge Haas, and certainly we should not have suspected any, but only a bias on a purely legal question that had been decided on the trial of the first case. It does not disclose any prejudice against the petitioner. Such bias does not disqualify Judge Haas from sitting at the trial of the second case between the same parties. After a careful examination of the question of law involved and a decision thereof, of course Judge Haas was biased in favor of his opinion, as was this court after it affirmed his judgment, but that did not disqualify either from sitting in another suit between the same parties even if the same question was involved. Bias on a purely legal proposition, such as whether the jurisdiction of a case is at law or in equity, removed from prejudice against any of the parties, does not disqualify a judge from sitting in a case. Nor do we understand that counsel so contend, but their sole reliance is on the allegation that he acted as counsel for the Dutrows. This, we think, is plainly not sustained by the evidence.

The stability of our government is dependent upon the inflexible integrity of its courts, and the confidence of the public in the courage, the impartiality, and the wisdom of the judges in the prompt administration of even-handed justice to every litigant. This confidence cannot be betrayed with impunity, and ought not to be impaired by reasonable grounds of suspicion. The action of a pure and upright judge may, however, give rise to a suspicion of partiality or prejudice, when the surrounding facts and circumstances are unknown, but which vanishes in the light of their disclosure. So also counsel, in the heat of litigation and in their zeal in behalf of their clients, sometimes become so satisfied of the correctness of their conclusions that they cannot be convinced of their error, and often attribute an adverse view to bias or prejudice. But when the incident has passed, and reason has resumed her sway, they usually find that they have been hasty in their judgment, and that the judge has been as pure in his motives and as impartial in his administration of justice as they would have him be. When this occurs, there should be none more ready than they to admit their error, and to correct, as far as possible, the erroneous impressions they have created. The petition for the writ of prohibition will be refused.

Refused.

(132 Va. 795)

THANIEL v. COMMONWEALTH.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)1. Homicide §254—Evidence held to sustain conviction of second degree murder.

Where the evidence showed that, after defendant had begun shooting, the deceased drew his pistol and began shooting, not at defendant but in the air, and that defendant suddenly turned and shot and killed deceased, while defendant denied shooting deceased, claiming he fired only into the air, a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree was sustained by the evidence.

2. Homicide §9—Intent to kill need not exist any length of time to constitute murder.

To constitute murder, even in the first degree, it is not necessary that the intent to kill should have existed for any particular length of time, so that the fact that no previous quarrel or grudge between accused and deceased was proved is not conclusive against murder.

3. Homicide §223 — Testimony as witness summoned before coroner's inquest is not in defendant's behalf, though exculpatory.

Where defendant testified at the coroner's inquest before he was accused of the homicide but had been summoned as a witness and did not voluntarily appear, his testimony, even though it tended to exculpate him, was not in his behalf.

4. Witnesses §379(9) — Accused testifying for himself can be cross-examined as to conflicting testimony at coroner's inquest.

Under the statute permitting accused to testify in his own behalf subject to cross-examination which, as incorporated in Code 1919, § 4778, was amended to provide that by so testifying he waived immunity, the provision of section 4781 that evidence shall not be given against accused of any testimony made by him as a witness upon a legal examination unless it was made when examined in his own behalf, which was intended to protect his immunity against compulsory testimony, does not prohibit the cross-examination of accused as to testimony given at the coroner's inquest, as he was not then testifying in his own behalf, especially where his testimony at the inquest was more favorable than his testimony at the trial, so that its only effect would be to impeach his credibility as a witness.

5. Criminal law §1088(11)—Loss of requested instruction so that clerk could not certify it does not entitle accused to reversal.

The fact that an instruction requested by accused which was modified by the court had been lost, so that the clerk could not certify it in the record, does not entitle accused to a reversal, since instructions are not a part of the record until they are made so by bill of exceptions, and it was the duty of accused to see that it was duly embodied in the bill.

6. Criminal law §1141(2)—Error not presumed.

On writ of error to a conviction, the appellate court will not presume error, but it must be affirmatively shown.

7. Criminal law §1124(2)—Denial of new trial not reviewed where record does not show specific grounds of motion.

A judgment of conviction will not be reviewed because of the refusal to grant a motion for a new trial on the ground of after discovered evidence, where there was nothing in the record to show the specific grounds on which the motion was made.

8. Criminal law §951(5)—New trial cannot be granted after expiration of the term.

The circuit court has no power to grant a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, or of misconduct of the attorney who appeared for defendant at the trial, after the adjournment of the term at which the judgment was rendered.

Error to Circuit Court, Hanover County.

Boxley Thaniel was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he brings error. Affirmed.

McNeill & Bremner, of Richmond, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KELLY, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Hanover county sentencing the defendant, Boxley Thaniel, to a term of 20 years in the penitentiary for murder in the second degree.

1. It is contended that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a conviction of any higher offense than manslaughter. We are unable to adopt this view of the case.

[1] The evidence introduced by the commonwealth, though in conflict with that of the defendant in some particulars, was credited by the jury and showed, or tended to show, the following facts: The defendant and 40 or more other colored persons, men and women, were attending a dance at a schoolhouse. Some time during the evening, the defendant asked a certain girl whether she was going to dance with him. She answered in the negative, and he then caught hold of her hands, but she jerked away from him. Thereupon the defendant said: "You ain't going to dance with me, are you?" and, drawing his pistol, began shooting towards her and towards the side or end of the room. Immediately thereafter the deceased, William Shelton, began firing a pistol into the ceiling. These two persons appear to have been the only ones who did any shooting. Both moved towards the door, the defendant being just ahead as he reached the doorway, and at that point he whirled around and shot

Shelton, who fell and died almost instantly. It is argued that the evidence leaves a question as to who actually killed the deceased; but, if certain of the witnesses for the commonwealth told the truth, there is no room for doubt upon this point. The jury believed those witnesses, and their verdict concludes the question in this court.

There is nothing whatever in the evidence either for the commonwealth or for the defendant to show that the latter had any occasion or excuse for shooting the deceased, or that there was any altercation or exchange of shots between them. The defendant himself, in testifying at the trial as a witness on his own behalf, said that the shooting began behind him and that he turned and shot three times to protect himself, but he further stated in the next breath, "I didn't shoot anybody, but shot up in the air," and neither he nor any other witness stated that the deceased ever spoke to him, or shot at him, or made any hostile demonstration towards him.

The case of Richardson v. Commonwealth, 128 Va. 691, 695, 104 S. E. 788, 790, is cited and relied on for the prisoner. In that case we said:

"It has been long settled that where a homicide is committed in the course of a sudden quarrel, or mutual combat, or upon a sudden provocation and without any previous grudge, and the killing is from the sudden heat of passion growing solely out of the quarrel, or combat, or provocation, it is not murder, but is manslaughter only—voluntary manslaughter, if there be no further justification, and involuntary manslaughter if the killing be done in the commission of some lawful act, such as justifiable self defense."

This statement of the law manifestly has no application to the facts of the case in judgment. Here we have not even a claim of any sudden quarrel, or mutual combat, or provocation. The defendant testified that he did not shoot the deceased at all. The jury upon abundant evidence found that he did. The verdict binds us on this point, and the case as it comes here, therefore, is one in which the defendant, with a deadly weapon in his previous possession, killed the deceased without provocation or other extenuating circumstances. Upon these facts, even if he had been convicted of murder in the first degree, we could not interfere. Hill's Case, 2 Gratt. (43 Va.) 594, 606; Howell's Case, 26 Gratt. (67 Va.) 995; Jones' Case, 100 Va. 842, 855, 41 S. E. 951; Thompson's Case, 131 Va. —, 109 S. E. 447, 454.

[2] It is true that no previous quarrel or grudge between the accused and the deceased was proved, but in order to constitute murder even in the first degree it is not necessary that the intent to kill should have existed for any particular length of time. It may be formed at the very moment of the killing. McDaniel's Case, 77 Va. 281, 284; Thompson's Case, supra.

2. The next question to be considered is an interesting and important one, and arises upon the following state of facts:

[3] On the day after the homicide the coroner held an inquest at which the defendant testified as a witness. While the record is not entirely clear upon the point, we shall assume, in order to give the defendant the full benefit of his contention, that he was duly summoned and that he did not voluntarily offer himself as a witness. He was not under arrest at that time, nor, so far as the record shows, had he been charged with the crime. Upon this assumption and under these circumstances, even though his testimony at the coroner's inquest may have tended to exculpate him, he cannot be regarded as having been there in the capacity of a witness in his own behalf. Mullins v. Commonwealth, 113 Va. 787, 792, 75 S. E. 193; Beale's Crim. Pl. & Pr. p. 315. He was subsequently indicted, and at the trial he went on the stand and testified fully as a witness in his own behalf, stating, among other things, that he did some shooting but did not shoot the deceased. On cross-examination he was asked and required to answer, over objection by his counsel, whether he did not, while testifying at the coroner's inquest, make this statement:

"I didn't hear any shooting last night and I don't remember seeing any pistol laying beside the body. I did not do any shooting myself to my knowledge."

To this inquiry the defendant replied:

"Yes, I did make that statement."

He was then further asked and required to answer, subject to like objection by his counsel, the following question:

"You have then made two different statements about this shooting, the one which you made before the coroner's jury and the one which you have just made here; which is true?"

His answer was:

"The one that I have just made is true, I don't know why I made the other one."

[4] It is insisted by counsel for defendant that this cross-examination was in violation of section 4781 of the Code, which is to the following effect:

"In a criminal prosecution, other than for perjury, or in an action on a penal statute, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination, unless such statement was made when examined as a witness in his own behalf."

To support the contention that the cross-examination of the accused as above set out was in violation of the terms of this statute, we are referred to the case of Kirby v. Commonwealth, 77 Va. 681, 46 Am. Rep. 747, and Mullins v. Commonwealth, supra.

In Kirby v. Commonwealth there had been two trials, at the first of which the prisoner, Kirby, had gone on the witness stand in his own behalf. At the second trial he did not testify, but a third party was allowed to testify, over objection, that certain statements made by Kirby at the first trial were in conflict with the testimony of two of his witnesses at the second trial. The statute, Code 1873, c. 195, § 22 (subsequently amended and now appearing as section 4781 of the Code quoted above), in force at the time the Kirby Case was decided, was to the following effect:

"In a criminal prosecution other than for perjury, or an action on a penal statute, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination."

The court, in an opinion by Judge Lewis, held that the testimony was improperly admitted, and reversed the judgment for that reason. The decision was in conformity with the terms of the statute as then in force; and it was doubtless to meet the effect of that decision that the statute was subsequently amended by adding the words, "unless such statement was made when examined as a witness in his own behalf." Under the statute as it was when the Kirby Case was decided, if the defendant himself had first testified in his own behalf and had then been asked on cross-examination whether he had not made certain statements at the former trial contrary to those he was making at the second trial, it is possible that this court would have held, notwithstanding the then existing terms of what is now section 4781, that he was compellable to answer on the ground that in becoming a witness he waived, at least as to his credibility and witness-character, the privilege which that statute was intended to protect. Some of the cases on the subject have in principle and effect gone thus far. See 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2276 (a), p. 8151, Jones on Evidence, § 887, and numerous other authorities cited later on in this opinion. But we need not speculate as to what this court would have done in the Kirby Case under the circumstances here suggested. The fact remains that the accused did not testify on the second trial, and that the provisions of sections 4778 and 4781 were at that time vitally different from what they were when the instant case was tried, and the two cases are therefore readily distinguishable. It is clear, at any rate, that the previous statements of the accused which were excluded in the Kirby Case would be admissible now, because those statements had been made by him "as a witness in his own behalf."

In Mullins v. Commonwealth, supra, while the opinion does not state the facts fully, it appears from the record therein, which we have examined, that a witness was permitted, over the objection of the accused, to testify that the latter as a witness at the coroner's inquest had stated that a certain other person had made threats against the deceased. Judge Buchanan, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, quoted section 3901 of the Code of 1887, which is identical with section 4781 of the Code of 1919, and then said:

"The introduction of the evidence in question was forbidden by the section of the Code quoted, and the objection of the accused ought to have been sustained"—citing Kirby's Case, supra.

In the Mullins Case the former statements of the accused which the court said were improperly admitted had not been made as a witness in his own behalf, but at a coroner's inquest, and were testified to by a third party as a witness in chief for the commonwealth. The case would therefore be in point here as authority for the accused but for the fact that there is (contrary to his contention) a clear distinction between a case in which the commonwealth undertakes to prove by evidence in chief statements made by an accused person upon a former legal examination (not as a witness for himself), and a case in which the commonwealth merely seeks to bring out, or to lay the foundation for bringing out, such statement by cross-examination of the prisoner himself when he takes the stand in his own behalf.

When the statute (now section 4778, Code 1919) making a person charged with crime competent to testify first made its appearance as a part of the law of this state, the prototype of what is now section 4781 of the Code had long been in force in Virginia. The original terms of the latter section were as follows:

"It shall not be lawful in any criminal prosecution, other than a prosecution for perjury, or an action upon a penal statute, to give in evidence against the accused any confession or statement which he may have made in the course of his legal examination as a witness before any competent tribunal." Acts 1847-48, c. 21, § 48, p. 153.

Since the act of January 21, 1886 (Acts 1885-86, p. 31) and until the adoption of the Code of 1919, the statute law in this state respecting the right of an accused person to testify in his own behalf remained as follows:

"In any case of felony or misdemeanor the accused may be sworn and examined in his own behalf, and be subject to cross-examination as any other witness; but his failure to testify shall create no presumption against him, nor be the subject of any comment before the court or jury by the prosecuting attorney." Code 1887, § 3897.

The Virginia decisions which have dealt with this statute have not involved the exact question now under consideration and throw very little light upon it. See Watson

v. Commonwealth, 87 Va. 608, 613, 13 S. E. 22; Litton v. Commonwealth, 101 Va. 833, 844, 44 S. E. 923.

A significant change was made in the phraseology of the statute by the Code of 1919, and the section (in effect when the instant case was tried) now reads as follows:

"In any case of felony or misdemeanor, the accused may be sworn and examined in his own behalf, and if so sworn and examined, he shall be deemed to have waived his privilege of not giving evidence against himself, and shall be subject to cross-examination as any other witness; but his failure to testify shall create no presumption against him, nor be the subject of any comment before the court or jury by the prosecuting attorney." Code 1919, § 4778. (Italics added to indicate amendment.)

To this section the Revisors appended the following very pertinent note:

"Under this section as it stood before the revision, some doubt was expressed as to the meaning of the phrase 'subject to cross-examination as any other witness.' This doubt was as to whether the accused waives his privilege of not testifying against himself and may stop at any stage when a question is asked which would tend to incriminate him. While the revisors did not concur in this doubt, they thought it well to put the language of the section in such form as would settle the question, expressly declaring that if the accused be 'so sworn and examined, he shall be deemed to have waived his privilege of not giving evidence against himself.'"

Having in mind the history, purpose, and present terms of the two statutes, sections 4778 and 4781, we have no difficulty in deciding that the action of the trial court in requiring the defendant to answer as to the statements made by him at the coroner's inquest was not in any sense a violation of section 4781. The "evidence against the accused" contemplated by that section in its inception necessarily referred to evidence by third parties, for, as we have seen, persons accused of crime could not testify when that act was passed, nor for a long time after its passage. No such "evidence against the accused" has been offered or allowed in the case at bar. Section 4778 permits the accused himself to testify, but to do so he must accept all of the terms of that section, and (1) "be deemed to have waived his privilege of not giving evidence against himself," and (2) "be subject to cross-examination as any other witness."

The privilege the accused thus waived in going on the stand for himself was the very privilege which section 4781 was intended to protect, and the cross-examination to which he thus voluntarily exposed himself further cut off his right to rely upon the protection of that section. The right to cross-examine him "as any other witness" implied the right to impeach his credibility by the same rules as those applicable to other witnesses. To discredit the witness, if there be reason to doubt his truthfulness, is one of the legitimate and leading objects of cross-examination. 1 Thompson on Trials, § 405; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 446.

The language of the Virginia statute seems to us conclusive of the question under consideration. It may be observed that in this particular case there is no effort to do more than impeach the witness, because the statement which he made at the coroner's inquest, instead of incriminating him, distinctly exculpated him from any connection with the homicide. It was only because he was making a different statement and thus contradicting himself that he was cross-examined by the attorney for the Commonwealth at the trial. In other words, the evidence which was brought out with respect to the statements of the accused before the coroner merely affected his character as a witness, and not his guilt or innocence. The testimony elicited affected only his "witness-character," and did not affect his "accused-character." An interesting discussion of the difference between these two capacities of an accused person on the witness stand, which might be pertinent and important under enabling statutes differing in terms from ours, will be found in 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2277. The Virginia statute, however, as already pointed out, seems to go the full length of requiring the accused person to absolutely and in all respects waive his privilege against self-incrimination, as well as to subject himself to cross-examination as other witnesses. Under our statute, therefore, there is no real occasion for going into a discussion of just how far the right of cross-examination "as any other witness" entitles the commonwealth to bring out on cross-examination facts relating to the guilt or innocence of the accused, as distinguished from facts which might be used in impeaching his credibility.

Even in those states, however, in which the enabling statute merely gives the accused the right to testify, without requiring any waiver of privilege, and without expressly giving the right of cross-examination by the state, it has generally been held that no difference was intended "between the witness-character of the accused and that of any other witness." 1 Thompson on Trials, § 642; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 890; Hicks v. State, 99 Ala. 169, 13 South. 375; Smith v. State, 137 Ala. 22, 34 South. 396; Commonwealth v. Tolliver, 119 Mass. 312; Harrold v. Territory, 18 Okl. 395, 89 Pac. 202, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 604, 11 Ann. Cas. 818; Fitzpatrick v. U. S., 178 U. S. 304, 20 Sup. Ct. 944, 44 L. Ed. 1078; Sawyer v. U. S., 202 U. S. 150, 165, 26 Sup. Ct. 575, 50 L. Ed. 972, 6 Ann. Cas. 269; note to People v. Tice, 131 N. Y. 651, 30 N. E. 494, 15 L. R. A. 669.

In Commonwealth v. Tolliver, supra, the court refused to permit the introduction of evidence of certain statements, in the nature of confessions, made by the accused, on the ground that the same were unduly and improperly influenced by promises or threats. Afterwards the accused offered himself as a witness in his own behalf, and the court held that upon cross-examination he could be fully interrogated by the prosecuting attorney in regard to such statements and confessions, as affecting his credit. In that case the Massachusetts Supreme Court said:

"By availing himself of the right to take the stand as a witness, the defendant became a general witness in the case, subject to the same tests of truthfulness, and the same rules as to examination and cross-examination as are applicable to all other witnesses. Being sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, he waived all right to keep anything back, even in the case of questions, the answers to which would tend to criminate himself. * * * Among the modes of impeachment, he, like any other witness may be cross-examined as to a conflicting account of the matter given by him on some other occasion. Such an inquiry may be gone into, not for the purpose of proving the truth of the former account, but as an impeachment of his credit as a witness. * * * He would still be at liberty to testify that his alleged confession was not true, and to offer such explanation as to the inducements and circumstances under which he gave it as he may see fit."

In Hicks v. State, supra, the Alabama Supreme Court held that, when a defendant in a criminal case elects to testify in his own behalf, he becomes subject to cross-examination like any other witness and may be impeached by proof of contradictory statements previously made by him, even though such statements consist of declarations or admissions on his part which have first been offered by the state as evidence against him and excluded because not shown to have been voluntarily made.

The syllabus to the report of the Hicks Case refers to Alabama Code, § 4473, as the provision under which the accused was given the right to testify in his own behalf; but the text of that section does not appear in the report of the case. We assume that the Alabama statute is silent as to the right to cross-examine; but whether so or not the case is directly in point.

In Harrold v. Territory of Oklahoma, 18 Okl. 395, 89 Pac. 202, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 604, 11 Ann. Cas. 818, it was held that, when a prisoner on trial voluntarily takes the stand in his own behalf, he waives all privilege which he is entitled to by remaining silent, and subjects himself to the same rules of cross-examination as any other witness, and that he may be asked whether he has not theretofore made certain statements, admissions, or confessions inconsistent with his testimony at the trial; that, if he admits making such statements, he may explain, or show the circumstances or conditions under which they were made; that, if he denies making such statements, then the state on rebuttal may prove the admissions or confessions made by him; and that this may be done even though the admissions or confessions would not have been admissible if he had remained silent.

In that case the court in the course of the opinion said:

"The most serious question presented is: Did the court err in permitting the prosecution on cross-examination, to ask the prisoner if he had not made certain statements and admissions inconsistent with his testimony, and which were asked for the purpose of impeachment if denied, and to show his criminality if admitted? These same admissions and confessions had been excluded by the court as not having been voluntarily made when offered by the prosecution in support of its case in chief. When the rule prevailed that a prisoner on trial for a crime was not permitted to speak or be heard in his own defense, the rule was established that no confession made by the prisoner should be introduced against him if the same was induced by fear, under duress, or through promise of leniency or immunity. A confession or admission made by the prisoner in order to be admissible against him must have been made voluntarily and freely. The strongest reason for the strictness of this rule was that the prisoner was not permitted to deny or explain the statements attributed to him, or to offer any explanation of the circumstances under which he was induced to make them. He was required to keep silent, and hence no evidence of admission, confession, or inculpatory statements was allowed to be given in evidence against him, until it was made to appear to the court that the same were freely and voluntarily made. Now, the prisoner is permitted to testify the same as any other witness, if he voluntarily offers himself. So long as he remains silent the reason for the rule of excluding confessions not voluntarily made, remains, but when he waives his privilege and becomes a witness for himself, the reason for the former rule ceases and he has the privilege and the opportunity to deny or admit any statement or admission attributed to him, and if he admits making any, he has the right to explain all the conditions and circumstances under which the same were given; and the jury can judge of the truthfulness of this class of testimony the same as of any other. We see no sound reason why a prisoner charged with a crime and who voluntarily becomes a witness in his own behalf should any longer be entitled to any special privileges which are not allowed to every other witness. If any other witness has made statements out of court inconsistent with or contrary to his testimony given in court, he may be asked if he has not made such statements, and if he admit then he may explain the conversation and the circumstances and the inducements under which the statements were made. If he deny having made the statements, then he may be impeached by showing that he did make them. This being the rule to which every other witness subjects himself when he becomes a witness, we see no sound or plausible reason why the same rule shall not apply to the witness who is charged with a crime and who testifies in his own behalf. He must weigh the consequences and determine the results before he goes upon the stand; he must be conscious of his vulnerable parts, and if he is unable to withstand the attacks to which every other witness for or against him must subject himself, he should maintain his silence and retain all his privileges.

"In a well-considered and lengthy opinion by Mr. Justice White, containing voluminous citations of authorities and a review of the history of the law relating to the admissibility of confessions, delivered in the case of Bram v. United States, 168 U. S. 532, 42 L. Ed. 568 [18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 183], it was said: 'In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, commanding that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. * * *"'

Again, in the Harrold Case, the Oklahoma court said:

"If it be true then, and in the light of the holding of the highest court in the nation it cannot be doubted, that the rejection of involuntary confessions is because of the constitutional rights of the accused not to be compelled to be a witness against himself, then by the decisions of the same high court when the prisoner voluntarily becomes a witness in his own behalf he waives this constitutional privilege and subjects himself to the same rules as to the examination of witnesses as any other witness. It seems that it must necessarily result that it is violative of no constitutional right or of the principles of civil liberty, to require a prisoner while testifying as a witness in his own behalf, to answer any question, the answer to which might tend to impeach or discredit him."

In the note to the Harrold Case, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 605, it is said:

"But the courts are not in harmony as to the right to cross-examine the accused as to confessions which would not be admissible as original evidence against him, although the weight of authority seems to be against the doctrine of Harrold v. Territory."

This comment in the note is not supported by the authorities cited therein, and judging from the numerous decisions referred to in the Massachusetts and Alabama cases, supra, the comment seems to be unsupported by the authorities generally. The only cases cited to support it are Shepard v. State, 88 Wis. 185, 59 N. W. 449, and several Texas cases.

The Harrold Case, it is true, was reversed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit (169 Fed. 47, 94 O. C. A. 415, 17 Ann. Cas. 868), in an opinion by Judge Sanborn, for whom we entertain the highest respect; but we are unable to concur in the fundamental proposition upon which that opinion seems to be rested, namely, that "involuntary confessions of accused persons are inadmissible to impeach them as witnesses, on the same ground that hearsay and all other incompetent evidence is inadmissible to impeach other witnesses, because they are unworthy of belief." The controlling reason, as we think, why involuntary confessions are generally inadmissible, is that their introduction would violate the constitutional guaranty which protects an accused person from being required to give evidence against himself. See opinion of Chief Justice White in Bram v. United States, 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. Ct. 183, 42 L. Ed. 568, cited by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in the Harrold Case. Furthermore, it seems reasonably clear from Judge Sanborn's opinion that, if he had been dealing with a statute containing the provisions of section 4778 of the Code of 1919, he would have affirmed the Oklahoma court.

In so far as our examination has gone, we think the weight of authority supports the conclusion that there was no error in requiring the defendant in this case to answer the questions relating to his testimony before the coroner, and we are entirely satisfied, particularly in view of the terms of our statute, that the better reason is in accord with this conclusion.

[5] 3. It appears from the record that an instruction tendered by the defendant and refused by the court has been lost, the clerk certifying with respect thereto as follows:

"I have not been able to find the instruction referred to in Bill of Exception No. 3, which instruction was modified by the court, and hence I am unable to certify the same in the record."

It is contended that the accused, without any fault of his own, is thus prevented from presenting to this court the question arising with respect to this instruction, and that therefore the judgment should be reversed.

[6] Instructions are not a part of the record until they are made so by bill of exceptions, and it is the duty of the party seeking to avail himself of an alleged error, as to an instruction to see that the same is duly embodied in a bill of exceptions, and presented to the trial court for certification. An instruction offered and refused is no more a part of the record than a motion made and overruled, or testimony admitted or excluded, until it has been incorporated in the record by bill of exceptions. The duty of making up the record so far as bills of exceptions are concerned rests primarily upon the party seeking relief. This court will not presume error. It must be affirmatively shown. There is no merit in this assignment, and the same is overruled.

[7, 8] 4. After the term at which the defendant was convicted had ended, he made a motion for a new trial on the ground of after discovered evidence. Even if the trial court had the power to grant a new trial after the sentence of conviction had become final by the adjournment of the court for the term, we would be unable to reverse the judgment in this case for refusal to grant the motion, because there is nothing in the record to show the specific grounds upon which the motion was made. But the question is concluded by the Virginia decisions on the subject. The circuit court had no power to grant the motion. Allen v. Commonwealth, 114 Va. 826, 77 S. E. 68, Harley v. Commonwealth, 131 Va. —, 108 S. E. 648.

For the same reasons, and upon the same authority, we must overrule the assignment based upon the refusal of the court to grant a new trial for alleged misconduct of counsel who appeared for the prisoner in the lower court.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

AMERICAN RY. EXPRESS CO. v. DOWNING.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Corporations §590(3)—Corporation taking over all tangible property of another liable for its debts.

A corporation which took over the entire business of another corporation as a going concern and all of the tangible property of the latter theretofore used in its business, paying therefor only in capital stock, must pay any existing liabilities of the corporation taken over of which it had actual or constructive knowledge, at least to the extent of the property acquired.

2. Corporations §591—Creditor of constituent corporation may sue at law consolidated corporation under implied promise to pay.

Where the law implies a promise on the part of a consolidated corporation to pay the liabilities of the constituent companies, the situation is precisely the same in principle as if such promise were an express promise, and creditors of the constituent companies may recover on it by action at law against the promisor.

3. Corporations §590(3)—Merging corporation liable to creditors, though it does not receive all of property of merged corporation.

It is not essential to the existence of liability of a merging corporation for obligations of the merged corporation that the former should have received all of the property of the merged corporation, being liable to the extent of the property received; and the quantity of the property transferred, as compared with that retained, is material only on question whether remedy of creditors is substantially unimpaired.

4. Corporations §590(3)—Merged corporation need not cease to exist to make merging corporation liable to creditors.

It is not essential to a merging corporation being considered as a consolidated company, nor to its liability to creditors of the merged corporation, that the merged corporation should cease to exist de jure; it being sufficient that it ceases the actual transaction of business as a going concern, and it may continue in existence for the purpose of winding up its affairs.

5. Carriers §134—Finding of delivery of shipment to carrier sustained.

In action against express company for value of part of shipment lost, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the shipment was delivered to defendant's predecessor.

Error to Circuit Court, Accomac County.

Action by J. W. Downing against the American Railway Express Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action brought by the defendant in error, J. W. Downing, against the plaintiff in error, the American Railway Express Company, to recover certain alleged damages occasioned by the loss, in transit, of 840 pounds of Paris green, a portion of a shipment of that commodity which, it is alleged, the Adams Express Company, on the ——— day of June, 1918, received at Kensington, Ill., as the property of and undertook to transport to the said Downing at a certain station, in Virginia, on the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad.

The respective parties to the action will be hereinafter referred to as plaintiff and defendant in accordance with their positions in the trial court.

The Adams Express Company was engaged in the express transportation business, as a common carrier, from said place of shipment in Illinois to said place of destination in Virginia, at the time of said shipment and up to June 30, 1918, inclusive. On the last-named day the Adams Express Company terminated its said business, not only between said points, but also throughout Virginia and the United States; and the defendant, on and after July 1, 1918, undertook, as a common carrier, to carry on, throughout the United States, the express transportation business theretofore transacted by the Adams Express Company, the American Express Company, the Wells-Fargo Express Company, and the Southern Express Company.

The defendant, the American Railway Express Company, is a corporation, incorporated under the laws of the state of Delaware on June 22, 1918, and as such authorized to engage in and carry on throughout the states, territories, and possessions of the United States and in the District of Columbia and in adjacent foreign countries, the express transportation business, as a common carrier; the authorized capital stock of the defendant being $40,000,000 divided into 400,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, the minimum capital stock with which the corporation was authorized to commence business being $33,000,000.

The undertaking aforesaid, on the part of the defendant, the American Railway Express Company, on and after July 1, 1918, to carry on throughout the United States the transportation business theretofore transacted by the Adams, the American, the Wells-

Fargo, and the Southern Express Companies, was entered into in pursuance of an agreement between the four companies last mentioned and the defendant. That agreement was entered into some time in June, 1918, prior to July 1, 1918. There is no copy of such agreement in the record of the case before us, and what are or are not some of its provisions may be said to be left in some doubt. At any rate, one of the subjects of controversy in the instant case is whether such agreement on the part of the defendant expressly stipulated that it would be liable for and would pay all of the unsecured indebtedness of the Adams Express Company existing on July 1, 1918.

There are other provisions of said agreement and certain facts attending the organization and the beginning of the business of the defendant on July 1, 1918, and the passing into its hands on that day of certain property of the Adams Express Company, about which, however, there is no controversy in the case and which appear from the record before us. These are as follows:

The defendant began its business aforesaid on July 1, 1918. Prior to that date it owned no property whatever. On that date, in pursuance of said agreement between it and the four other express companies aforesaid, the defendant took over from such four other express companies certain property theretofore belonging to such other companies, at a valuation of $30,000,000, to be paid for by the issuance of capital stock of the defendant of the par value of that amount and delivery of such stock to such four other express companies. The property of the Adams Express Company which was thus acquired by the defendant was the whole of the tangible property then owned and used by the Adams Express Company in its express business aforesaid throughout the United States, including all of such property in Virginia, which was considerable in quantity; and this property was taken over, as aforesaid, at its book value, i. e., its value as carried at the time on the books of the Adams Express Company. What this precise value was, or what was the precise amount of the stock of the defendant which was given therefor to the Adams Express Company, does not appear from the record before us; but it does appear from the record that this value and stock amounted to a great many millions of dollars—far more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff's claim.

At the time the property aforesaid of the Adams Express Company was taken over as aforesaid, on July 1, 1918, and the defendant agreed to issue its stock therefor as aforesaid, the defendant knew that an indefinite number and amount of unliquidated claims against and unsecured obligations of the Adams Express Company, of the character of the claim of the plaintiff, were in existence, outstanding and unsatisfied.

At the time of the trial the defendant, as a matter of fact, had issued and delivered to the Adams Express Company only about 75 per cent. of the stock which was to be issued to it as aforesaid, in payment for the property of the Adams Express Company taken over by the defendant as aforesaid.

After June 30, 1918, the Adams Express Company had no agent in Virginia on whom process could be served so as to commence a suit or action in Virginia against it; nor any property in Virginia which could be attached. It appears that on and after July 1, 1918, the Adams Express Company did own some property, located elsewhere than in Virginia, and other than that which was turned over to the defendant as aforesaid; but what was the character or value of such other property, or just where it was or is located, does not appear.

So far as appears from the record, the Adams Express Company, on and after July 1, 1918, has engaged in no business, other than that of winding up its affairs, including the liquidation of its outstanding liabilities and obligations; and for that purpose has had an office in New York City, with its official organization intact, consisting of its president, secretary, treasurer, general counsel, and its claim departments.

Other material circumstances are referred to in the opinion of the court.

Stewart K. Powell, of Onancock, for plaintiff in error.

S. James Turlington, of Accomac, for defendant in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court.

The following is the chief question presented for our decision by the assignments of error, namely:

[1] 1. Is the defendant answerable to the plaintiff for the liability of the Adams Express Company to the plaintiff which existed at the time the defendant took over the entire business of the Adams Express Company as a going concern and all of the tangible property of the latter theretofore used in its business, because of the circumstances that the entire existence of the Adams Express Company as a going concern was consolidated or merged in the defendant; that the liability existed at the time of such consolidation or merger, and was actually or constructively known to the defendant to so exist; that the property so taken over was more than sufficient to pay the liability; and that the defendant did not undertake to pay anything for the property except its own capital stock?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

As said in 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 818, § 4:

"When two or more corporations are consolidated into a new corporation with a new name, and the constituent corporations go out of existence, if no arrangements are made respecting their property and liabilities, the consolidated corporation will be answerable for their liabilities, at least to the extent of the property acquired from the constituent corporations whose liability is sought to be enforced against the consolidated corporation."

As pointed out, however, in the valuable work just quoted, the essential elements of the liability of the new corporation in such case, and the basic reasons therefor, are: First, that only by a transfer for value can the property of a corporation or other debtor be transferred, so as to defeat the claims of creditors (Id., pp. 819, 822); and, secondly, that the new corporation does not occupy the relation of a purchaser for value of the property of the old company, where it gives nothing for the property but its own capital stock.

If, indeed, the property of the old company is acquired by the new corporation by actual bona fide purchase for value, it is well settled that the new corporation is not liable for claims against the old company which do not constitute liens upon the property purchased. Id., p. 819.

Concerning a similar situation to that under consideration in the case in judgment, this is said in Young v. The Steamboat Key City, 14 Wall. 653, 20 L. Ed. 896:

"* * * Neither the stockholders of" (the old company) "nor of the new corporation have ever parted with or paid any money or other thing of value for" (the property), "otherwise than by this consolidation of the companies into one; and it is not apparent, nor even a reasonable presumption, that if the new company has to pay the libellant's debt in this case, they will be the losers, but it is nearly certain the loss will fall where it should, on the stockholders coming in through the" (old company).

As said in 5 Thomp. on Corp. (2d. Ed.) § 6083:

"* * * The consolidated corporation as a rule, even in the absence of statute, or agreement, assumes all the liabilities of the constituent companies, and they may be enforced by a direct action against it as it is presumed to have notice of the rights of creditors."

As said in Jennings, Neff & Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., etc., 128 Tenn. 236, 159 S. W. 1089, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1061:

"The doctrine that corporate assets are a trust fund, at least to the extent that creditors are entitled in equity to payment of their debts before any distribution of corporate property is made among stockholders, is fully established in Tennessee, and creditors have a right to follow its assets or property into the hands of any one who is not a holder in good faith in the ordinary course of business. Vance v. McNabb, etc., Co., 92 Tenn. 47, 20 S. W. 424; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1046.

"There is abundant authority likewise for the proposition that where one corporation, for its own stock and bonds, purchases all the assets of another, without provision for the debts of the latter, the transaction is out of the ordinary course of business, and the very circumstances of the case imply full knowledge on the part of the purchasing corporation of all facts necessary to charge the property in its hands with the debts of the selling corporation. [Citing authorities.] * * *

"It follows that when the purchasing corporation took over in exchange for its own stock and bonds the assets of the other, and permitted these securities which had been substituted for the visible, tangible property of the selling corporation to be distributed among the shareholders of the latter, without provision for the creditors of the latter, it thereby became a party, with full notice, to the diversion of a trust fund. As such, the purchasing corporation holds the property so acquired impressed with the same trust with which said property was originally charged, and the purchasing corporation is liable to the creditors of the selling corporation to the extent of the value of the property thus obtained.

"Creditors of the old corporation cannot be required to look alone to the stock and bonds which were substituted for the real, tangible assets of that corporation. The value of securities so substituted is more or less problematical and creditors should not be forced to surrender their claim against available, visible assets, and transfer such claim to new securities. Their remedy cannot thus be hindered and impaired for the benefit of stockholders. * * *

"We are aware that there is some conflict in the cases as to the rights of creditors under circumstances such as these, but we think the views we have expressed are sustained by the weight of authority. We have no hesitation in announcing our belief that such views are correct, and they are in harmony with the following cases: Altoona v. Richardson Gas & Oil Co., 81 Kan. 717, 106 Pac. 1025, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 651; Grenell v. Detroit Gas Co., 112 Mich. 70, 70 N. W. 413; Hurd v. New York, etc., Steam Laundry Co., 167 N. Y. 89, 60 N. E. 827; McIver v. Young Hardware Co., 144 N. C. 478, 57 S. E. 169, 119 Am. St. Rep. 970; Ft. Payne Bank v. Alabama Sanitarium, 103 Ala. 358, 15 So. 618; Chattanooga R. & C. R. Co. v. Evans, 66 Fed. 809, 14 C. C. A. 116, 31 U. S. App. 432; Hibernia Ins. Co. v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co. (C. C.) [4 McCrary, 432] 13 Fed. 516; Vicksburg & Y. City Teleph. Co. v. Citizens' Teleph. Co., 79 Miss. 341, 30 So. 725, 89 Am. St. Rep. 656.

See, also, to same effect, notes in 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1058, 1059, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1119-1132; and cases cited.

Many of the authorities, in the absence of statute fixing the liability (which is the situation touching the case in judgment), regard the liabilities of the consolidated corporation for the unsecured debts of its constituent companies as in truth resting upon the agreement, express or implied, of the consolidated corporation to pay such debts; and this we think, upon principle, is, in such case, the true ground on which the obligation rests.

In Morrison v. American Snuff Co., 79 Miss. 330, 30 South. 723, 89 Am. St. Rep. 598, this is said:

"The foundation of the liability of a consolidated corporation may rest on a statute or on an agreement either expressed or implied. If the statute does not provide that the new company shall assume the debts and liabilities of the constituent companies, and there is no expressed agreement respecting the same, the debts of the original companies follow as an incident of the consolidation, and become by implication the obligations of the new corporation"—citing authorities.

The consolidated company has in its hands property which in equity and good conscience belongs to the plaintiff to the extent of having his claim satisfied thereby; and, wherever property or money is so held, "the law operating on the act of the parties, creates the duty, establishes the privity, and implies the promise and obligation, on which the action is founded." Brewer v. Dyer, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 339. See, to same effect Moses v. Macferlan, 2 Burrow, 1012; Clark on Contracts, § 314, p. 757; Norfolk v. Norfolk County, 120 Va. 356, 91 S. E. 820; 2 R. C. L. § 9, pp. 749, 750.

[2] Where the circumstances are such that the law implies the promise on the part of the consolidated corporation to pay the liabilities of the constituent companies, the situation is precisely the same in principle, as if such promise were an express promise; and the plaintiff for whose benefit such promise exists may recover upon it by action at law against the promisor, upon either of the principles aforesaid. Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., 91 Va. 369, 22 S. E. 159; and Cosmopolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Koegel, 104 Va. 619, 629-631, 52 S. E. 166.

As said in Langhorne v. Richmond R. Co., supra:

"Where two * * * companies unite, or become consolidated under the authority of law, the presumption is, until the contrary appears, that the united or consolidated company has all the powers and privileges, and is subject to all the restrictions and liabilities, of those out of which it is created. Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall. 460, and Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 139, 147. The corporation which is created by such consolidation * * * is ordinarily deemed the same as each of the corporations which formed it for the purpose of answering for the liabilities of the old corporations, and may be sued under its new name * * * for their debts as if no change had been made in the name, or in the organization of the original corporations. Jones on Railroad Securities, § 415; 1 Thompson's Com. on Corp. §§ 372, 373, 395; 1 Beach on Private Corp. §§ 343, 344; 1 Morawetz on Corp. § 955; Taylor on Corp. § 666; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 272n."

And as held in Cosmopolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Koegel:

The plaintiff's right of action exists in "those cases in which the defendant has in his hands money which in equity and good conscience belongs to the plaintiff, as where one person receives from another money or property as a fund from which certain creditors of the depositor are to be paid, and promises, by his acceptance of the money or property without objection to the terms on which it is delivered to him, to pay such creditors. See note 1 Chitty on Pl. p. 5, where a number of cases are cited as belonging to a class in which it is said, 'the law (in such cases) creates the privity and implies the promise'"—citing, also, numerous other authorities to the same effect.

[3] It is not essential to the existence of the liability of the new corporation which we have been considering that such corporation should have received "all" of the property of its constituent companies. As said in 5 Thomp. on Corp. (2d Ed.) § 6085:

"Consolidated companies receiving most of the property of the old companies are held to be liable for the debts of such uniting companies to the extent of the property received by them."

See, to same effect, Berthold v. Holladay-Klotz Land & Lumber Co., 91 Mo. App. 233; Hurd v. New York, etc., Steam Laundry Co., 167 N. Y. 89, 60 N. E. 327.

In truth, the quantity of the property transferred, as compared with that retained, is material only to this extent: If there is not sufficient property retained by the constituent company, within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state, to satisfy the obligation of such company to the plaintiff, so that the remedy of the plaintiff is substantially impaired, and the other aforesaid requisite circumstances exist, the liability we have been considering will arise; if, on the other hand, there is sufficient property so retained as to leave the remedy of the plaintiff substantially unimpaired, even if the aforesaid other circumstances do exist, the liability will not arise.

[4] Again: It is not essential to the new corporation being considered as a "consolidated company," within the meaning of those terms as used in the authorities above cited and quoted from, nor to the liability of the new corporation above referred to, that the constituent companies should cease to exist de jure on the organization of the new corporation. The going "out of existence" of the constituent companies (to which the quotation above made from 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, § 4, p. 818, and other authorities on the same subject, refer) is the cessation of all actual transaction of business as a going concern—the de facto cessation of all business—the abandonment of all life and operation according to the design of the charter of the constituent companies. The continued existence de jure of the constituent companies for the purpose of winding up their affairs or other purposes is immaterial. Berthold v. Holladay-Klotz Land & Lumber Co., 91 Mo. App. 233; Montgomery, etc., R.

Co. v. Branch Sons & Co., 59 Ala. 139; 5 Thompson on Corp. (2d Ed.) § 8041.

As said by the authority last cited:

"The termination of the existence of the constituent companies is not necessary to either the accomplishment or validity of the consolidation. * * *"

The defendant relies upon McAlister v. American Railway Express Co., 179 N. O. 556, 103 S. E. 129, 15 A. L. R. 1090, and it must be said that the holding in that case is directly contrary to our holding above. But such holding is, as we think, also directly contrary to the great weight of authority and to the true principles involved, and for those reasons we cannot follow it.

The other cases relied on by the defendant are the following: Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co. v. Leader, 115 Ga. 702, 42 S. E. 38; Whiting v. Malden, etc., R. Co., 202 Mass. 298, 88 N. E. 907, 132 Am. St. Rep. 493; Austin v. Tecumseh Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 412, 68 N. W. 623, 35 L. R. A. 444, 59 Am. St. Rep. 543; Colorado, etc., R. Co. v. Albrecht, 22 Colo. App. 201, 123 Pac. 957; Bruffet v. Great Western R. R. Co., 25 Ill. 353; Hallidie Machinery Co. v. Washington Brick, etc., Co., 70 Wash. 80, 126 Pac. 96. These cases are not inconsistent with our holding above. They hold merely that, in the absence of statute imposing the liability, for the new corporation to be liable for the unsecured debts of its predecessor it must appear, either that the new corporation expressly assumed the liabilities of its predecessor, or that the circumstances are such that the law charges the new corporation with such liability; that, in the absence of a statutory provision on the subject, the mere fact that the property of a company is acquired by another company or individual does not of itself make the new holder of the property liable for the debts of the seller of it; for, non constat, the new holder may have been a bona fide purchaser of the property for value in the ordinary course of business, in which case such holder would not be liable for debts which were not liens on the property. All of this is in entire accord with true principles and with our views upon the subject.

Much of the argument before us has concerned the question of fact whether there was an express agreement in the case in judgment on the part of the defendant to pay the unsecured debts and liabilities of the Adams Express Company existing at the time of the consolidation aforesaid; but our view being, as aforesaid, that under the circumstances of this case the law will imply such agreement, it is, of course, unnecessary for us to deal with such question of fact.

There is but one other question presented by the assignments of error for our decision, and that is this:

[5] 2. Was there sufficient evidence before the jury to support their finding to the effect that the Adams Express Company, in June, 1918, received, at Kensington, Ill., the quantity of the goods in question for transportation to the plaintiff, as alleged?

This question must be answered in the affirmative.

A witness for the plaintiff, who was the depot agent of the defendant at the place of destination of the goods in Virginia, was permitted by the trial court, over the objection of the defendant, to testify as to what a certain entry in the delivery record book of the Adams Express Company showed was the shortage on a shipment of said goods to the plaintiff from Kensington, Ill., on May 18, 1921, which was a different shipment from that on which the action was based. The defendant contends that such testimony as to such book entry was improperly admitted in evidence for several reasons (which need not be set forth here), and hence that the case should be considered as if such testimony were not in the record; and that if such testimony were stricken out of the record there would be no testimony left to support the verdict in the particular in question. This position of the defendant overlooks the fact that the plaintiff himself testified, without objection thereto on the part of the defendant, that prior to the trial he received a receipt from "the agent at Kensington, Ill., * * * showing the shipment" in question, which receipt, other testimony for plaintiff before the jury showed, was turned over to counsel for the defendant prior to the trial. The agent at Kensington, Ill., was agent for the defendant at the time he sent the plaintiff the receipt mentioned. There was therefore ample evidence before the jury to support the finding in question.

The case will be:

Affirmed.

FOY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §=1120(3)—Sustaining objection to question not reviewed where expected answer does not appear.

Refusal to allow a witness to answer the question, "What is your religious faith?" will not be considered on appeal, unless the record shows what answer was expected, though defendant claims that his object was to show that the witness was not properly sworn.

2. Criminal law §=261(1)—Arraignment or plea not necessary in misdemeanor cases.

Under Code 1919, § 4889, no arraignment or plea of the accused is necessary in a misdemeanor case.

Error to Hastings Court of Portsmouth.

O. V. Foy was convicted of violation of the prohibition law, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The accused was tried by jury, convicted of violating the prohibition law of the state, and the judgment under review was entered accordingly.

There are but two assignments of error.

Frank L. Wilson, of Portsmouth, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The first assignment of error is that the trial court refused to allow a witness for the commonwealth to be asked on cross-examination the question, "What is your religious faith?"

It is urged in argument for the accused that the object of the question "was to show that if the witness was of a certain religious faith, he was not properly sworn, and therefore was not under oath, and that his testimony was not evidence."

[1] The record does not disclose how the witness was sworn; nor does it show what answer the witness would have made; nor that there was any avowal of what answer he was expected to make to the question.

It is well settled that an assignment of error to the refusal of the trial court to allow a witness to answer a question will not be considered on appeal, unless the record shows what answer was expected. Washington, etc., Co. v. Goodrich, 110 Va. 692, 86 S. E. 977, and a number of other Virginia cases on the subject which might be cited.

[2] 2. The remaining assignment of error is that the trial court should have set aside the verdict because it does not appear from the record that the accused was arraigned upon or pleaded to the charges contained in the indictment; the record showing merely that the accused was present when his case was called, and announced that he was ready for trial, whereupon, the commonwealth having made the like announcement, the jury were sworn, and the trial proceeded to the verdict and judgment.

This is a misdemeanor case. It is well settled that under the statute (section 4889, Code 1919), no arraignment or plea of the accused was necessary. Bare v. Commonwealth, 122 Va. 783, 94 S. E. 168.

The case will be affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

RUDD v. COMMONWEALTH.

(132 Va. 783)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §914—Denial of new trial for refusal to change venue on ground that impartial jury could not be obtained not error, where impartial jury was in fact obtained.

Denial of motion for new trial for refusal to change venue, under Code 1919, § 4663, on the ground that a fair and impartial jury could not be obtained, held not error, where an impartial jury was in fact obtained.

2. Criminal law §126(1)—Jury §7—Proper remedy for difficulty in obtaining impartial jury in city or county where trial is had is motion for jury to be summoned from other city or county.

Where the sole difficulty to be overcome in order to secure an impartial trial consists in the difficulty in obtaining a jury from the city or county where the trial is had, the proper remedy is by motion for a jury to be summoned from some other city or county under the statute providing therefor, and not a motion for a change of venue.

3. Criminal law §956(4)—That impartial jury was obtained without motion for jury to be summoned elsewhere is not conclusive against defendant's right to change of venue for prejudice in community.

The fact that an impartial jury was obtained from the city in which the trial is had, and that no motion was made for a jury to be summoned from another city, is not conclusive on motion for new trial against the defendant's right to a change of venue on the ground that the case could not be impartially tried in such city because of prejudice existing against defendant.

4. Criminal law §1150—Trial court allowed wide discretion in matter of ordering change of venue.

The trial court is allowed a wide discretion in the matter of ordering a change of venue, and its ruling will not be disturbed, unless it plainly appears that the discretion has been impartially exercised.

5. Criminal law §134(1)—Defendant's belief that he cannot secure a fair trial not sufficient ground for change.

The mere apprehension of the accused that he cannot secure a fair trial in the city or county in which he is indicted, is not sufficient to support a motion for a change of venue, but he must establish by independent and disinterested testimony such facts as make it appear probable that his fears and beliefs are well founded.

6. Criminal law §134(1)—Evidence held to justify refusal to grant change of venue on ground of prejudice against accused.

In prosecution for selling ardent spirits, refusal to change the place of trial from the city in which defendant was indicted on the ground that defendant could not be accorded a fair and impartial trial therein because of prejudice against him, held proper under the evidence.

7. Criminal law ¶126(2)—Change not granted merely because prominent citizens have raised fund and employed counsel to aid in prosecution.

The mere fact that prominent citizens have raised a fund by private subscriptions and have employed counsel to aid in prosecution of accused, charged with selling ardent spirits, is not in itself sufficient ground for a change of venue.

8. Jury ¶70(1)—Jurors summoned on second venire facias necessary for felony case may be used for misdemeanor case.

Where a second venire facias was necessary to complete the panel for the trial of a felony case, the jurors summoned thereby could be used in the trial of a misdemeanor case, though there were a sufficient number of jurors summoned by virtue of the first venire facias for all the misdemeanor cases to be tried at the term under Code 1919, § 4896.

9. Criminal law ¶129(1) — Objections to method of summoning jury not covered by assignments of error not considered.

Objections to procedure by which jury was obtained, not covered by assignments of error, will not be considered.

10. Criminal law ¶120(3)—Refusal to permit certain questions to be answered not considered, in absence of record showing what answers would have been.

The refusal of the court to allow certain questions to be asked and to allow witness to answer such questions will not be considered, where the answers which the witnesses would have given is not shown by the record.

Error to Hustings Court of Portsmouth.

M. C. Rudd was convicted of selling ardent spirits, and he brings error. Affirmed.

There was in this case a trial by jury, resulting in a verdict finding the accused guilty of selling ardent spirits as charged in the indictment, and fixing his punishment at six months in jail and a fine of $500. The judgment under review was entered accordingly.

There is no assignment of error which challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. There is an assignment of error that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict and grant the accused a new trial, but that assignment is based upon the following grounds: (1) The refusal of the court to grant a change of venue; (2) the court's refusal to quash the venire; (3) the court's action in disallowing certain questions to be asked of certain witnesses by counsel for the accused; and (4) the granting of a certain instruction at the request of the commonwealth. These grounds are also made the basis of separate assignments of error. In the oral argument for the accused the assignment of error relating to the instruction was abandoned.

The case being thus presented upon the appeal, no statement of the evidence, or of the facts, touching the merits of the case, is necessary.

The facts, and the evidence for the accused and for the commonwealth touching certain matters in controversy, upon the motion of the accused for a change of venue, may be summarized as follows:

The uncontroverted facts are that at the time the accused was arrested, charged with the offense of which he was subsequently convicted, there was an association of a group of citizens of the city of Portsmouth, called the Council of Christian Citizens, made up of pastors and laymen of the Protestant churches of the city, who employed detectives to investigate conditions in the city, with a view of ascertaining whether violations of law existed, and, if so, what violations. This association raised a fund to defray the expenses of such investigation, by soliciting and obtaining voluntary private subscriptions from a large number of the citizens of the city, but what proportion of the citizens does not appear from the evidence. And the accused was arrested and charged with the offense aforesaid as the result of the investigation and testimony of two of the detectives employed as aforesaid.

The testimony for the accused is to the effect that, at the time of the motion for the change of venue, there was street talk, a street rumor, heard frequently on the streets of Portsmouth, to the effect that any and all persons charged with crime as a result of the investigation aforesaid could not get a fair trial by a jury from Portsmouth. It appears, however, from this very testimony for the accused that this street talk or rumor did not correctly reflect public opinion of the city. Indeed the accused himself testified to the effect that he was of the opinion that there was no serious difficulty in the way of obtaining a jury from the city of Portsmouth who would observe their oaths and give him a fair and impartial trial; and in this opinion all of the witnesses for the accused substantially concurred.

It appears from the testimony of the accused that what he feared was that he would not get a fair trial by a jury selected from the jurors in attendance upon the court during the term at which he was tried. He stated that there were specific men among them who, as he thought, would not give him a fair and impartial trial.

The testimony for the commonwealth is to the effect that at the time of the motion for the change of venue there was in the city of Portsmouth a very decided public interest in law enforcement, including the prohibition law, and a determination on the part of many of the good citizens of the city that the law should be enforced against those guilty of violating it; but that this did not go to the extent of the desire on the part of any one that there should be any conviction not warranted by the evidence in the particular case. And the testimony for the commonwealth is to the effect that the accused could obtain a fair and impartial trial in the city of Portsmouth before a jury obtained from that city.

From the jurors who had been regularly summoned, and were in attendance upon the court for the trial of felony cases, the court impaneled the jury for the trial of the case in judgment obtaining from that source the requisite number of jurors who were found, upon examination on their voir dire, to be free from exception.

S. M. Brandt and R. T. Thorp, both of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The questions presented by the assignments of error, and not abandoned upon the oral argument, will be disposed of in their order as stated below.

[1, 2] 1. Did the trial court err in overruling the motion of the accused for a change of venue, pursuant to section 4663 of the Code, on the ground that the case could not be fairly or impartially tried in, or by a jury from the city of Portsmouth, because of the hostile public feeling and prejudice existing in such city against the accused?

This question must be answered in the negative.

In so far as the motion for change of venue rests on the ground that a fair and impartial jury to try the case could not be obtained from the city, it was properly overruled, for two reasons: First, because an impartial jury, in contemplation of law, was in fact obtained from the city (Bowles' Case, 103 Va. 823, 48 S. E. 527, and cases cited); and, secondly, because, where the sole difficulty to be overcome in order to secure a fair and impartial trial consists in the difficulty in obtaining a jury from the city or county where the trial is had, the proper remedy is by motion for a jury to be summoned from some other city or county, under the statute in such case made and provided (Wright's Case, 33 Grat. [74 Va.] 880; Joyce's Case, 78 Va. 287; Uzzle's Case, 107 Va. 926, 60 S. E. 52).

As said in Bowles' Case:

"The law has provided the test as to the fitness of a person to sit upon a jury in the trial of criminal cases, and if, by applying this test, an impartial jury was in fact secured in the county where the trial was to take place, a conclusive presumption arises that the motion for a change of venue was unfounded."

As said in Uzzle's Case:

"It is well settled that, where an application for a change of venue is based simply on the ground of difficulty in obtaining jurors in the county or corporation free from exception, it must be preceded by an application to summon jurors beyond such county. Wright's Case, 33 Grat. 880; Joyce's Case, 78 Va. 287."

[3] It is true, however, that in so far as the motion for change of venue rests on the ground that the case could not be fairly or impartially tried in the city of Portsmouth, because of the hostile public feeling and prejudice existing in such city against the accused, the facts that an impartial jury in contemplation of law was obtained from that city, and that no motion was made for a jury to be summoned from elsewhere, are not conclusive against the right of the accused to a change of venue. Uzzle's Case, 107 Va. 919, 60 S. E. 52.

[4, 5] In this connection it must be borne in mind, however, that it is well settled that the trial court is allowed a wide discretion in the matter of ordering a change of venue, and its ruling will not be disturbed unless it plainly appears that the discretion has been improperly exercised. Looney's Case, 115 Va. 921, 78 S. E. 625; Thompson's Case, 131 Va. —, 109 S. E. 447. The mere apprehension of the accused, or his belief, that he cannot secure a fair trial in the city or county in which he is indicted, is not sufficient to support a motion for a change of venue. As said in Thompson's Case, supra:

"He must establish by independent and disinterested testimony such facts as make it appear probable, at least, that his fears and belief are well founded." quoting from Wormeley's Case, 10 Grat. (51 Va.) 658.

Moreover, while the fact that a jury, free from exception upon their examination on their voir dire, has been obtained from the city or county in which the trial is had, is not conclusive against the motion for a change of venue, it is a circumstance to be considered along with all the other evidence bearing upon the issue presented by the motion.

[6] Coming now to the specific consideration of the issue last mentioned, we find that the precise question presented for our decision to be this:

2. Was the evidence such that it should have convinced the trial court that the hostile public feeling and prejudice against the accused in the city of Portsmouth was so great that, in the trial of the accused at that place by any jury, it was likely that the jury would be so influenced by the popular feeling, as to render it probable, at least, that the accused would not have a fair trial?

There was no evidence before the trial court tending to show that such a result was to be apprehended, other than a mere rumor heard on the streets by certain witnesses. As appears from their testimony, these very witnesses were not convinced that the rumor had any foundation in fact. On the contrary their personal opinion was that it had no such foundation. Such too was the opinion of the accused himself. He, as his testimony shows, had no apprehension of the existence of any such hostile public sentiment at the place of trial as would influence a jury to his prejudice when once properly selected. What he feared was that an impartial jury would not be selected in the first instance from the jurors in attendance upon the court.

Such being the situation as made to appear by the evidence on the motion for change of venue, any further detailed consideration of the special circumstances of the case becomes unnecessary; and we have no hesitancy in holding that the trial court was plainly right in refusing to change the venue.

[7] The proper weight to be given, upon a motion for a change of venue, to the circumstances that influential citizens have raised a fund by private subscription, and have employed counsel, to aid in the prosecution of the accused, is dealt with in Wormeley's Case, supra, 10 Grat. (51 Va.) at pages 672-674. As there held, such circumstances do not of themselves furnish sufficient ground for a change of venue.

3. Did the court err in refusing to quash the second venire facias by which certain of the jurors were summoned who were in attendance upon the term of court at which the accused was tried, by which venire facias such jurors were summoned to complete the panel for the trial of a certain felony case, one of which jurors was used as one of the jury who tried the accused?

This question must be answered in the negative.

As provided in sections 4895 and 4896 of the Code, jurors summoned and in attendance upon any term of court for the trial of felony cases, whether summoned by the first or a subsequent venire facias issued for such jurors, may be used for the trial of all misdemeanor, as well as felony, cases, to be tried at such term.

Section 4895 contains the following provision, namely:

"At one term of the court only one jury shall be summoned, unless the court or judge thereof otherwise direct."

And section 4896, so far as material, provides as follows:

"In any case of felony, where a sufficient number of jurors to constitute a panel of twenty free from exception cannot be had from those summoned and in attendance, * * * or when the venire facias, or panel, has been quashed for any cause, the court may direct another venire facias, and cause to be summoned * * * so many persons as may be deemed necessary to obtain a panel of twenty free from exception. * * *"

It appears from the record before us that at the term of court in question the first venire facias was awarded by order of court entered on March 1st, commanding the sergeant of the city of Portsmouth to summon and cause to come before the court on the 3d day of March at 10 o'clock a. m. 20 persons of that city to be taken from a list of 24 persons to be furnished by the clerk of the court, for the trial of Joe Foster, qualified in all respects to serve as jurors to recognize on their oaths whether the said Joe Foster be guilty of the felony whereof he stands accused.

Nineteen persons only were summoned by the sergeant under said scire facias.

So far as the record discloses, the Joe Foster Case was not tried as expected.

It further appears from the record before us that at the same term of court, on March 4th, the second venire facias was awarded by order of court commanding the sergeant to summon and cause to come before the court on that day at 3 o'clock p. m. 13 persons of that city, to be taken from a list to be furnished by the court "to complete the panel of jurors for the trial of E. A. Martin" qualified, etc., to recognize on their oaths whether the said E. A. Martin be guilty of the felony whereof he stands accused. All of these 13 persons were accordingly summoned.

On the 7th day of March, at the same term of court, the misdemeanor case of the accused, which we have under review, was called for trial. Thereupon, after the motion of the accused aforesaid for a change of venue had been overruled, the accused pleaded not guilty, to which plea the commonwealth replied generally, and issue was joined thereon. Thereupon the accused moved the court to quash the said second venire facias, which motion the court overruled, and thereupon, from those jurors who had been summoned at that term for the trial of Joe Foster and E. A. Martin, charged with felonies, the court proceeded to impanel a jury for the trial of the misdemeanor case under review, and seven men, after examination upon their voir dire, having been obtained free from exception, the commonwealth having erased one and the accused one, the remaining five constituted the jury for the trial of the accused.

It does not appear from the record before us how many of the 19 persons summoned as aforesaid under the first venire facias or how many of the 13 summoned under the second venire facias attended court in accordance with their summons, or were still in attendance upon the court on March 7th, when the jury was selected in the case in judgment. It appears from the record, however, that 4 of the 5 composing the latter jury, as finally constituted, were among the 19 summoned by the first venire facias, and the fifth juror was one of those summoned by the second venire facias.

The position taken in the assignment of error which raises the question under consideration is this: That, under section 4896, aforesaid, the court had no authority to award the second venire facias "while there were sufficient jurors summoned by virtue of the first venire."

If this statement is intended to mean, as we suppose it does, that there were, of the jurors who had been summoned by virtue of the first venire, a sufficient number in attendance upon the court to try all misdemeanor cases which were to be tried at that term, including the case in judgment, the statement assumes a fact which does not appear from the record which the accused has brought before us. For this reason, if there were no other, we would be compelled to hold the position taken to be untenable.

[8] But the authority of the court, under section 4896, to award the second venire facias, did not depend upon whether the jurors already in attendance were sufficient for the trial of the misdemeanor cases which were to be tried. That was immaterial. By the express terms of the statute, if any felony case required the issuance of the second venire facias in order to secure a jury for its trial as therein provided, the court had the authority conferred upon it of awarding the second venire facias, in which case, also by the express terms of the statute, the jurors so summoned thereby might be used for the trial of all misdemeanor cases. And it appears from the record, as it is certified to us, that the E. A. Martin felony case required the issuance of the second venire facias in order to complete the panel for its trial. This, in any aspect of the case, is decisive of the question under consideration adversely to the accused.

We do not, of course mean to say that the last-named fact could not have been questioned in the court below, issue taken upon it and the contrary fact, if it was a fact, have been made to appear. But that was not done.

[9] There are a number of other positions taken in the brief for the accused, which were also urged in oral argument, challenging the validity of the procedure by which the jury in the instant case was obtained. But as the positions were not presented in the assignments of error, no further reference need be made to them.

[10] 4. The only matters which remain for our consideration, which are sought to be presented by the assignments of error, concern the refusal of the trial court to allow certain questions to be asked of certain witnesses by counsel for the accused.

This action of the court was the same in substance as refusing to allow the witnesses to answer such questions.

The record does not show what the answers of these witnesses would have been to these questions, nor that there was any avowal of what answers were expected. It is well settled that in such cases the assignments of error will not be considered on appeal. Washington, etc., Co. v. Goodrich, 110 Va. 692, 86 S. E. 977; Foy v. Commonwealth, decided at this term of court (Va.) 111 S. E. 269.

The case will be affirmed.

WALKER v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §134(1)—Denial of motion on ground of prejudice not supported by evidence held not error.

Where defendant did not introduce evidence in support of his motion for a change of venue on the ground of prejudice against him in the city in which he had been indicted, but contented himself merely with an oral argument, the court did not err in denying motion.

2. Intoxicating liquors §236(4)—Evidence held to show that the defendant had authorized employee to sell whisky.

In prosecution for selling ardent spirits, evidence held to warrant the jury in finding that the sale of whisky by defendant's employee was within the scope of his employment, and had been authorized by the defendant.

3. Intoxicating liquors §168—Employer who authorized employee to sell whisky guilty of selling ardent spirits.

Where restaurant employee with authority from employer sold whisky, the employer was guilty of selling ardent spirits, being responsible for the criminal act of his employee.

4. Criminal law §1173(5)—Modification of defendant's requested instruction as to testimony of paid detectives held not prejudicial to defendant.

In prosecution for selling ardent spirits, modification of defendant's requested instruction, requiring testimony of paid detectives, which invites the commission of crime, to be closely scrutinized, held not prejudicial to defendant, being more favorable than the original request.

Error to Hastings Court of Portsmouth.

William R. Walker was convicted of selling ardent spirits, and he brings error. Affirmed.

There was in this case a trial by jury, resulting in a verdict finding the accused guilty of selling ardent spirits as charged in the indictment, and fixing his punishment at six months in jail and a fine of $500. The judgment under review was entered accordingly.

There is no assignment of error which challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Therefore no statement of the facts touching the merits of the case is deemed necessary.

S. M. Brandt and R. T. Thorp, both of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

This case was argued orally before us along with the case of Rudd v. Commonwealth, 111 S. E. 270, decided at this term of court.

The first and second assignments of error in the case in judgment are in precisely the same language, and allege the same errors, as are alleged in the first and second assignments of error in the case of Rudd v. Commonwealth; the first assignment concerning the refusal of the court to change the venue, and the second assignment concerning the refusal of the court to quash the venire facias. There are only the following differences between the two cases in so far as these subjects are concerned, namely:

1. In the Rudd Case evidence was introduced by the accused to sustain the motion for a change of venue, and the commonwealth introduced evidence combatting the motion. In the case now before us no evidence was introduced by the accused or the commonwealth upon such motion; the accused contenting himself with presenting to the court below merely the argument of his counsel on the subject.

[1] Reference is here made to the Rudd Case for the ground on which the motion for change of venue was there based, and for our views upon the subject, even if there were evidence in the instant case such as there was in the Rudd Case. The court in the instant case did not decline to hear evidence on the motion. It merely acted upon the motion as presented without evidence to support it. A fortiori, we are clearly of opinion that the court did not err in the instant case in refusing to change the venue.

2. In the instant case, as in the Rudd Case, jurors summoned and in attendance upon the court for the trial of felony cases were used to try the misdemeanor case in question. The assignment of error in the instant case, with respect to the action of the court in refusing to quash the venire facias, is, however, a total misfit when applied to the facts of this case. The assignment of error just mentioned is to the refusal of the court to quash the second venire facias. This was applicable in the Rudd Case, but is totally inapplicable in the instant case, because in the latter case there was no second venire facias. There was but one venire facias, which was the same as the first venire facias involved in the Rudd Case. The jurors in the instant case were all obtained from those in attendance upon the court who had been summoned by such first venire facias. It is obvious, therefore, that there is no merit in this assignment of error in the instant case.

There are two assignments of error which pertain to the individual case, and which will be dealt with in their order as stated below.

3. It is assigned as error that the trial court admitted in evidence the testimony of one Cohen, to the effect that, on December 31, 1920, the said Cohen, in the place of business of the accused, to wit, a restaurant, known as "Walker's Café" bought a bottle of corn whisky, which was delivered to Cohen by one John Daley, a waiter employed by the accused in said restaurant business, on the ground that such purchase occurred in the absence of the accused, and that there is no evidence in the case to show that the sale was within the scope of Daley's employment, so as to render the accused responsible for the criminal act of Daley.

There was other testimony for the commonwealth, however, which was to the effect that, the next day after the purchase of the liquor just mentioned, the accused, in a conversation with Cohen and another witness, who was with Cohen when the latter bought the whisky, made the following statement:

"I hear you were down to my place last night; how did you like the corn whisky you got?"

And in this same conversation, the accused, according to the testimony for the commonwealth, also said that he was keeping away from his restaurant because "there was trouble in town at the time;" that his restaurant was being watched; and the accused in that conversation stated also "that Daley worked for him."

[2, 3] We are of opinion that this testimony was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that the sale of the whisky by Daley was not only within the scope of his employment as the servant of the accused, but was in fact authorized by the accused. That being true, the accused was, of course, responsible for such criminal act. Hence we find no merit in the assignment of error under consideration.

[4] 4. The accused requested the court to give the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that the testimony of a paid detective, which invites the commission of crime in order to detect the commission thereof, is always to be received with the greatest caution."

The court refused to give the instruction as asked, but amended it and gave the instruction in the following form:

"The court instructs the jury that the testimony of a paid detective, who invites the commission of crime in order to detect the commission thereof, is of a kind with that of a person in interest, and should be scrutinized closely and received with great caution."

It is urged in behalf of the accused that the modification of the instruction "tended to make the same involved and difficult to understand." We do not so regard the modification. Without entering upon a consideration of the subject of what may be all of the reasons for the rule enunciated by the instruction as offered, we deem it sufficient to say that the instruction, as given, seems to us to be very clear in its meaning, and rather more favorable to the accused than in the form in which it was offered. Certainly, we perceive nothing harmful to the accused in the modification made.

The case will be affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

(132 Va. 674)

GRAY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Jury \S 70(1)—Jurors summoned to try felony case may be used in trial of misdemeanor case, notwithstanding method of impaneling jury for trial of misdemeanor cases provided for by statute.

Under Code 1919, \S 4895, jurors summoned to try a felony and in attendance upon the courts may be used in the trial of a misdemeanor case, tried at the same term, notwithstanding sections 5992 and 5993, providing method for impaneling jurors for trial of misdemeanor cases.

2. Criminal law \S 338(3)—Testimony that witness bought liquor at certain place admissible against defendant with other evidence that defendant was real owner thereof.

In prosecution for selling ardent spirits, testimony that witness bought liquor at a certain restaurant purporting to be in charge of a person other than the defendant, held admissible as against defendant, in view of other testimony showing that the defendant was the real owner of the restaurant, and that name of such other person as manager thereof was a blind.

Error to Hustings Court of Portsmouth.

L. L. Gray was convicted of selling ardent spirits, and he brings error. Affirmed.

There was in this case a trial by jury, resulting in a verdict finding the accused guilty of selling ardent spirits as charged in the indictment, and fixing his punishment at six months in jail and a fine of $500. The judgment under review was entered accordingly.

There is no assignment of error which challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Therefore no statement of the facts touching the merits of the case is deemed necessary.

S. M. Brandt and R. T. Thorp, both of Norfolk, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

This case was argued orally before us along with the cases of Rudd v. Commonwealth, 111 S. E. 270, and Walker v. Commonwealth, 111 S. E. 274, decided at this term of court.

1. The first and fourth assignments of error in the instant case (the first concerning the motion for a change of venue and the fourth concerning an instruction asked by the accused and refused but modified and given by the court as modified), are precisely the same as the first and fourth assignments of error dealt with in the case last mentioned, of Walker v. Commonwealth, and we here refer to what is said in the opinion of the court in that case for the details of our holding in this upon such first and fourth assignments of error. It is sufficient to say here that we find no merit in either of such assignments.

2. The second assignment of error in the instant case concerns the refusal of the court to quash the venire facias by which the jurors were summoned to try the felony case of Joe Foster.

This is the same venire facias which is involved in the Rudd Case, as the first venire facias awarded therein, and is the same venire facias as that which is involved in the Walker Case. In the instant case, as in the Walker Case, the jurors were all obtained from those in attendance upon the court who had been summoned by the venire facias to try the felony case of Joe Foster.

The assignment of error now under consideration is that the court erred in refusing to quash the venire facias last mentioned "for the reason that the said venire facias was not issued in accordance with sections 5992 and 5993 of the Code of Virginia, in that a greater number of talesmen were summoned than provided by section 5992."

It will be observed that this is a different assignment of error from those in the Rudd and Walker Cases, on the subject of the venire, but it is equally without merit, although for a somewhat different reason.

[1] Sections 5992 and 5993 of the Code do provide a method for the empaneling of juries for the trial of misdemeanor cases, but that is not the only method provided by statute for that purpose. As pointed out in the opinion in the Rudd Case, by the express terms of section. 4895, jurors summoned to try a felony case, and in attendance upon the courts are authorized to be used to constitute the jury to try any misdemeanor case to be tried at the same term of court. Thus another method of obtaining juries for the trial of misdemeanor cases is provided for by statute. Either method may be used by the trial courts. The latter method was used in the instant case, as it was in the Walker Case.

[2] There remains but one other assignment of error for our consideration in the instant case, and that is this:

3. It is alleged that the court erred in admitting in evidence the testimony of one Cohen, to the effect that, on December 31, 1920, in a certain restaurant known as "Hogshead Station," in charge of one O. V. Foy, the said Cohen bought a drink of liquor; such testimony being inadmissible in evidence for the reason, as it is claimed, that the testimony did not tend to connect the accused with the alleged sale of liquor, and did not show that the sale was made by a duly authorized agent of the accused or with his knowledge or consent.

There was other testimony for the commonwealth, however, bearing on this subject. That testimony was given by this same witness Cohen, and was to the following effect: Cohen testified that, on January, 1921, the very next day after the purchase of the drink of liquor by him of Foy in the restaurant above mentioned, as stated in his testimony objected to, he (Cohen) came again to the same restaurant and found the accused there and acting as if he were the proprietor of the business; that witness engaged the accused in conversation, and during the conversation the witness saw whisky being sold; that witness asked the accused if witness "could have a bottle of corn whisky," and the accused "called O. V. Foy, and Foy came over and brought the bottle of whisky for him," and witness paid Foy $4 for it, in the presence of the accused; that the accused told witness that he (the accused) "was the owner of the place, and that the name of O. V. Foy was just a blind. * * *

Such being the evidence, it is plain that the assignment of error under consideration has no merit in it.

The case will be affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

(132 Va. 297)

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. HENDERSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 18, 1922.)

1. Railroads \S 401(7)—Instruction on duty to child on track approved.

In an action for the death of a child struck by a railroad train, where defendant's engineer testified he saw the child in time to have stopped, but did not recognize it as a child, an instruction that, if the defendant's servants used reasonable care to prevent the accident as soon as they discovered, or by ordinary care would have discovered, the object to be a child, would more accurately define the defendant's duty if the word "probably" was inserted before the words "a child."

2. Trial \S 228(1), 230—Numerous and lengthy instructions should be avoided unless necessary.

Concise and clear instructions submitting the particular issue to the jury are to be commended, since instructions which are numerous and lengthy are often not comprehended by the jurors, and are not useful to them, and should be avoided unless they are necessary by reason of the number of issues involved or the varied aspects of the case.

3. Railroads \S 401(7)—Amendment to instruction on care to discover child on track held properly refused.

Where the court instructed the jury that, if defendant's engineer saw an object upon the track which by the exercise of ordinary care he could and would have discovered to be a child in time to have avoided striking it, and failed to do so, the defendant was liable, it was not error to refuse an amendment to the instruction that defendant was not liable for an error of judgment in the engineer in failing to identify the object as a child.

4. Trial \S 260(8)—Refusal of amendment of plaintiff's instruction covered by defendant's instructions held not prejudicial.

The refusal of the court to amend an instruction for plaintiff by adding that the defendant was not liable for an error of judgment by its engineer was not prejudicial to defendant, where an instruction given for it stated there could be no recovery if the engineer in the exercise of ordinary care failed to discover the child in time to avoid the injury.

5. Railroads \S 356(1)—Ordinary care required at place used by public.

The employees of a railroad company owe the duty of keeping a lookout for persons on the track at a point which was known to them to be frequently used by men, women, and children as a walkway, so that it was not error to modify an instruction requested by defendant that it would not be liable if its engineer did not recognize the object on the track to be a child in time to have stopped his train by inserting the words "or by the exercise of ordinary care would have discovered."

6. Trial ⚡252(9)—Instruction on negligence of infant's father not proper where there was no evidence of such negligence.

In an action by a father as the administrator of his child to recover for the death of the child while playing on a railroad track, a requested instruction that plaintiff could not recover if he was negligent in permitting the child to go upon the track was properly refused, where there was no evidence of negligence in that respect.

7. Railroads ⚡382(1)—Child licensee sitting on track not a trespasser.

A child who went upon a railroad track at a place which was customarily used by men, women, and children as a walkway does not lose her right as a licensee and become a mere trespasser by sitting down upon the track to play.

8. Appeal and error ⚡1050(1)—Expert testimony by plaintiff's witness fixing distance necessary to stop train held harmless.

Error, if any, in permitting a witness for plaintiff to testify as an expert as to the distance in which a train could have been stopped under the circumstances in controversy was not prejudicial to defendant where defendant's engineer testified he could have stopped the train within the same distance stated by plaintiff's witness.

9. Evidence ⚡150—Difference between vision of person on track and in engine held not to render experiments incompetent.

In an action for the death of a child playing upon a railroad track, evidence of experiments as to the distance at which a child similarly dressed and situated could have been recognized as a child was not incompetent, because the experiments were made by persons standing on the track, and not by the engineer of a moving train, especially where there was expert testimony that the engineer would have a better opportunity to recognize the object as a child than would the person on the track.

10. Evidence ⚡150—Fact that persons making experiments as to distance object could be seen knew what they were looking for did not make evidence incompetent.

Experiments to determine the distance at which an object on a track could be recognized as a child are not rendered incompetent as evidence merely because the persons making the experiment knew they were looking for a child, whereas the engineer would not have such knowledge, especially where the child was at a point on the track used by the public as a walkway, so that the engineer owed the duty to keep a lookout for persons on the track and had reason to suspect the object was a child.

11. Evidence ⚡568(5)—Testimony of engineer as to distance at which he could recognize object as a child is not conclusive.

In an action for the death of a child struck by a train, where the engineer testified he saw an object on the track in time to have stopped, but did not recognize it as a child until too close to stop, his testimony as to the distance at which he was first able to recognize the object as a child is not conclusive upon the jury, in view of the tendency of a person charged with responsibility to excuse himself.

12. Evidence ⚡58 — Railroad engineer presumed to have eyes as good as the average.

Railroad engineers must be presumed to have eyes at least as good as those of the average person.

13. Evidence ⚡150—Essential conditions must be substantially similar to render experiments admissible.

To render evidence of experiments admissible, the essential conditions at the time of the experiments must be substantially similar to those existing at the time of the occurrence under investigation, but it is not necessary that the conditions be identical in every particular.

14. Appeal and error ⚡970(2)—Discretion of trial judge as to relevancy of evidence is entitled to much consideration.

The question of admissibility of experiments is one of relevancy as to which in debatable instances the discretion of the trial judge is entitled to much consideration.

15. Trial ⚡139(1)—Weight of evidence of experiments is for the jury.

The weight to be given to evidence of experiments is a question for the jury, and varies according to the circumstances of similarity existing between the experiments made and the actual occurrence under investigation.

Error to Circuit Court, Campbell County.

Action by Frank A. Henderson, as administrator of the estate of Marian Henderson, deceased, against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

F. Markoe Rivinus, of Philadelphia, Pa., and Howard & Burks, for plaintiff in error.

John L. Lee, of Lynchburg, and M. B. Booker, of Halifax, for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This action was brought to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, Marian Henderson, a child 26 months old, who was run over and killed by one of the defendant's trains. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant assigns error.

The accident occurred about 9 o'clock a. m. on a clear day within the corporate limits of the town of Brookneal in Campbell county. For many years the railway tracks at that point had, with the knowledge of the railway company and its employees, been used as a walkway by men, women, and children. Marian Henderson had wandered away from the home of her parents, about 100 yards from the railroad, and was sitting down on or beside the rail. She wore a light-colored dress with a stocking net cap over her head, and was stooping or bending over, with her hands down, as if trying to pick something up from the track. For a distance of nearly 1,200 feet in the direction from which the train was approaching the track was perfectly straight. In the engine at the time were the engineer, fireman, and two brakemen, and they all testify that they saw the child as soon as the engine reached the straight track, but thought the object was a piece of paper, or, as one of the brakemen said, either a piece of paper or a big white chicken. According to their testimony, they kept their eyes on this object, but did not discover its identity until they were within about 350 feet of the point at which the child was struck. It was then too late to stop the train, but the engineer blew his whistle, applied his brakes in emergency, and did all he could towards saving the child's life.

The speed of the train was about 25 miles an hour, and with prompt action could have been stopped within a distance of about 600 feet. It is thus apparent that there was ample opportunity to stop after the object was first seen and before it was struck, but no chance of doing so after the engineer, and others in the engine first discovered the character of the object.

Of course, it is not contended, nor is it to be imagined, that the defendant's employees intentionally ran over the child. Furthermore, it is clear that, if the jury were bound to accept the testimony of these employees as conclusive, the verdict was wrong, and the judgment ought to be reversed. If, as claimed by them, they saw the object as soon as they could see it, and at that time had no reason from its appearance to believe it was a human being, and, in the exercise of the diligence required of them at a place regularly used by men, women, and children, had no reason to believe sooner than they did that it probably was a child, and, after making the discovery, used every reasonable means to avoid the injury, the defendant was not liable. All of these conditions of nonliability were established, if the evidence given by the only persons who could see the situation from the engine was conclusively binding upon the jury. Was it conclusive? The answer to this inquiry must precede the determination of the final and decisive question in the case, which is whether they discovered or ought to have discovered that the object was probably a child in peril before it was too late to take effective measures for its safety.

The law of the case is stated so succinctly and with such approximate accuracy in the instructions given by the court to the jury that they may appropriately be set forth at this point. The instructions as given were as follows:

First, on behalf of the plaintiff:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the engineer in charge of the defendant's train which struck and killed the deceased saw some object upon the track, which, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could and would have discovered was a child in time to have avoided striking it, and failed to do so, the defendant is liable, and the jury should find for the plaintiff."

This instruction could with propriety have been made a shade more favorable for the plaintiff by inserting the word "probably" before the words "a child."

Second, on behalf of the defendant:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that while the plaintiff's intestate was lying or sitting on the track she was seen by those in charge of the defendant's train and was thought to be some inanimate object as a bundle or piece of paper; that they continued to look at said object and as soon as they discovered, or by the exercise of ordinary care would have discovered, it to be a child, used reasonable care to prevent injuring her, they must find a verdict for the defendant." (Italics added for purposes of comment indicated infra.)

[1] The insertion of the word "probably" just before the words "a child" would have more accurately defined the duty.

These two instructions, in our opinion, presented to the jury in a clear and helpful manner the theory upon which the plaintiff was entitled to recover if the evidence warranted a recovery, and the theory upon which the defendant was entitled to a verdict if the evidence warranted such a verdict.

[2] We have so often had occasion to comment upon the unwisdom of prolixity and repetition in the giving of instructions that we wish to commend the counsel on both sides for the care which was evidently bestowed upon the preparation of the instructions requested, and to commend the court for the conciseness and clearness with which it submitted the issue to the jury. Instructions of this kind are of real service to the jury in reaching a correct conclusion. As we have said in other cases, it is, of course, sometimes necessary, by reason of the number of issues involved or the varied aspects of the case, to give a number of instructions, but this is not ordinarily true, and ought to be avoided whenever possible, for it must be a matter of common knowledge and experience with the profession that, where the instructions are numerous and lengthy, they are often not digested or comprehended by the jurors, and therefore as often not useful to them.

1. It is somewhat out of the order in which the assignments are dealt with in the petition, but while we are on this subject of instructions we may as well dispose of the errors complained of in that respect.

[3] With reference to the plaintiff's instruction first above recited, the defendant asked the court to add this amendment:

"But the court instructs the jury that the defendant is not liable for an error of judgment in the engineer in failing to identify as a child stooping on the track and practically motionless an object which he took to be a piece of paper before he actually ascertained it to be a child."

The court refused to make this amendment, and the defendant insists that this refusal was erroneous. The amendment might perhaps have been added without impropriety, though even as to this we do not feel entirely confident, and in any event there was certainly no error in refusing it. The plaintiff's right to recover depended upon the failure of the engineer to exercise ordinary care, and this principle was embodied in the instruction.

[4] Furthermore, the second instruction, given for the defendant, said that there could be no recovery if those in charge of the train, in the exercise of ordinary care, failed to discover the child in time to avoid the injury. This, in effect, told the jury that an error in judgment, provided the defendant's employees based their judgment upon the situation as it would have appeared to men in the exercise of ordinary care, would not entitle the plaintiff to a recovery. The amendment in question might have unduly emphasized the defense, which was otherwise fully covered by the instruction as given.

[5] With respect to the instruction as offered on behalf of the defendant, complaint is made because the court, before giving the same, added the words "or by the exercise of ordinary care would have discovered," italicized in the instruction as above set forth. The amendment was clearly proper. The place at which the accident occurred was known to be frequently used by men, women, and children as a walkway, and the employees of the company were under the duty of keeping a lookout for the express purpose of discovering and avoiding injury to persons at that point. Southern Ry. Co. v. Wiley (case of a child 2½ years old, on its hands and knees), 112 Va. 183, 184, 189, 70 S. E. 510. Even in the case of a trespasser this court has held that, after discovering an unknown object on or near the track, though the employees of the company believe it to be inanimate, they have no right to disregard its presence, but must keep a lookout until its character is determined. Washington & O. D. R. Co. v. Jackson's Adm'r, 117 Va. 636, 640, 85 S. E. 496. This simply means that they must exercise ordinary care to discover the identity of the object and this is all that the court told the jury by the amendment.

[6] Complaint is made of the refusal to instruct that, if the plaintiff, who was the child's father, was guilty of negligence in permitting her to stray away from home, such negligence would prevent a recovery in the case for his benefit. Of this it is sufficient to say that there was no evidence in the case which would have justified the giving of such an instruction.

[7] The defendant asked for an instruction as follows:

"The court instructs the jury under no use of the defendant's track by the public as a walkway, as testified to in this case, can any license be implied on the defendant's part that Marian Henderson should use its tracks in the manner employed at the time of her death. She was therefore not a licensee if she were asleep or sitting down at the time of her death, but a trespasser to whom the only duty owing by the defendant was to use reasonable care not to injure her after her position of danger was actually discovered by those in charge of the train."

There was no error in refusing this instruction. The case of Va. Ry. & P. Co. v. Winstead, 119 Va. 326, 89 S. E. 83, relied upon by the defendant, is not in point. That was a case in which a drunken man, in the nighttime, was lying dangerously near a street railway track in the city of Norfolk, and was struck and killed by a street car. His administrator sought to recover partly upon the theory that the defendant had not equipped its car with a sufficient headlight. The facts showed that the headlight would have disclosed a pedestrian using the street in an ordinary way, and we held that the railway company did not have to assume that men would lie down on the track, and did not have to equip their cars with electric lights so arranged as to operate as a searchlight for persons in this position. In the instant case, however, the accident occurred in broad daylight, and, furthermore, the place was one frequented not only by men and women, but by children, whose playful habits and lack of discretion are matters of common knowledge; and, when this object was discovered on the track, there was a positive duty on the railway company's employees to exercise reasonable care to discover its identity. There was nothing at all to hinder the making of this discovery except the intervening distance, and this distance was being constantly reduced by the approach of the train. The child was a licensee, and could not at its age lose these rights by its own negligence in sitting down on the track. Southern Ry. Co. v. Wiley, supra. Its position did not abrogate the defendant's duty of lookout, but was, of course, a circumstance for the jury to consider in determining whether that duty was performed.

We find no error with respect to the instructions.

[8] 2. A witness named Harvey, 62 years old, an experienced locomotive engineer, but one who for a number of years had not been engaged in railroad work, was asked within what distance he thought the train which struck the child could, under the conditions prevailing at that time, have been stopped. His answer was that it could have been stopped in 200 yards. This testimony was admitted over the objection of the defendant, and constitutes the basis of one of the assignments of error. If there was any error in admitting this testimony, it was plainly harmless, because the engineer in charge of the train testified that he could have stopped, and in fact did stop, in 600 feet, the exact distance named in Harvey's estimate.

3. The leading assignment of error, presented to us with marked earnestness and ability, is that the court permitted certain witnesses to testify as to several tests or experiments which they made for the purpose of determining the distance up the track from which they could recognize a child as such when it was sitting on the rail at the point of the accident. There were two or more of these experiments made by sundry persons, some when the day was perfectly clear, and others in dark and cloudy weather. A child about the size of the one who was killed, and similarly dressed, was placed at the same place and in substantially the same position, and the witnesses in question then went up the track to see how far away they could recognize the object as a child. The result of the testimony was that, when the day was clear, they could recognize the child at a distance of something like 1,100 feet away, and that on a dark or cloudy day they could identify it at a distance of 900 feet. These witnesses, of course, knew from the outset what the object was, but they were very positive in their testimony that under weather conditions as above indicated they could clearly and unquestionably recognize the child as such at the respective distances stated.

The contention of the defendant is that these tests were inadmissible because the conditions under which they were made were not substantially the same as those by which the engineer was surrounded.

[9] One of the differences pointed out is that the engineer was on an engine, the motion and vibration of which would interfere with clear vision, while the witnesses who were making the tests were on the ground. This particular difference in the situation of the parties, however, is shown by the evidence to have been unsubstantial. The witness, Harvey, an old engineer, testified that he had participated in one of the tests, and that, in his opinion, a man in the engine moving as this one was would have been in a more favorable position for making the discovery than a man on the track. Nobody testified to the contrary. Moreover, and perhaps even more to the point, the engineer in charge of the engine, after saying that he did not think these tests were fair, upon being asked to specify the reason why he did not think they were fair, said:

"Knowing a thing is there and having your mind to help you out makes a great deal of difference."

This was a pointed, sensible, and comprehensive answer; and it is this difference, very appropriately called in the petition for the writ of error "the difference in the mental attitude of the parties," which the defendant chiefly relies upon, and, in view of the testimony, must solely rely upon, is a reason why the evidence should not have been admitted.

[10] We may say, therefore, that the real question as to the admissibility of these tests is whether the fact that the witnesses making them knew from the outset that a child had been placed on the track constituted such a difference between their situation and that of the engineer and others with him in the engine as to render the tests incompetent as evidence. The position of the defendant in this respect does not seem to us to be well taken. We do not mean to say that this difference is of no consequence, but we think that its effect upon the value of the tests as proof was a question to be determined by the jury.

[11, 12] It is a simple proposition, but important to keep in mind here, that there was necessarily some point at which men of average vision could, from an approaching engine, be certain that the object was a child. Some allowance is properly to be made for the fact that the men in the engine did not have, as an aid to their sight or vision, knowledge in advance that a child was in fact on the track at that point. But we cannot think it would do to say that the jury in such a case must accept as conclusive the statement of the engineer as to the distance from which he could, in the exercise of ordinary care, make the discovery. Certainly railroad engineers must be presumed to have at least as good eyes as the average person (So. Ry. Co. v. Wiley, supra), and there are limits within which the reach and certainty of their vision cannot be credibly denied. If, for example, the engineer in this case had said that he was in 50 feet of the object before he could recognize it as a child, the common knowledge of the jury, without any rebuttal evidence, would have justified them in finding that his statement was not true. There would be more and more difference of opinion in regard to his ability to recognize the object as the distance therefrom increased, and he was perhaps within the bounds of credibility when he said that he was in 350 feet of the child before he could discover its identity. But the inquiry naturally arises: How in a case like this, where the physical facts make the question doubtful, are the jury to fairly determine where the engineer is telling the truth? We know that the engineer in this case did not intend to run over a child, but, when a deplorable accident of this kind has occurred, men charged with causing it are always prone to excuse themselves from blame, and they will sometimes make inaccurate and untrue statements as to the circumstances when they would have been very far from intending to bring about the calamity. The plaintiff could not be expected to obtain the use of a freight train in order to make an experiment, and, as the real question was one of eyesight, he was entitled to have intelligent and disinterested parties observe the situation under substantially similar conditions and then let the jury pass upon the reliability of the tests. Its admissibility was a question for the court, and its weight and effect was a question for the jury. See the authorities cited infra. Proper allowance should be, and of course would be, made for the difference in the mental attitude of the parties, but there was a very wide margin between the point 1,100 feet away from the place at which, on a clear day, the witnesses said they could positively identify the object as a child and the point 350 feet away, at which, on a like clear day, the engineer and others with him said they had arrived before they could make such identification.

[13] The rule, to be sure, is well settled that tests and experiments must be made under substantially the same conditions as those prevailing at the time and place of the occurrence under investigation, but this rule cannot be carried to the extent for which the defendant contends in this case, nor do the decisions, either in Virginia or elsewhere, relied upon by the defendant go thus far.

In Rudd's Adm'r v. R. & D. R. Co., 80 Va. 546, a boy 12 years of age was sent by his parents to mind cows in a field along the railway. He fell asleep on the track and was run over by a freight train and killed. The majority opinion recites that—"An experiment made with a boy about 12 years of age, and of the size of the deceased, showed that an object of that size could be seen on the road at the distance of 1,118 yards from the curve or turn in the road."

No question of the identity of the object was involved. In discussing the probative value of the experiment, the court said:

"The experiment made by plaintiff's witness of placing a boy 12 years of age, and of about the size of the deceased, in position on the track, and then being able to see him from a point of observation 1,118 yards off, when they knew that he was thus placed there, and their undertaking was to see him, does not prove that the deceased, lying down flat on the track, may not have escaped the observation of the engineer, even when he was at his post and on the lookout, at that great distance, and while the train was running rapidly along."

Upon all the facts in that case, the correctness of the decision does not seem entirely free from doubt, and it is to be noted that Judges Lewis and Richardson dissented. But the case is distinguishable from the one at bar with respect to the experiment. Rudd was on the track, as shown by the opinion, at a point where the defendant "had a right not to expect or apprehend any person to be," and the purpose of the experiment was to show, not how far away the engineer could have recognized the object as a human being, but how far away he could have seen if he had been looking. It is true the engineer said he had been looking out, but was under no obligation to be keeping, and did not say that he was keeping, the vigilant lookout which he would have been expected and required to observe at a place constantly used by adults and children. The court very plausibly said, therefore, that the experiment did not prove that the boy "may not have escaped the observation of the engineer." The question was not how far he could have seen and recognized Rudd if he had been looking out for him, for he owed no duty of lookout, but whether, after seeing him, he did all he could to save him; and it was clear that after seeing the boy it was impossible to prevent the injury.

In the present case the engineer had every reason to expect children to be on or near the tracks, and was bound to look out for and discover them. This distinction between the two cases is of very material import in connection with the tests in question here. The mental attitude of the persons making the tests in the instant case cannot, after all, be regarded as very different from that with which the engineer ought to have regarded the object. He did not actually know that the object was a child, but, in view of the known use of the track at that point, he ought to have been very alert to discover its character. He could not lawfully proceed on the assumption that there would be no child in danger at that place.

The case of Richards v. Commonwealth, 107 Va. 881, 59 S. E. 1104, is relied upon by the defendant. In that case there was a question about the identity of certain tracks made by the accused, and a witness was allowed to testify that during the trial he had gone to the scene of the shooting and made tracks with his own and with the shoes of another, and found that the tracks in each case were shorter than the shoes which made the tracks. The court, dealing very briefly with the question, simply said that the evidence did not clearly show that the conditions under which these experimental tracks were made "were the same or substantially similar" to those prevailing at the time the tracks alleged to have been those of the accused were made; and, as the case had to be reversed on other grounds, the court said it would not pass upon the question at that time, but that, upon another trial, evidence of such experiments should not be admitted unless it satisfactorily appeared that the tracks were made under conditions the same as, or substantially similar to, those surrounding the shooting of the deceased. This was merely the affirmation of a general and well-settled rule, and one which was not violated by the admission of the evidence complained of here. The conditions of the experiments in this case were substantially similar to those confronting the engineer, and such dissimilarity as existed was clearly and emphatically brought to the attention of the jury and was a matter for them to weigh and appraise.

In the case of Norfolk & Western Railway Co. v. Sollenberger, 110 Va. 615, 66 S. E. 726, cited and relied upon by the defendant, an employee of the company was sent with a flag to protect a work train. It was claimed that from exhaustion he lay down and went to sleep on the track. While in that position he was run over and killed by a backing train. The following is taken from the opinion of the court:

"Some time after the accident a test train was made up to correspond with the wrecking train used at the time Sollenberger was killed. Counsel for plaintiff and defendant were present, and numerous tests were made, and no doubt with the utmost fairness and integrity of purpose. But after all it is impossible to reproduce conditions as they actually existed. If it were possible to reproduce all the physical conditions, as may be done in theory, but not in practice, the mental attitude of those engaged in the tests is necessarily wholly different. Every man engaged in the test knew from the beginning that in the actual occurrence there was a man upon the track exposed to imminent danger. The positions of the actors at a particular moment of time could not be determined with precision; and upon the whole it seems to us that the case must, after all, be determined upon the evidence adduced before the jury by witnesses who were present upon the occasion of the accident, and who testified to what they saw and heard of the actual occurrence. It is oftentimes instructive to take a jury to the scene of an accident, in order to enable them more intelligently to appreciate the evidence adduced before them; but that is altogether different from what was done in this case."

This expression of the court, upon a casual reading, gives color to the contention of the defendant, but upon analysis will not be found to afford substantial support therefor. The experiment in the Sollenberger Case was of a more complicated character than the test in the instant case, because it involved not merely a question of human vision, but co-ordinate action in emergency by two men placed in proper relative position, and the quick manipulation of machinery by one of them. In such a case to be forewarned was to be forearmed, and foreknowledge was an exceedingly important circumstance. There was no immediate emergency in the instant case. The engineer, like the persons making the experiments on the track, had time for deliberate observation. His train was drifting down grade at 20 or 25 miles an hour, and all he had to do was to use his eyes. The statement by the court in the Sollenberger Case that "it was impossible to reproduce conditions as they actually existed" must be read in the light of the facts of that case, and cannot be given a literal meaning for use in all cases, because that statement would be true, to a greater or less extent, of every experiment or test of this character, and it may be confidently asserted that the court did not mean to say that tests and experiments can never be used in evidence unless it is possible "to reproduce conditions as they actually existed." The use of such evidence is too common and too fully supported by authority to admit of any such construction of the Sollenberger Case. Substantially the same thing may be said of the reference in the opinion to the "mental attitude of those engaged in the tests." Foreknowledge that quick emergency stop was to be made with the "test train" was an unusually important factor in that instance, and constituted a material and probably vital difference between the conditions under which the test was made and those under which the injury to Sollenberger occurred. But foreknowledge cannot be allowed to exclude evidence of every experiment, for this would virtually exclude them all. Persons who experiment with a situation for the purpose of ascertaining what would happen or be true under a given state of facts usually know in advance what they are attempting to demonstrate. As a rule, such foreknowledge does not render their testimony as to the result of their experiments incompetent, although it may often very properly affect its weight and value.

In Goings v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 119 Va. 543, 89 S. E. 914, another case relied on by the defendant, this court held that the trial court was right in excluding proof of a test made, but placed the decision, primarily, upon the ground that the evidence was immaterial for reasons theretofore stated, and, secondly, upon the ground that conditions were different. And it is to be noted that, although the court in that case specifically pointed out the difference in conditions, no importance was attached or reference made to the fact that much the same difference in mental attitude relied on in this case accompanied the test there.

The cases of Richmond Passenger & Power Co. v. Racks, 101 Va. 487, 44 S. E. 709, and Wise Terminal Co. v. McCormick, 104 Va.

400, 51 S. E. 731, cited by the defendant, are not in point. Those cases relate to expert testimony, and not to experimental tests. The principle announced therein would, however, apply here, if we could say, as we cannot, that the conditions accompanying the tests were so dissimilar to those confronting the engineer as to render proof of the former inadmissible.

Coming now to the cases outside of Virginia, cited by the defendant, the first is Chicago & Alton R. Co. v. Logue, 47 Ill. App. 292. No facts as to the circumstances of the experiment are shown in the report of the case except such as appear from the following sentence in the opinion:

"There was also error in the admission of evidence as to placing an object on the track and proof as to the distance it could be seen and distinguished, where the circumstances and surroundings were wholly different from those attendant on the engineer in the discharge of his duties." (Italics added.)

In the absence of any statement of the "circumstances and surroundings," the value of the case as authority here cannot be determined. Certainly it does not in terms reject the experiment as evidence on the ground that the person who placed the object on the track knew in advance of its presence there and of the purpose to be accomplished in making the observations.

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Burgess, 114 Ala. 587, 22 South. 169, the following ruling (quoted from 8 Decennial Digest, 717) appears, and is cited by the defendant:

"Whether children on a railroad track, and the fact that they were children, could have been discovered by the engineer in time to stop the train before reaching them, by the exercise of due care, cannot be shown by an experiment made a month after the accident, by placing children on the track and noting the distance at which they were distinguishable by witnesses, looking from the direction from which the train had come."

This quotation, it must be conceded, appears to support very strongly the position of the defendant. We have examined the report of the case, however, and find that the opinion as a whole cannot be given the full effect claimed for it here. The point was not made, and the court did not hold, that the evidence was objectionable because the persons making the experiment knew in advance that the children had been placed on the track. The objection specified was that the evidence "was irrelevant, and the experiment made out of court, when defendant was not present, and because conditions were not shown to be the same as on the occasion of the accident." The court, in holding that the evidence was improper, merely said, "The conditions are too variant."

In Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Brecher, 112 Ill. App. 106, 108, the action was to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff while riding on the footboard of an engine. While going over a crossing on the track the engine sank down by reason of the unsafe condition of the track, and the plaintiff was thus injured. The next day the same engine, equipped with a new footboard, not shown to have been the same height as the old one, and without any cars attached, was run over the crossing. The speed of the engine on the two occasions was not the same. Some repairs had in the meantime been made at and near the crossing. The court said:

"In spite of this dissimilarity of conditions and over the repeated objections and exceptions of appellant, the results of this experiment were submitted to the jury. This action of the trial court is reversible error. Unless it be shown that all the essential conditions of the experiment are identical with those existing at the time of the accident, the results of that experiment have no legitimate bearing upon the issues before the jury, since, instead of enlightening the jury, their tendency is to confuse and to mislead them."

The decision does not seem to involve in any way the question of "mental attitude," and appears to rest upon the general and well-settled rule of evidence applicable to cases of its kind. Of course, the court did not mean to lay down the rule that all the conditions must be identical, but merely that all the conditions essential to a fair test must be the same. Even as thus explained, the word "identical," if taken literally, is a stronger term than the rule, as generally approved and expressed, would justify. It is only necessary that the essential conditions should be substantially similar.

The other two cases relied on by the defendant, Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Crose, 113 Ill. App. 548, and Zimmer v. Fox River, etc., Co., 123 Wis. 643, 101 N. W. 1099, do not deal, directly or indirectly, with the question of "mental attitude," and merely follow the general rule that attending conditions must be sufficiently similar to fairly illustrate the point at issue.

Counsel for the defendant concede that upon the question under consideration the authorities are not uniform. We have shown that those relied upon for their contention do not adequately support it. No case has been found, in this state or elsewhere, which holds that a mere difference in the mental attitude of the parties, as that expression is used in this case, is a sufficient difference to exclude the tests; and we think the weight of authority and the better reason is to the contrary.

In Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Haywood (Tex. Civ. App., December 15, 1920) 227 S. W. 347, the action was to recover damages for the death of a child 20 months old who was killed on the track. The court said:

"Several witnesses who made experiments under similar conditions, except that they were not looking out of the cab of a moving engine, but were on foot, testified that they could see a child slightly larger than this one at a distance varying from 1,700 feet to 2,700 feet, and one witness testified that he could tell that there was some object on the track, though unable to identify it as a child, for a distance of 3,000 feet. The engineer testified that he could see an object as large as a child for a distance of 800 feet. This evidence, we think, makes an issue for the jury, and warrants their finding that, if the engineer had been keeping a look-out, as he said he was, he would have discovered the child when the engine was farther away from it than a distance of 300 feet." (Italics added.)

In Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 90 Iowa, 106, 57 N. W. 680, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419, children were placed on the track by the defendant railway company for the express purpose of making certain tests to determine: First, the distance at which the children on the track at the time of the accident involved could have been seen by the engineer of the approaching train; and, second, the possibility of stopping the train, so as to prevent the accident, after the situation was or should have been known. Some of the tests were made with the same train in use when the injury occurred, and the others with a substantially similar train. To that extent (although, as already pointed out, this particular distinction between the cases is immaterial here) the conditions were more like those attending the accident than in the instant case; but it is to be observed, and we refer to the case for that reason, that there was the precise difference in the mental attitude of the persons engaged in making the tests which is relied upon by defendant as decisive here, and the court said:

"It is true [the conditions] were not identically the same, but they were essentially so. * * * In fact, we do not discover a difference as to conditions in any substantial particular. We think these tests were proper, and, if fairly made, the facts thereby disclosed would be of great value in reaching a conclusion."

In Harrison v. So. Ry. Co., 93 Miss. 41, 46 South. 409, the following facts appear in the statement preceding the opinion:

"The theory of appellant is that the engineer on the train could have seen and should have seen the child in time to stop the engine, and that between the place the engineer sounded the alarm by blowing his whistle and the place the child was struck the engineer could then have put on emergency brakes and stopped the engine before reaching the child. In support of this contention he offered evidence of experiments made at that place, at the same time of day and under similar climatic conditions, attempting to show by witnesses the distance at which a child the same size as the one killed could be seen on the track."

It does not affirmatively so appear from the statement of the above case, but the clear inference is that the observations were made by the witnesses from the ground, and not from an engine; and it is perfectly manifest that they made these observations with foreknowledge that a child was on the track. The Mississippi Supreme Court, in the opinion, said:

"The court also erred in excluding the testimony of the witnesses of the appellant with respect to the experiments made as to how far the baby could be seen from the direction from which the train came. This testimony was clearly competent. The purpose of the inquiry was to show whether the engineer saw, or ought to have seen, the child in order to have avoided the catastrophe, and it was directly relevant to that inquiry. The experiments were made on the same kind of a day as that on which the injury occurred, at the same hour of the day, and under like conditions in every respect, and we fail to see any sound reason which can support the exclusion of the testimony taken under circumstances identical, or nearly identical, with those obtaining on the day the injury was inflicted."

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. McMichael, 115 Ark. 101, 171 S. W. 115, the defendant at the trial proved certain experiments made by it, one with the same engine and the same number of cars as those in use when the accident happened, and another with a similar engine and the same engineer. In rebuttal, the plaintiff was allowed to prove by a number of witnesses that, after a man had placed himself in the position in which the injured man was at the time of the accident, they walked up the track and made their observations. Their testimony is fairly illustrated by the following quotation from the evidence of one of these witnesses.

"The man was sitting on the edge of the platform facing the track, in about this position (indicating). We walked up as far as the trestle, 383 steps. I turned around to see if I could see anything on the platform. I could tell very readily that it was a man. I could see his hand—that is, the hand next to me—very clearly."

This evidence was admitted over the objection of the defendant, and, in passing upon this action by the trial court, the Supreme Court of Arkansas said:

"We are of the opinion that the court did not err in holding that the conditions under which the experiments were made by the witnesses on behalf of the appellee were substantially the same. It is true that the witnesses who made these observations were not on an engine moving at a speed of 35 or 40 miles an hour, but there was testimony of expert passenger engineers to the effect that one accustomed to the movements of an engine could see a man as plainly from an engine going 35 or 40 miles per hour as one standing or walking on the track. This testimony, although contradicted by expert passenger engineers testifying for appellant, was nevertheless sufficient to render the testimony of the witnesses for appel-lee competent, so far as the essential similarity of viewpoints was concerned."

In the instant case, as we have seen, an engineer of many years' experience testified that a man in a moving engine could in his opinion, see and identify an object ahead on the track more easily than if he were down on the level of the track; and, moreover, the defendant's engineer seemed to concede in his testimony that the foreknowledge of the presence of the child on the track constituted the only advantage in favor of the observations made by the man on the ground. Exactly that advantage, it will be observed, was enjoyed by all the persons making the tests mentioned in the McMichael Case, supra, and they were all held to be properly admitted in evidence.

Without quoting further from the decisions in point, we refer to the following cases, each of which will be found satisfactory authority for the proposition that the mere foreknowledge of the position and identity of the object on the track cannot be made the test for excluding evidence of experiments like those here under consideration: Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Whitfield (Tex. Civ. App.) 206 S. W. 381; Young v. Clark et al., 16 Utah, 42, 50 Pac. 832; Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Hudson, 2 Ga. App. 352, 58 S. E. 500; Griggs v. Dunham (Mo. App.) 204 S. W. 574; Byers v. Railway Co., 94 Tenn. 345, 29 S. W. 128.

[14, 15] After all, the question is one of relevancy, as to which, in debatable instances, the discretion of the trial judge is entitled to much consideration. 1 Jones on Evidence, § 164; 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 444; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Waugh, 117 Va. 386, 393, 84 S. E. 658. Where the conditions are substantially similar in essential particulars, the evidence is admissible, and its weight is to be determined by the jury. As said in 22 Corpus Juris, p. 759:

"The weight to be attached to evidence of experiments is for the jury, and varies according to the circumstances of similarity existing between the experiments made and the actual occurrence, the facts of which are under investigation."

See further, in support of this paragraph, Byers v. Railway Co., supra; Panhandle & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Haywood, supra; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Burns, 32 Ill. App. 196; Clark v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R., 30, 40 S. W. 992; Augusta, etc., Co. v. Arthur, 3 Ga. App. 513, 60 S. E. 213.

It would, perhaps, be improper to conclude this opinion without referring to the cases Seaboard, etc., Co. v. Joyner's Adm'r, 92 Va. 354, 23 S. E. 773, Tucker's Adm'r v. N. & W. R. Co., 92 Va. 549, 24 S. E. 229, and N. & W. R. Co. v. Dunnaway's Adm'r, 93 Va. 29, 24 S. E. 698, cited by the defendant to support the general proposition that there is no liability in this case. Joyner, Tucker, and Dunnaway were all persons to whom the defendant owed no duty of discovery, and there was nothing in either of the cases to put the engineer on notice of the danger to a human being until too late to avoid the accident. In the instant case it was the engineer's duty to exercise reasonable care to discover the plaintiff's decedent, and there was evidence, by persons who had made the tests, tending very strongly to show that the child's identity ought to have been discovered in ample time to prevent the injury.

For the reasons stated we are of opinion that the issue in this case was one to be tried by the jury, that there was no error in the admission of testimony or in respect to the instructions, and that we cannot properly interfere with the verdict.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Affirmed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

(132 Va. 173)

DEARING et al. v. DEARING et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 3, 1922.)

1. Trial \S 139(1)—If jury might have found against party demurring to evidence, judgment must be against him.

If the evidence to which a party demurs is such that a jury might have found a verdict for the opposite party, the court must give judgment for the opposite party.

2. Wills \S 303(6)—Denial of forgery of first page of will corroborates attesting witness' testimony of execution.

Where contestants claimed the executor had substituted a forged first page to the will for the original first page, the denial of the forgery should be considered in corroboration of the testimony of the sole surviving attesting witness to the will, who testified he did not read the will when he attested it and did not know what it contained.

3. Wills \S 111(1), 119, 123(1)—Need not be signed or witnessed on every sheet.

Where a will is written on more than one sheet of paper, it is not necessary that the testator sign each sheet, nor that the attesting witnesses sign each sheet or acquaint themselves with the contents of the will before signing it, though it is the better practice to have each sheet signed.

4. Wills \S 303(6)—Testimony of surviving witness as corroborated held to show paper was will as written.

Testimony by the sole surviving witness to a will as to its execution, with denial by the executor that he had substituted the first page of the will, and other evidence as to the making of the will and testator's declarations as to disposition of his property, of which the executor received only one-tenth, held to show beyond doubt that the paper introduced as the will of testator was the will as actually written by him.

5. Wills \S 166(12)—Evidence held not to support finding of undue influence.

In proceedings to contest a will, evidence that the testator had been taken to the home of one of the devisees while he was sick, and that, under the physician's orders, he had been denied visitors, together with the circumstances of the execution of the will and the fact that other relatives received the same share in the estate as those with whom testator was living, held not to sustain a verdict finding undue influence.

6. Wills \S 155(1)—Undue influence must overcome the will of testator.

Undue influence which is a ground for setting aside a will must be sufficient to destroy the free agency of the testator, and amount to coercion.

7. Wills \S 166(12), 302(2)—Forgery, undue influence, and fraud cannot be inferred from circumstances consistent with innocence.

Forgery, undue influence, and fraud in obtaining the testator's signature to a different instrument from that which he intended to sign are offenses too grave to be inferred from circumstances capable of innocent construction.

8. Wills \S 166(11), 305—Declarations of testator before making will of little weight on undue influence and forgery.

Declarations by testator before he made his will to the effect that the law made a better will than he could are of little weight in determining the issue of undue influence in procuring a will which the contestants admitted was made, but which they claimed was procured by undue influence or had the first page thereof substituted.

Appeal from Circuit Court Rappahannock County.

Suit to contest a will by R. Alvin Dearing and others against J. A. Dearing and others. Decree establishing the will, and contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Volney E. Howard and H. C. Featherston, both of Lynchburg, and Chas. H. Keyser, of Washington, Va., for plaintiffs in error.

Aubrey G. Weaver, of Front Royal, for defendants in error.

WEST, J. This suit involves a contest over the will of Alfred Willis Dearing, who died in Rappahannock county, Va., on September 9, 1916, in his eighty-ninth year, unmarried and without issue, leaving an estate valued at more than a half million dollars.

His heirs at law are the contestants, R. Alvin Dearing, William A. Dearing, and Janie E. Dearing, nephews and niece, and Robert Scott Dearing, a grandnephew, and his five nephews and five nieces, to wit, Eugenia Dearing, Alice Dearing, Eva Calloway, and John Dearing, of Georgia, Alfred E. Dearing, of Tennessee, Eugenia Cox, of Amherst, Va., J. A. Dearing, of Shenandoah Junction, W. Va., and W. G. Dearing, Eastham Dearing, and Annie M. Dearing, of Rappahannock county, Va., the last ten of whom are named as sole devisees in the will.

On September 11, 1916, J. Alfred Dearing, a nephew and the executor named in the will, produced the same in Rappahannock circuit court, and, being proved by the testimony of Miss P. M. Dearing, one of the subscribing witnesses thereto, who also proved the due attestation of said will by J. C. Walter, the other subscribing witness thereto (the said J. C. Walter being unable to attend court and testify on account of sickness), the said paper writing was ordered to be recorded as and for the last will and testament of the said A. W. Dearing, deceased; and the said J. Alfred Dearing qualified as executor and took possession of the estate.

Subsequently the contestants instituted a suit in chancery attacking the validity of this will, and an issue devisavit vel non was directed therein, in which the defendants in the chancery suit were made plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs therein (the contestants) were made defendants. There were three trials of this issue before three separate juries. Each of the first two trials resulted in a hung jury, and on the third trial the plaintiffs (the propounders of the will) demurred to the evidence, and the jury found against the will, subject to the decision of the court on the demurrer to the evidence. The court sustained the demurrer to the evidence and entered judgment accordingly, and also entered a decree establishing said paper writing as the last true will and testament of the said A. W. Dearing; and this is the judgment and decree complained of.

On the trial of the issue of devisavit vel non, the contestants filed the following grounds of defense:

(1) They deny that the typewritten instrument, bearing date on May 29, 1916, signed with the name of A. W. Dearing and admitted to probate in the circuit court of Rappahannock county on September 11, 1916, is the true last will and testament of the said A. W. Dearing, and they require strict proof thereof.

(2) The said alleged will was not properly and legally executed and attested.

(3) The said alleged will was procured by fraud and undue influence on the part of J. A. Dearing, named in said instrument as executor, aided by members of the household wherein the said A. W. Dearing died.

[1] The evidence will be considered under the rule applicable to a demurrer to the evidence, this rule being that, if the evidence be such that a jury might have found a verdict for the demurree, the court must give judgment in his favor. Burks' Pl. & Pr. p. 495, § 263.

Has the will been proven in the manner prescribed by law?

J. C. Walter, one of the attesting witnesses, testified substantially as follows: That he resided at Huntley and was not related to A. W. Dearing; that he was informed by J. A. Dearing that A. W. Dearing wished to see him in his room; that when he entered the room A. W. Dearing was standing on the floor with the paper in his hand and said, "This is my will and I want you and Cousin Pat (Miss P. M. Dearing) to sign it;" that A. W. Dearing signed the will in the presence of both witnesses, and they signed it as witnesses in his presence, all three being present together at the same time; that testator directed witnesses where to sign, and was of sound mind at the time; that the will was written on two sheets of paper, and that the will shown witness in court was the same paper testator said was his will; that witness did not read the will or know what it contained; that P. M. Dearing, the other subscribing witness, was dead.

[2] While it is generally true that a will cannot be established upon the uncorroborated testimony of a nonattesting witness, yet in the instant case, the will having been proven by one of the attesting witnesses, the testimony of J. Alfred Dearing in denial of the charge that he had supplied the first sheet of the will, after it was signed by the testator, should be considered in corroboration of the testimony of such attesting witness, and in determining the genuineness of the will.

The circuit court had before it the will, the same being also filed with the record here, which is written upon two sheets of paper fastened together by two clamps, a small one made of thin brass and the other of steel. The uncontradicted evidence of J. A. Dearing is that the latter was put on by Mr. Weaver in the office of Downing & Weaver at the time the will was sent to them for inspection, that the first sheet was attached to the second when the testator signed the will, and that the will was afterwards returned to the testator and remained in his possession for several weeks.

[3] While it is the better practice where a will is written on more than one sheet of paper to have the testator sign each sheet, yet this is not necessary to the validity of the will. Nor does the law require attesting witnesses to sign each sheet or acquaint themselves with the contents of a will before signing the same.

[4] The testimony of the witness Walter bears the impress of truth, and, when considered with the other facts shown in evidence, as above stated, and with the record of the probating of the will before the circuit court, upon the testimony of Miss P. M. Dearing, the other subscribing witness, leaves no room for doubt that the paper writing shown the witness is, in all respects, the paper writing signed by the testator and by said Walter and P. M. Dearing as attesting witnesses, and that the proponents, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, were entitled to have the said writing admitted to record as and for the last true will and testament of A. W. Dearing, deceased.

In Palmer v. Owen, 229 Ill. 115, 82 N. E. 275, it is said that it is well established that a will may be made up of several sheets of paper, and they need not be fastened together. Wikoff's Appeals, 15 Pa. 291, 53 Am. Dec. 597; Barnewall v. Murrell, 108 Ala. 366, 18 South. 831; Ela v. Edwards, 16 Gray (Mass.) 91; Harp v. Parr, 168 Ill. 469, 48 N. E. 113.

In Young v. Barner, 27 Grat. (68 Va.) at page 106, this court said:

"If the witnesses to the will are dead, or if there is a failure of recollection on their part, the court will often presume (the will being in other respects regular) that the requirements of the statute have been complied with in the formal execution of the instrument. Such presumptions are absolutely essential to the protection of property and the security of titles. Were it otherwise, the most important and solemn instruments would often fail to take effect by the death, or from the mere failure of attesting witnesses—real or assumed—to recall each and every formality presented for the execution of testamentary papers."

In Palmer v. Owen, supra, it is also said:

"Counsel for appellants say the sheets upon which the will was written were not all uniform in texture and finish, and from these circumstances, and the further fact that the witnesses to the will were unable to identify every sheet of it as being the same paper the testator signed and they witnessed as his will, it is contended probate should have been denied, because they say the proof does not show that the instrument sought to be probated is the whole instrument acknowledged and executed by the testator as his will. It is true, as counsel contend, that it is possible, where a will is written on separate sheets of paper, loosely fastened together, that one or more sheets might be removed and others substituted, but the possibility of this being done is not sufficient to justify denying the admission of a will to probate. It is not necessary to the validity of a will that it should be all written on one sheet of paper. All that is required is that the whole will shall be in the presence of the witnesses when attested by them. Harp v. Parr, 168 Ill. 459 [48 N. E. 113]. Neither is it required that the witnesses to a will should read it or examine it with such care as to be able, upon an application to admit it to probate, to say that all the pages or clauses of the proposed will were the pages and clauses signed by the testator and attested by them."

In Page on Wills, at section 372, the author says:

"In view of the principles already laid down, it is evident that the forgetfulness of the accessible subscribing witness, as to certain necessary facts of execution, does not avoid a prima facie case made out by proof of the genuineness of the signature of the testator and the subscribing witnesses. So, where the subscribing witnesses identify their signatures, but have no recollection of having attested the instrument, or the circumstances of execution, the presumption that it was properly executed will uphold it in the absence of clear and satisfactory proof to the contrary."

In 40 Cyc. 1093, it is said:

"A will need not be written entirely on one sheet of paper, but may be written on several sheets, provided that the sheets are so connected together that they may be identified as parts of the same will. Connection by the meaning and coherence of the subject-matter is sufficient, as physical attachment by mechanical, chemical, or other means, is not required, although sufficient when made."

[5] The proponents having made out a prima facie case, the contestants seek to defeat the will by proving it was procured by fraud and undue influence. They offer no direct evidence, but rely solely upon circumstances, inferences, and presumptions. Among the circumstances on which they rely may be mentioned the following:

(a) That the testator was taken to Huntley and denied visitors.

A. W. Dearing was never married and lived alone in Rappahannock county, and the Huntley home was the only other Dearing home in the county. When he was taken with his final illness, his friend, Joseph Reid, advised him to go to Huntley, and he finally consented and went.

His attending physician, Dr. Kipps, gave instructions to keep him quiet and not allow him to have company and says he is responsible for the action of the nurse in refusing admittance to visitors. While these instructions were in force several of his friends called, but were not permitted to see him. Later, when his condition was improved, several of them were allowed to see him. There was nothing unusual in the course pursued by the attending physician in his case.

(b) That the will was privately executed and witnessed by members of the Huntley household.

A. W. Dearing had accumulated a very large estate, and, like most successful business men, preferred to keep his business, as far as possible, from the public, and executed his will in the presence of a few friends, as most people do. When it was suggested that one Mattox be called to witness his will, he objected, stating that he did not want the impression to get out that he was about to die. It is a tribute to the honesty and integrity of the members of the household at Huntley, against whom the charge of fraud has been hurled by the contestants, that not one of them will receive, under the terms of the will, one dollar more than their cousins in Georgia. In fact, the heirs of John Dearing residing in Georgia and Tennessee receive exactly one-half of the entire estate, while J. A. Dearing and his two sisters receive less than one-third.

(c) That no lawyer wrote the will, or was consulted about it, and that J. A. Dearing was the draftsman, beneficiary, and executor.

Comparatively few people employ lawyers to write their wills, and it is not surprising that a man of A. W. Dearing's business sagacity and disposition to economize should have pursued this course. He did, however, after it was executed, submit the will to Downing & Weaver for their approval.

John H. Jennings, a disinterested witness, testified that he had known the testator for a long time and had transacted much business with him; that in 1915 he spent the night in his home, and something was said about Downing & Weaver, and the witness said, "I reckon they will settle up your estate after you are gone; they know a good deal about your business," and he said, "No; there is a man who knows a good deal more about it than they do," and he said it was his nephew, and witness asked which one, and he said, "The one that was at Shenandoah Junction, that gentleman over there at your right."

John M. Johnson, who has no interest in this suit, testified that Mr. Dearing was an old friend of his and spent the night at his home about two years before his death, as he often did, and he got to quizzing him as to who would be his administrator, and said to him, "Mr. Downing and Mr. Weaver will administer your estate," and he said, "No; I think there is brains enough in the Dearing family to administer it," and indicated that he preferred Mr. Alfred Dearing, on account of his health, as he was delicate and was competent.

It is true that J. Alfred Dearing is a beneficiary under the will, but if, as charged by the contestants, he has perpetrated a fraud on his testator by supplying the first sheet of paper constituting the will, after it was signed by the testator, it seems strange indeed that he did not make a larger provision for himself and sisters instead of providing that they receive one-tenth each, the same received by each of the other devisees. The contestants admit the genuineness of the second sheet, and it is on this that he is named as executor. It is unbelievable that a man would commit a forgery when no advantage could thereby accrue to him, or his people.

The case of Coffin v. Coffin, 23 N. Y. 9, 80

Am. Dec. 235, is parallel with the case at bar. At page 13 of 23 N. Y., at page 238 of 30 Am. Dec., the court says:

"The circumstance that the nephew who prepared the will was appointed one of the executors and is also a legatee has been urged upon our consideration. Facts of this kind may, and do often, very justly excite the suspicion of courts, when fraud and undue influence are alleged. But it is not a rule or principle in the law of testaments that the draftsman of a will cannot be an executor, or cannot take a benefit under it. As men quite generally appoint some of their kindred to be their executors, the choice in the instance before us does not seem to be an unnatural one. Indeed, there would be some difficulty in suggesting a different choice, in the actual circumstances and relations of the testator. * * * In respect to the legacy or portion given to A. H. Coffin, the draftsman of this will, we find it so moderate in amount, and in such just proportion to the sums given to the nine other persons standing in the same relation to the testator, as to afford no ground for invalidating the instrument or any part of it. As I have observed, there is no rule of law which prevents a person who prepares a will from taking a legacy under it. In the language of Baron Parke, in Butlin v. Barry, 1 Curt. Ecc. 637: 'All that can be truly said is that, if a person, whether an attorney or not, prepare a will with a legacy to himself, it is, at most, a suspicious circumstance, of more or less weight according to the facts of each particular case; in some of no weight at all, as in the case suggested, varying according to circumstances; for instance, the quantum of the legacy, the proportion it bears to the property disposed of, and numerous other contingencies.'

The testamentary capacity of the testator being shown by the uncontradicted testimony of a number of witnesses, including three physicians, the inquiry is as to his mental make-up. Was he easily influenced by others? On this point the witnesses, with one accord, testified that he was a man of strong purpose of mind, did his own thinking, and was not easily susceptible to influence from others.

[6] The law as to what constitutes undue influence has been very clearly stated in Wood v. Wood, 109 Va. 470, 63 S. E. 994, where Harrison, J., speaking for this court, says:

"Before undue influence can be made the ground for setting aside a deed or will, it must be sufficient to destroy free agency on the part of the grantor or the testator; it must amount to coercion—practically duress. It must be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the party had no free will, but stood in vinculis; and the burden of proof in such a case, as in a case where fraud is charged, is always on him who charges undue influence."

On the question of undue influence, Schouler on Wills (5th Ed.) § 239, reads as follows:

"As to undue influence in the usual and less offensive sense, the burden of proving affirmatively that it operated upon the will in question lies still on the party who alleges it, either by direct proof or circumstances inconsistent with fair dealing. * * * 'In order to set aside the will of a person of sound mind,' observes Lord Cranworth, 'it is not sufficient to show that the circumstances attending its execution are consistent with the hypothesis of its having been obtained by undue influence; it must be shown that they are inconsistent with a contrary hypothesis.'

"Hence it is that isolated and disconnected circumstances are not permitted to outweigh the usual presumption that a person of intelligence and capacity who executes a will does so without imposition or undue influence. Thus the simple fact that the later will modifies an earlier one in favor of one who drew it up is held insufficient to overcome such a presumption, or generally that the testator's draftsman, or one whose advice was sought by him, was made executor or receives a legacy under the will."

[7] It is accepted as the law in all jurisdictions that forgery, undue influence, and fraud in obtaining the testator's signature to a different instrument from that which he intended to sign are offenses too grave to be lightly inferred from circumstances which are capable of innocent construction.

There was introduced in evidence a paper writing designated as the "pencil will," dated January 14, 1914, written and signed by A. W. Dearing, in pencil, whereby all of his bonds, notes, and evidences of money due him were assigned to A. E. Dearing and J. A. Dearing, trustees, for the purpose of an equal distribution "between my five nieces and my five nephews."

The uncontradicted testimony of J. A. Dearing is to the effect that A. W. Dearing asked him to come to his home, witness thought to look over some bonds. When he arrived A. W. Dearing showed him the pencil written will and said that was the way he wanted his property to go, but he was going to eliminate Alfred E. Dearing as executor, because he had shown himself unfit to handle his own money, and he could not handle his; and testator handed him the pencil will and said, "Put it in type." J. A. Dearing took the pencil will home with him and returned later with the will he had prepared, which is the will dated May 29, 1916, which was signed by the testator. When this will was executed, A. W. Dearing destroyed the pencil paper, handing the fragments to J. A. Dearing rather than throwing them on the floor. The latter advised him not to destroy the pencil paper, as it was his own handwriting and showed his desire in the distribution of his estate. J. A. Dearing kept the fragments, and later pasted them together on another piece of paper. The witness is under the impression that the pencil paper included the real estate, and from an inspection of this paper it appears there is ample vacant space caused by the missing pieces of paper to include the word "lands." This paper shows that it was A. W. Dearing's intention to give all his property to his five nieces and five nephews. And Mrs. Eva Calloway, daughter of John Dearing, deceased, of Athens, Ga., testified that she visited her uncle, A. W. Dearing, in 1908, and he told her that W. A. Dearing, of Amherst, the father of the contestants, was the only one of his relatives who had ever "used profanity towards him," adding that his children would never receive any of his property. Mrs. Calloway also testified that she visited A. W. Dearing about one month before his death, and says:

"He told me he had spent considerable thought upon the disposition of his land; that he at first considered leaving the land to his five nieces and nephews who live in Virginia, and making up—of course, I don't remember his exact words—making up the difference in the value of the land to the Georgia Dearings in money, or giving the value of the land to the Georgia Dearings in money; then he said, 'But I finally decided to divide the land equally between my ten nieces and nephews, and then you can do as you please with it.'"

She also testified that he said to her:

"I have divided my property equally among my ten nieces and nephews; when you go home, tell your brothers and sisters what I have done."

[§] The contestants also rely on certain declarations of the testator made before the date of the will, and many of them several years before, to the effect that the law made a good will or a better will than he could make. Such evidence can have little, if any, weight in the determination of the matters at issue here, as the contestants admit that a will was made, but claim that the first sheet of the will is a forgery.

In the case of Samuel v. Hunter's Ex'r, in which the declarations were made after the will was executed, this court, speaking through Kelly, P., said:

"The authorities are not in accord upon the subject, but we are of opinion that the rule supported by the better reason and authority is that such declarations, standing alone, are not admissible as direct evidence to prove or disprove the genuineness of the will, but that in all cases where its genuineness has been assailed by other proper evidence the declarations are admissible as circumstances, either to strengthen or to weaken the assault, according to their inconsistency or their harmony with the existence or terms of the will. This is the settled rule in England, and it is well supported by authority in this country." Samuel v. Hunter's Ex'r, 122 Va. 636, 95 S. E. 399.

J. Alfred Dearing, the executor, was evidently held in high regard by his uncle, the testator, as the latter frequently sent for him to come to his home and list his notes and bonds, and the uncle's books showed numerous entries in Alfred's handwriting. The selection of this nephew to keep his books and act as executor of his will was but natural, as J. Alfred Dearing was a man of education, a graduate of the V. M. I., at the head of his class, and winner of the Jackson-Hope medal. To his credit, the contestants have failed to produce any evidence which reflects upon his character or his integrity.

A careful examination of the evidence reveals nothing which would warrant a jury in finding that the paper writing bearing date on May 29, 1916, shown in evidence, is not the true last will and testament of A. W. Dearing, deceased.

The judgment of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer to the evidence and its decree establishing said will are plainly right and will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

MELTON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law § 889—Verdict correcting mistake in penalty held invalid as rendered after discharge of jury.

Where the court told the jury after a verdict of guilty of rape that they were discharged, and the jurors thereupon returned to the jury room accompanied by the sheriff to claim attendance fees, but were thereafter recalled by the court upon discovery that the jury had made a mistake in fixing the penalty under Code 1919, § 4414, and again retired and returned another verdict, such other verdict could not support a conviction, having been rendered after discharge.

2. Criminal law § 889—Inadvertent announcement of discharge of jury may be recalled only if jury has not left presence of court.

So long as the whole jury are in the actual and visible presence of the court, and under its control, an inadvertent announcement of their discharge may be recalled as a matter still in the breast of the court, but, after they have left the court's presence, their functions as jurors have ended, and they cannot, either with or without the consent of the court, amend or alter their verdict.

Prentiss, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Campbell County

Ernest Melton was convicted of rape, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Duncan Drysdale and L. Bradford Waters, both of Lynchburg, for plaintiff in error.

John R. Saunders, Atty. Gen., J. D. Hank, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., and Leon M. Bazile, Second Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BURKS, J. [1] The accused (plaintiff in error) was found guilty of rape, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for five years, the minimum time prescribed by the statute. The accused insists that the judgment of conviction is erroneous because the jury were discharged before the verdict was rendered upon which the judgment was entered. The facts upon this question are set forth in bill of exception No. 2 as follows:

"Be it remembered that during the trial of this cause the jury after argument of counsel came into court from the jury room with the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty as charged in the indictment, and ascertain his punishment at three years in the penitentiary—the attorney for the commonwealth not being present at that time. Whereupon the judge said to the jury, 'Gentlemen, you are discharged,' and they, without leaving the courthouse, returned to the jury room accompanied by the sheriff for the purpose of claiming their attendance fees. Almost immediately the judge, having referred to the statute (section 4414), remarked to the attorney for the commonwealth, who had come in court in the meanwhile, that the jury had made a mistake in fixing the penalty; that if they found the accused guilty of rape the minimum punishment was five years confinement in the penitentiary—three years being the minimum punishment for attempt to rape—and at once directed the jury, which had not separated or left the courtroom, except to retire to the jury room as above detailed, to return into court, and, explaining the statute to them, both as to rape and as to an attempt to rape, directed them to retire to their room and render such verdict as they thought proper under the law and the evidence. Whereupon the jury retired, and after some time brought in their verdict in the following words and figures:

"We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty of rape as charged in the within indictment, and fix his punishment at five years' imprisonment in the state penitentiary. [Signed] J. R. Lawson"—to which action of the court in bringing the jury from their room back into the court room, and permitting them to again consider the case and bring in the verdict aforesaid, the accused by counsel excepted, which exception was overruled."

In Mills v. Commonwealth, 7 Leigh (34 Va.) 751, it is said:

"On the trial upon the plea of not guilty, the jury brought in a verdict in these words, 'We of the jury find the prisoner guilty of grand larceny'—which being openly read by the clerk, the court said to the jury, 'Gentlemen, you are discharged;' but it being at the same moment suggested to the court that the jury had not ascertained by their verdict any term of imprisonment in the public jail and penitentiary house, they were called back instantly, and before they had left the courthouse, except one of them, who had gone perhaps the distance of forty or fifty yards from the courthouse, and was accidentally accompanied by a deputy sheriff. The jury being so called back, were again sent out to ascertain the term of imprisonment, which they accordingly ascertained to be two years, the juror who had left the courthouse being with them. The prisoner thereupon moved the court to set aside the verdict and discharge him from further prosecution; but the court overruled the motion, and pronounced judgment upon the verdict; and the prisoner filed a bill of exceptions, setting forth the facts above stated. On the petition of the prisoner, this court awarded a writ of error to the judgment."

The judgment of the court was:

"Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded to the circuit superior court, for a new trial to be had upon the indictment."

This holding is by no means peculiar to this state. In Sargent v. State (1842) 11 Ohio, 472, the judgment of the trial court permitting a jury to be recalled and amend their verdict after they had been discharged was reversed on appeal. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"After the verdict has been received and the jury discharged * * * the control of the jury, and of the court, over such verdict, is at an end. The court cannot alter it, nor can the jury be recalled to alter or amend it. As well might any other twelve men be called to alter it, as the men who were jurors. The office of a juror is discharged upon the acceptance of his verdict by the court. * * *

"Although in modern times the ancient strictness has yielded to a more enlightened reason, yet no rule, tending to insure the impartial administration of justice, and the purity of jurors, has in the slightest degree been abandoned or impaired. * * * But in no case can it be permitted to recall a jury, to alter or amend their verdict after it has been received and the jury discharged. This would jeopardize the jealous guards with which the law has surrounded jurors, to insure the pure administration of justice, and to protect the citizen."

In People v. Lee Yune Chong (1892) 94 Cal. 379, 29 Pac. 776, the jury, after rendering their verdict, were discharged for the term and left the courtroom. Most of them went downstairs to the clerk's office to get warrants for their pay as jurors. Several, by mistake, went to the sheriff's office on the floor below. Some of them had conversations about the case with outsiders. The first verdict was:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and fix the penalty at imprisonment for life."

This was deemed informal because it did not find the degree of the crime, and the jury was recalled and informed that they must find the degree of the crime, whereupon they retired to their room and subsequently brought in their verdict:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and fix the penalty imprisonment for life."

"The exact time which elapsed from the discharge of the jury until their return does not appear, one of the witnesses putting it from five to ten minutes; but it is clear that during that time they were beyond the control of the court, had thrown off their characters as jurors, and had mingled with their fellow citizens, free from any official obligation."

The judgment of the trial court was reversed, and a new trial ordered. The court distinguishes the cases from People v. Jenkins, 56 Cal. 7, where the jury had not dispersed, and, while admitting that questions difficult of solution might arise under peculiar circumstances, and referring to the right of the jury to correct formal defects in their verdict, quotes from the last-mentioned case the following language:

"For that purpose the court can, at any time while the jury are before it, and under its control, see that it is amended in form so as to meet the requirements of the law."

While the jury are in the actual presence of the court, and under its control, it can see, without resort to testimony, that the fountain of justice has been kept pure, and that no harm could have come to the accused. Beyond this we are unwilling to go.

In keeping with this doctrine is Levell's v. State (1877) 32 Ark. 585, where the verdict of the jury and the action of the court thereon appear from the following extract from the opinion:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree. S. Wiggins, Foreman." Which was read by the clerk, and the jury, upon the request of the defendant, was polled, and each juror answered that that was his verdict. The judge then said to the jury: 'Gentlemen, you are discharged; those of you who are of the regular panel, until this afternoon; those specially summoned in this case, are discharged finally,' when the jurors arose from their seats in the jury box, and began to pass out from the box, three or four at the further end of the box had moved eight or ten feet from their seats, the others still standing about where they arose, and all in full view of the judge and under his control, when he called to them, saying: 'One moment, gentlemen, take your seats in the jury box again,' and they, without having mingled with the bystanders, immediately returned to their seats, and the judge addressing them, said 'This verdict may be defective; there are two counts in the indictment, you will retire to the jury room and so amend your verdict as to show upon which of the counts you find.'

"The jury again retired and afterwards returned the verdict as follows: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree as charged in the first count in the indictment. S. Wiggins, Foreman,' and they were again polled at the request of the defendant, and each answered that that was his verdict.

"The defendant objected to the jury being sent back, and to any change in the verdict originally returned.

"The authorities say, that after the verdict has been received and the jury discharged, their control over the verdict is at an end, and they cannot be recalled to alter or amend it. Sargent v. The State of Ohio, 11 Ohio, 472; Mills v. Commonwealth, 7 Leigh [34 Va.] 751; Settle v. Allison, 8 Ga. 208.

"But what is a discharge? Clearly it would seem to us that, if they had not separated, and as a body are still in the presence of the court, the order discharging is in fieri, and yet in the breast of the court, and may be recalled. To correct a mistake when no prejudice can result from it, is not only proper, but the duty of the court. Brister v. The State, 26 Ala. 132."

In Cook v. State (1877) 60 Ala. 39, 31 Am. Rep. 31, the jury in a felony case, rendered their verdict in the absence of the prisoner and were discharged. Two of them had left the courtroom, all of the others remaining therein, when the court discovered that the defendant was not present and within five minutes had that jury called together again. The two jurors who had left the courtroom were sworn and stated on oath that they had had no conversation with any one in regard to the case. The defendant was then brought into court, and the court handed the indictment to the jury and asked them if that was their verdict and they replied that it was. Counsel for the defendant were in court when the first verdict was brought in, but did not object to its being received until after the jury was first discharged. The judgment of the trial court was reversed on appeal, the court saying, amongst other things:

"It seems to have been supposed, that if there was error in receiving the verdict under the circumstances, it was not beyond correction; and therefore the persons of whom the jury was composed, were reassembled about five minutes after they had been discharged; and two of them having been out of the courtroom, they were sworn, and under oath declared that they had not conversed with any one in regard to the case. But, if the jury could then be reconstituted, to render a verdict which was the result of former deliberations, why should not the other ten jurors have been also examined under oath, as their companions were? They also could have communicated about the case with persons in the courthouse, during the same five minutes after they were discharged; and it was quite as necessary that they should have been purged on this subject, as that the two should be. We think there was no virtue in such an interrogation of any of them. * * *

"We are of opinion that our rulings on this subject should not be extended further in that direction. The jury, in the present case, were discharged, and had dispersed among the audience in the courthouse and persons outside. It would be a dangerous precedent, to hold that, after this, the persons who composed that jury could be reassembled as such to render a verdict in a case of which they had been thus discharged."

See, also, State v. Dawkins, 32 S. C. 17, 10 S. E. 772; Ellis v. State, 27 Tex. App. 190, 11 S. W. 111; note, 23 L. R. A. 733-734.

We do not find anything to the contrary in the cases cited for the commonwealth.

In Cunningham v. State, 14 Ala. App. 1, 69 South. 982, cited for the commonwealth, although the jury was recalled after discharge the error sought to be corrected was "immaterial, and could have in no way affected the rights of the defendant," and, further:

"It appears that the jury, although discharged, was called back by the court for the purpose of completing the verdict before leaving the courtroom."

In Taggart v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky. 305, 46 S. W. 675:

"When the jury first returned their verdict, it read as follows: 'We, the jury, find Dan Taggart guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and fix his punishment by confinement for seven years in the punishment. T. W. Hardy, Foreman.' The clerk read the word 'punishment' at the end of the verdict as if written 'penitentiary,' and the jury was discharged, taking their seats in the courtroom, except one, who stepped into a water-closet attached to the courtroom. The clerk then called the court's attention to the mistake, and the members of the jury were called up, and the word 'punishment' was changed to what the foreman said he intended it to be, namely, the word 'penitentiary.' The verdict was then reread, and the jury polled. We perceive no error in this. The context clearly showed that by the word 'punishment' was meant the word 'penitentiary,' and the immediate correction could not in any conceivable way have prejudiced the rights of the appellant. The instruction clearly embraced the law of the case. The judgment is affirmed."

In Denham v. Commonwealth, 119 Ky. 508, 84 S. W. 538, it was insisted that the jury had been discharged and were thereafter recalled to amend their verdict. The court found, as a matter of fact, that the jury never had been discharged, and that the amendment sought to be made was immaterial, and said in this connection:

"But if the jury had been discharged as charged by counsel for appellant, even then as they had not left the presence of the court before being recalled and directed to retire to their room for the purpose of returning the second verdict, no injury could have resulted to appellant's rights."

[2] When the jury left the courtroom and went into the jury room they were no longer subject to the usual charge to juries who are allowed to separate pending the trial, that they should not converse with others about the case nor permit others to converse with them about it, nor was the sheriff in charge of them or under any obligation not to converse with them on the subject. So far as this subject is concerned, the relation of the sheriff and the jury to each other was that of third persons. Furthermore, it does not appear from the record who else was in the jury room, or what, if any, conversation the jury had with the sheriff or any other person on the subject of the trial. The record is simply silent on the subject. But this is not material. It is sufficient that the jury had left the presence of the court, and no evidence of what transpired thereafter was admissible. So long as the whole jury are in the actual and visible presence of the court, and under its control, an inadvertent announcement of their discharge may be recalled as a matter still in the breast of the court, but not thereafter. When the court announces their discharge, and they leave the presence of the court, their functions as jurors have ended, and neither with nor without the consent of the court can they amend or alter their verdict. The sanctity of jury trials cannot be thus subjected to the hazard of suspicion.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to pass upon the assignment of error that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. The judgment of the trial court will be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Reversed.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

PRENTIS, J. I dissent from the conclusion of the majority of the court because I think, under the circumstances of this case, that the correction of the verdict was merely the correction of a clerical error of the jury, made inadvertently, in violation of the instruction of the court and the statute which in terms fixes the minimum punishment for the crime of which, before their discharge, the prisoner had been found guilty, and that the cases of Cunningham v. State, 14 Ala. App. 1, 69 South. 982, and Taggart v. Commonwealth, 104 Ky. 305, 46 S. W. 674, cited in the majority opinion, state the correct rule which should be applied to this case.

(122 Va. 281)

MOTLEY v. H. VICELLO & BRO. et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)1. Courts ⇐99(1)—Decrees establishing lien held not res adjudicata of validity thereof on petition for rehearing by other lien creditors.

A decree annulling a deed of trust establishing a lien on the land and referring the cause to a commissioner to report liens thereon, with their priorities, etc., and a decree confirming the report and directing the sale of the land, were not res adjudicata of the validity of such lien as against other lien creditors on a petition for rehearing, on the ground that the lis pendens memorandum was invalid on its face, whether or not petitioners were parties to the proceeding when the decrees were entered, though there was no affidavit in support of the petition, and one of the decrees confirmed a commissioner's report, to which there was no exception at the time; the error being apparent from the record and the decrees merely interlocutory.

2. Lis pendens ⇐17—Description of land in lis pendens memorandum held insufficient.

While the maxim that that is certain which can be made certain is applicable to a description of land in a lis pendens, as well as a pleading or deed, a creditor's lien under Code 1904, § 2460, on property conveyed by a void deed of trust executed by the debtor, was invalid as against other lien creditors, where lis pendens memorandum misstated the surname of the grantor in the deed and described the land only by reference to that "mentioned" in the suit, the petition in which was not filed until afterward, and contained the same defects; the sufficiency of the description in the memorandum being tested as of the time it was left with the clerk to be recorded, from which time the lien dates.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⇐324—Creditor's lien, though invalid as against other lien creditors, may be enforced against debtor from surplus from sale of land after satisfaction of other liens.

A creditor, whose lien on land conveyed to another by a void deed of trust executed by his debtor is invalid as against other lien creditors by reason of the insufficiency of the description of the land in his lis pendens memorandum, may nevertheless enforce his lien against the landowner from the surplus of the proceeds of the sale of the land after satisfaction of the other creditors' liens and payment of costs of suit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pittsylvania County.

Suit by H. Vicello & Bro. and others against J. J. Motley. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

This cause involves a controversy between the appellant, Motley, claiming to be a lien creditor, and Vicello & Bro. and others, appellees, who are lien creditors of one Mrs. Minnie L. Reynolds. The controversy is over the questions of whether the appellant has ever acquired any lien upon a certain tract of land belonging to Mrs. Reynolds, and, if so, whether such lien has priority over the undisputed liens of the appellees upon such land.

The original suit was instituted on February 15, 1916, by certain parties composing a partnership of the firm name and style of Barker & Terry, creditors of the said Mrs. Reynolds, under section 2460 of the Code of 1887 as amended (Code 1904, § 2460), the object of which was to set aside a certain alleged fraudulent deed of trust theretofore executed by said Mrs. Reynolds and her husband, which conveyed the said land in trust to secure a certain debt of $2,000, as stated in the deed of trust, to their son, O. H. Reynolds. The said Mrs. Reynolds and others were made parties to such suit, and Mrs. Reynolds was duly served with process, but has never made any appearance or defense in the cause to the original bill or to any other proceedings therein.

On the same day that the original suit was instituted, February 15, 1916, the plaintiffs therein, Barker & Terry, by their attorney, executed, acknowledged for recordation, and recorded in the clerk's office a lis pendens, setting forth the title of the cause and the other matters concerning the same required by the said statute. The bill in this suit, however, was not filed until March 6, 1916.

On February 24, 1916, the appellant, Motley, filed in the clerk's office his petition, under the statute aforesaid, which petition is in the following words and figures:

"To His Honor, E. J. Harvey, Judge of Pittsylvania Circuit Court:

"The petition of J. J. Motley respectfully shows unto your honor that there is pending in your honor's court a certain suit under style of Barker & Terry against Minnie L. Edwards, J. H. Reynolds, Otis H. Reynolds, and R. C. Blackford, trustee, which has for its object the setting aside and vacating a deed dated — day of —, 1916, from Minnie L. Edwards & J. H. Edwards, conveying to R. C. Blackford, trustee, a tract of 40 acres of land, in Pittsylvania county, Va., to secure to O. H. Reynolds the sum of $2,000.00, as will be seen by the papers in said cause; the basis of said suit to vacate said deed is fraud and intention to defraud creditors of said grantors. Petitioner further shows that the said Minnie L. & J. H. Reynolds owe him $750.00, by notes of several years' standing, as will appear from said notes herewith filed, and he asks to be permitted to file this petition in said suit, to participate therein, and to have said deed set aside as to his debts; also, may the said Minnie L. Reynolds, J. H. Reynolds, O. H. Reynolds, and R. C. Blackford, trustee, be required to answer this petition, but not on oath, may said deed be set aside, and may your petitioner's debts be decreed to be paid, etc. Grant process," etc.

On the same day, February 24, 1916, Motley, by his attorney, executed the following memorandum, not acknowledged for record, and left it with the clerk to be recorded as a lis pendens under said statute, and the clerk, at 12:15 p. m. on that day, spread the same on record, as per the clerk's certificate at the foot of it.

"Barker & Terry v. Minnie L. Reynolds, etc.

"Circuit Court of Pittsylvania County.

"Lis Pendens.

"J. J. Motley has filed a petition in this suit which is pending in Pittsylvania Circuit court, under the style of Barker & Terry v. Minnie L. Reynolds, etc., to be made a party to said suit and to unite in setting aside the deed mentioned in said suit from Minnie L. Edwards, etc., to R. C. Blackford, trustee, securing to O. H. Reynolds $2,000.00 and to subject the 40 acres therein mentioned to payment of $750.00 due petitioner.

J. J. Motley,

"By James L. Tredway, His Atty.

"Virginia: In the clerk's office of the circuit court for the county of Pittsylvania, at the courthouse thereof, on the 24th day of February, 1916, at 12:15 o'clock p. m., the foregoing writing was admitted to record.

"Teste: S. S. Hurt, Clerk."

Some time during this same day, whether before or after 12:15 p. m. does not clearly appear from the record, the testimony being in conflict on that point, the alleged fraudulent deed of trust above mentioned in favor of O. H. Reynolds was marked satisfied, and was duly released of record, by entry on the margin of the deed book in which it was recorded, etc.

On March 28, 1916, at term, the court below entered a decree which recited, among other things, that the cause came on that day to be heard "on * * * the petition of J. J. Motley, filed in the clerk's office on the 24th day of February, 1916, according to law in such cases provided, taken also for confessed as to all the defendants named therein, they still failing to appear, plead, answer, or demur, * * * the lis pendens of the petitioner, J. J. Motley, filed in said clerk's office according to law on the 24th day of February, 1916," and thereupon set aside and annulled the said deed of trust and the debt thereby sought to be secured in favor of O. H. Reynolds as fraudulent, and, among other things decreed "that the debt of J. J. Motley, petitioner in this cause, against the defendants Minnie L. Reynolds and J. H. Reynolds for $750, with interest from 24th February, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, established as a lien on said 40-acre tract of land, as of the 24th day of February, 1916, the time of the filing of the lis pendens of said petitioner according to law; * * *" and the decree referred the cause to one of the commissioners in chancery of the court to take, state, and report accounts of the real estate owned by the said Mrs. Reynolds, the liens thereon, with their priorities, etc.

On June 23, 1916, one of the commissioners in chancery of the court filed his report, under said decree, of the said 40-acre tract of land, as owned by Mrs. Reynolds, and of liens thereon amounting to $3,331.41 as of that date, in nine different classes as to priorities, embracing the debts of Mrs. Reynolds to the appellant and appellees, and a number of her other debts to other parties, placing the debt to appellant, however, in the third class, and the debts to appellees in subsequent classes, thus giving the debt to appellant priority of lien over those to appellees.

The liens of some of the debts to appellees were obtained by means of a deed of trust duly executed by Mrs. Reynolds and husband, conveying the said land, dated March 1, 1916, duly recorded on March 2, 1916; and the liens of the other debts of appellees consist of those to Gammon & Co. and M. R. Reynolds, which were acquired by judgments against Mrs. Reynolds, obtained and docketed, respectively, on March 2 and 6, 1916. All of such liens appeared of record in the clerk's office at the time said commissioner's report was stated, and were reported by the commissioner solely from the evidence with respect to them disclosed by such record. None of appellees were then parties of said cause, and none of them appeared before the commissioner, or requested him to report their debts.

Concerning the parties to whom the commissioner gave notice of the taking of the accounts, the nonappearance of any one before him, and the evidence on which he reported all of the debts stated in his report, the commissioner in his report says this:

"* * * He issued notice to all parties concerned of the time and place at which said accounts would be taken and stated * * * which notice was duly executed on said parties, as will be seen from the same, which are herewith returned, that * * * none of the parties in interest appeared before the said commissioner in obedience to said notice, for which reason the accounts were kept open from day to day until the date of this report, when, from such evidence as was disclosed by the records of the clerk's office * * * the foregoing accounts were made up and completed."

The commissioner's notice does not appear in the record before the appellate court.

On July 19, 1916, at term, the court below entered a decree, reciting that the "cause came on this day to be heard on the papers formerly read, the report of [the commissioner in chancery aforesaid] to which there is no exception," and the decree confirmed the report, directed the sale of the said land, "unless the liens herein are paid in 10 days," appointed special commissioners to make the sale, fixed the terms of sale, etc.

On March 28, 1917, the appellees filed their petition in the cause, at term, in which they asserted their aforesaid debts as liens upon the said land; alleged that "no process was ever issued or served on [the] defendants" named in the aforesaid petition of appellant, Motley, to wit, the said Mrs. Reynolds and the other defendants named in such petition; that appellees had never been made parties to the cause up to that time; and took the positions that the aforesaid decrees of March 28, 1916, and July 19, 1916, were absolutely void, in so far as they undertook to establish the debt of appellant, Motley, as a lien upon the said land, because no process had ever been issued upon the aforesaid petition of Motley against the owner of the land, Mrs. Reynolds, or served upon her, and hence the court had no jurisdiction to enter such decrees so establishing such debt; and also that as the liens of appellees were acquired, recorded, and docketed as aforesaid, all prior to March 6, 1916, except that of M. R. Reynolds, which was acquired and docketed on March 6, 1916, as aforesaid, and thus became fixed liens of record upon said land on or before the last-named date, the lien of appellant, if any he has, was invalid as against appellees, as lien creditors, for the reason that no lis pendens was left by appellant with the clerk setting out the matters required by section 2460 of the Code of 1887 as amended (section 2460, Code 1904), and also for the reason that the memorandum was not acknowledged for record so as to have been recorded in contemplation of law. The petition of appellees further alleged that appellees "had no notice or knowledge" of the said commissioner's report or its contents, or of the decrees last named, "until long after the decree of July 19, 1916, was entered," and prays that:

"So much of said decree of the March term, 1916, * * * as establishes said claim of said Motley as a lien upon said 40 acres of land, and rendering him a judgment for $750, be corrected, set aside, and annulled, and that so much of the decree of July term, 1916, * * * as confirms the report of [the said commissioner in chancery] in toto be corrected and modified by eliminating so much of said report as reports the aforesaid claim of said Motley as a judgment and a lien upon said 40 acres of land" —and Motley is made party defendant to such petition.

It appears from a decree entered in the cause on the last-named date, March 28, 1917, that process was directed to be issued on the petition of appellees against the appellant, and that the special commissioner that day reported a sale of the land on the terms of all cash, which had been paid, which report was confirmed by said decree, and that the first and second class liens aforesaid were directed to be paid out of the proceeds of sale, and the residue of the money was directed to be deposited in bank subject to the further order of court. What amount the land sold for does not appear from this decree, or otherwise in the record. The special commissioner's report is not embraced in the record.

The appellant, Motley, on March 29, 1918, demurred to the petition of appellees on the single ground that the matters and things therein set forth were res adjudicata; and at the same time the appellant filed his answer to such petition. In this answer the appellant does not deny the allegation of the petition of appellees that process never issued against nor was ever served upon Mrs. Reynolds, party defendant to the aforesaid petition of appellant. The answer does allege, however, that appellees "were parties to said suit, and had knowledge of the pendency thereof, and filed their claims before" the said commissioner in chancery, and thus "had their day in court."

The only testimony which appears in the record consists of certain depositions of witnesses on the subject of whether the memorandum relied on by appellant as a lis pendens was left with the clerk for record before or after the alleged fraudulent deed was released of record. There is no certificate that this and the portions of the record above referred to constituted all the evidence in the case.

On August 28, 1918, the decree appealed from was entered. That decree provides that—

"So much of the said decree of the March term, 1916, * * * as takes for confessed the petition of J. J. Motley * * * filed in the clerk's office * * * on the 24th day of February, 1916, be and the same is hereby set aside, vacated, and annulled; it appearing that no process to answer the said petition * * * was ever served on the defendants Minnie L. Reynolds and J. H. Reynolds."

And such decree further provides that so much of the decree of the March term, 1916, "as establishes as a lien on the 40 acres of land owned by Minnie L. Reynolds the debt of J. J. Motley, * * * set forth in his petition, be vacated, set aside, and annulled, and the said decree be corrected to that extent, the judge of this court being of opinion that the so-called lis pendens of said J. J. Motley was never perfected, acknowledged, or recorded, as the law requires, and doth decide the same to be defective, invalid, and of no effect as a lien upon the real estate of the defendant Minnie L. Reynolds."

The decree appealed from further provides that the decree of the July term, 1916, is found to be erroneous, and "is corrected and annulled so far as it confirms said report in respect to treating the said debt of * * * J. J. Motley as a judgment or lien, * * * the judge of this court being of opinion and doth decide that there has been no valid judgment lien or decree in favor of said Motley as against said Minnie L. Reynolds, * * * the said commissioner in chancery is directed to remodel and restate his report in accordance with such decree; and the petition of appellant is dismissed.

S. A. Anderson, of Richmond, and Jas. L. Tredway, of Chatham, for plaintiff in error.
Geo. T. Rison, and William Smith, both of Chatham, for defendants in error.

SIMS, J., after making the foregoing statement, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The correctness of the decree of August 28, 1918, under review, in so far as it holds the alleged lien of the appellant to be invalid as against appellees, constituting other lien creditors of the debtor, depends, primarily, upon whether the memorandum relied on by appellant is valid as a lis pendens under the provisions of section 2460 of the Code of 1887 as amended by Acts of 1893-4, p. 614. That statute was in force when the proceeding under review occurred. It is somewhat different from the present statute law on the subject. The statute first above referred to appears in the Code of 1904, § 2460, and, so far as material, is as follows:

"A creditor before obtaining a judgment or decree for his claim may, * * * institute any suit which he might institute after obtaining such judgment or decree to avoid a gift, conveyance * * * or charge upon the estate of his debtor declared void by either of the two preceding sections, and he may in such suit have all the relief in respect to said estate which he would be entitled to after obtaining a judgment or decree for the claim which he may be entitled to recover. A creditor availing himself of this section shall have a lien from the time of bringing his suit on all the estate, real and personal, hereinbefore mentioned, and a petitioning creditor shall be entitled to a like lien from the time of filing his petition in the court or in the clerk's office of the court in which the suit is brought; but such lien shall not be valid against creditors * * * until and except from the time a memorandum setting forth the title of the cause, the general object thereof, the court wherein it is pending, the amount of the claim asserted by the complainant, a description of the property, and the name of the person whose estate is intended to be affected thereby shall be left with the clerk of the court of the county or corporation wherein the property is, who shall forthwith record the said memorandum in the Deed Book and index the same in the name of the person aforesaid. * * *

With this preface, we will proceed to deal with the questions presented by the assignments of error in their order as stated below.

[1] 1. Was the validity of the alleged lien of the appellant, Motley, a matter which was so determined by the decrees of March, 1916, and July, 1916, that it falls within the doctrine of res adjudicata, so that the court could not afterwards consider the question of the invalidity of the lien as against other lien creditors, to wit, the appellees, upon the filing of the petition by the latter on March 28, 1917, setting up alleged error of law in the holding of such decrees apparent from the record, in that such decrees undertook to establish the validity of such lien as against the appellees upon a so-called lis pendens, which, as it is alleged in substance in such petition, is invalid on its face in certain particulars?

This question must be answered in the negative.

In our view of the case it is entirely unnecessary for us to deal here with the argument presented for the appellant on the subject of how far the decrees of March and July, 1916, as entered, may have bound the appellees as quasi, although not formal, parties to the cause at the time the decree of July, 1916, was entered. Even if the appellees had been properly made parties and had been before the court when the decrees of March and July, 1916, were entered, neither of those decrees was a final decree. Hence the court had jurisdiction on a rehearing to correct the errors in them, as was done by the decree appealed from. Touching an error of law apparent from the record, the petition did not require affidavit in support thereof in order to be sufficient as a petition for rehearing. On the other hand, if it were considered that the appellees were not parties before the court in any sense at the time the decrees of March and July, 1916, were entered, still they had a right to file their petition for a rehearing of these interlocutory decrees. Dally's Ex'r v. Warren, 80 Va. 512. See, also, Gills v. Gills, 126 Va. 526, 101 S. E. 900. The circumstance that one of the decrees confirmed a commissioners' report, to which there was no exception at the time, would be, in such case, immaterial, the decree being interlocutory. Id.

As we view the case, it will be necessary for us to further consider only the questions raised by the assignments of errors which are stated below.

[2] 2. Was the memorandum relied on by appellant such a memorandum as is required by section 2460 aforesaid (Code 1904, § 2460), so as to render the lien claimed by appellant under that statute valid as against the liens of the appellees, if the memorandum were considered to have been properly recorded?

This question must be answered in the negative.

Without reference to any other provision of it, we deem it sufficient to say that the memorandum in question is fatally defective, in that it failed to comply with the statutory requirement with respect to setting forth the description of the property intended to be affected by the petition of appellant.

Since, where the other requisites of the statute are complied with as against other lien creditors, the lien, under the terms of the statute in question, dates from the time the memorandum is left with the clerk, the sufficiency of the description of the property contained in the memorandum must be tested as of the time the memorandum was left with the clerk to be recorded. Further:

The identity of the deed sought to be set aside by the petition, and what deed and what 40 acres of land were "mentioned" in the suit in which the petition was filed, at the time the memorandum was left with the clerk, are essential elements of the description of the property contained in the memorandum in question, as the memorandum relies upon its references to these matters to describe the property. The description of the property is not set forth in the memorandum itself, except by such references. What is expressly said in the memorandum itself of the deed misdescribes the deed in the important particular of saying that the grantor therein was named Minnie L. Edwards, whereas the correct name was Minnie L. Reynolds. It is doubtless true, however, that the legal maxim that that is certain which can be made certain, which is referred to in the cases of Norris v. Ile, 152 Ill. 190, 38 N. E. 762, 43 Am. St. Rep. 233, as applicable to the description of property in a pleading, and Harper v. Wallerstein, 122 Va. 274, 94 S. E. 781, L. R. A. 1918C, 517, as applicable to such description in a deed, is also applicable to such description in a lis pendens. But when we follow up the references aforesaid in the memorandum in question we find nothing to aid the description. The bill in the principal suit was not filed until March 6th, long after the memorandum was left with the clerk. Therefore, when the memorandum was left with the clerk, which is the time as of which it speaks and makes reference to the principal suit for identification of "the deed mentioned in said suit," and of the "40 acres therein mentioned," nothing was "mentioned" in the suit on either of those subjects or on any other subject. The bill in the suit was not filed until some days after the memorandum was left with the clerk.

As said in Lile's Notes on Eq. Pleading (3), p. 231:

"Description of res in Pleading.—The res affected must be so described in the pleadings as to be capable of identification by the purchaser, had he known of and examined the record of the suit. Va. Coal & Iron Co. v. Roberts, 103 Va. 661."

As held in Va. Iron, Coal & Coke Co. v. Roberts, 103 Va. 661, 49 S. E. 984, supra:

"A purchaser having actual or constructive notice of a pending suit can only be held chargeable with knowledge of the facts of which the record in the suit, as it existed at the time of his purchase, would have informed him. He cannot be charged with knowledge of facts afterwards brought into the case."

If the petition of the appellant mentioned in the memorandum could be referred to in aid of the description of the property, it would furnish no such aid. The petition contains precisely the same defects as the memorandum.

Hence the memorandum, containing in itself a material misdescription, and absolutely unaided in its description of the property by the references therein, does not comply with the statutory requirements aforesaid.

The decree of August 28, 1918, appealed from was therefore correct in holding that the said memorandum was defective in its terms, and therefore invalid.

This being our view of the case, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the holding in the decree appealed from that the memorandum was invalid because not acknowledged for record, and hence was not recorded as required by law; and we express no opinion on that subject. And, for the same reason, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the question of whether the decrees of March and July, 1916, were or were not absolutely void for lack of jurisdiction of the court over the necessary parties.

[3] 3. It is stated in the petition of appellant for the appeal that, when all the liens, including the claims of appellees, which are reported and established in the cause against the land, other than the claim of appellant, and all costs of suit, are paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the land, there will still be left of such proceeds some money applicable to the claim of appellant; and the position is taken that, as against this fund, the appellant has a lien under the provisions of said section 2460, provided he succeeds in establishing it against the owner of the land.

We think this point is well taken, if the facts are correctly stated.

The record before us does not disclose what the proceeds of the sale of the land were or what are the costs of suit that have been and will have to be paid out of such proceeds. If, however, there should prove to be such a surplus, it would, of course, stand in the place of the land, and to that extent the controversy would be between the owner of the land and appellant only. The statute, just referred to, gives the appellant a lien against the owner of the land from the time of the filing of appellant's petition, if he thereafter, at any time while the suit is pending, succeeds in establishing his lien as against the owner. Whether in the present condition of the cause as to the pleadings and the parties before the court appellant is entitled to a decree in the court below enforcing that lien against such a surplus as is mentioned, if it be found to exist, is a question not before us for decision, as the owner of the land is not a party before us. But the appellees had and have no interest in this question. And certainly, in any aspect of the case, the appellant has the right to have process issue on his petition against the aforesaid owner, and to have the opportunity to establish his lien against the owner to the extent of the surplus aforesaid. Therefore the decree appealed from was erroneous to the extent that it dismissed the petition of appellant. For this reason such decree will have to be reversed, but the other holdings of such decree above approved and the result of such other holdings will be affirmed, with costs to appellees, as the parties substantially prevailing upon the appeal.

Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

This case was argued before Judge WEST took his seat on the court.

PURCELL v. WASHINGTON & O. D. RY., Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
March 16, 1922.)

1. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 328(1), 338—Driver held negligent in failing to listen, and within last clear chance rule.

A count in a declaration for injuries to a one-horse buggy driver, showing that he did not slow down and listen after passing a point 150 yards from the crossing, and could not effectively look after passing that point, and that the operator of the train failed to give warning, but by the use of ordinary care could have discovered the driver's peril and avoided the collision, held to show contributory negligence in failing to listen, and to make a case under the last clear chance doctrine.

2. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 330(4), 338—Driver held negligent in failing to look out, and not within last clear chance rule.

A count in a declaration for injuries to a one-horse buggy driver, alleging that he looked and listened at every point of vision, the only point being 150 yards from the crossing, which was so dangerous that defendant had agreed with the town to limit the speed to 4 miles an hour, but not alleging that the driver knew of the agreement which defendant violated by running the train too fast to stop in time, held to show contributory negligence in failing to look out for train, and to make no case under the last clear chance doctrine.

3. Railroads \Leftrightarrow 350(23)—Contributory negligence of buggy driver in failing to stop to listen held for jury.

A count showing that plaintiff, driving a one-horse buggy, drove slowly and listened intently, but could not effectively look even by going ahead after passing a point 150 yards from a dangerous crossing over which a train moved by electricity was run at a speed too fast to stop, and in violation of a rule limiting the speed to 4 miles an hour, but not alleging that he knew of the rule, held not to show contributory negligence as a matter of law, though he did not actually stop to listen.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Loudoun County.

Action by N. Janney Purcell against the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, Incorporated, and from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration, and dismissing the case, the plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for further proceedings.

Chas. F. Harrison, of Leesburg, for plaintiff in error.

Wilton J. Lambert, of Washington, D. C., C. Vernon Ford and Wilson M. Farr, both of Fairfax, and R. H. Yeatman, of Washington, D. C., for defendant in error.

KELLY, P. This is a writ of error to a final judgment sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration and dismissing the case. The action was brought by N. Janney Purcell against the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, Incorporated. There was an original and a first amended declaration, to each of which a demurrer was sustained, with leave to amend. We are concerned here only with the declaration as amended the second time.

The material facts alleged in the first count were in substance as follows: The defendant owns and operates a railroad through the town of Purcellville, wherein it maintains a station. About 60 feet east of the station its tracks intersect the public road, making what is commonly known as a "railway crossing." The plaintiff was traveling on the public road in a southerly direction towards this crossing in a one-horse buggy. His position on the buggy seat was 10 feet from the horse's head. As he approached the crossing his view was obstructed by a cut and certain structures owned by the defendant, and there was no point nearer than 150 yards therefrom at which he could see a train coming from the west until he reached a point 5 feet from the track. At the former point, 150 yards (called 150 feet in this particular connection in the declaration, but shown by the context and conceded to mean 150 yards) from the crossing, plaintiff "slowed up," and looked and listened attentively for any approaching train. Seeing and hearing no train, and believing that it was safe to himself and his horse to proceed, he moved on towards and upon the crossing. The horse was on the track before he saw, or could see, the defendant's train, which was then running towards him from the west. The horse was visible to the operator of the train for a material length of time before the train was visible to the plaintiff. The plaintiff could not add to his safety by getting out of the buggy and walking ahead to look for the train, because the time required to return and get back in the buggy would be sufficient to permit a train invisible when he was out at the crossing to arrive there before he could, after having made such observation, drive across the track. The defendant negligently failed to sound a bell, blow a whistle, or give any warning of its approach or keep a careful lookout for the crossing, and after it discovered, or by the use of ordinary care could have discovered, the plaintiff's peril, and avoided the accident (the horse having passed at slow speed entirely over the track before the collision occurred), failed to stop or control its train, and thereby collided with and destroyed the buggy, and seriously injured the plaintiff.

[1] This count shows actionable negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to give warnings for the crossing, and it also shows contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. According to his averments, he did not slow down and listen for the train nearer to the track than 150 yards therefrom, and at that point made up his mind that it was safe to drive straight ahead, and did drive straight ahead and onto the crossing without further precaution. The facts alleged with reference to the futility of getting out of the buggy and going ahead to look did not relieve him of the obligation to listen carefully before proceeding, and this he appears not to have done after passing the point 150 yards from the track. He could not, it is true, effectively look after leaving that point, but he ought to have continued to listen. It may be that he would not have heard the train if he had listened, but, in the absence of allegations to the contrary, the natural presumption is that he would have heard it, and it was his duty to overcome that presumption. He did overcome the presumption by his allegations in count 3, but they are not referred to or in any way made a part of this count. The court will not presume that a party's pleadings are less favorable to him than the facts will warrant.

But this first count of the declaration did make a good case for recovery on the doctrine of the last clear chance. If its allegations are true, the operator of the train, in the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered the plaintiff's peril in time to avoid the accident, and his failure to do so was a supervening negligence which rendered the defendant liable. The case of U. S. Spruce Lumber Co. v. Shumate, 118 Va. 471, 87 S. E. 723, is relied upon in this connection by the defendant to support the contention that the doctrine of last clear chance cannot be applied here, but the case cited is not available for that purpose. The court refused to apply the doctrine in the Shumate Case because the declaration contained no averments showing that the defendant could by due care have avoided the injury. The averments there were merely to the effect that the defendant did not use ordinary care to discover the plaintiff's danger, and the court held that the declaration ought to have gone further, and alleged that, by the exercise of such care, the danger could have been both discovered and prevented. In the instant case the allegations clearly show that by the use of ordinary care the operator of the train could have discovered the plaintiff's danger and avoided the accident. It was therefore error to sustain the demurrer to the first count.

[2] The second count, after describing the situation at the crossing by reference to the first count, and further stating that the plaintiff "looked and listened intently for a train of the defendant at any and every point where the said defendant's trains would have been visible to him before he entered on the said crossing, and hearing none and seeing none" (the only such point of vision being, as shown above, 150 yards from the track), made the following additional averments:

"That said crossing is a very dangerous crossing, as is well known to the said defendant, and that theretofore the town of Purcellville, realizing the dangerous character of said crossing, had undertaken to exercise the rights it possessed to require the said defendant to either place gates across the highway at said crossing or to flag their said trains across the same, to the end that the traveling public might be safe in crossing the tracks of the said defendant at this point. To this end negotiations were had between the town of Purcellville on the one hand and the said railroad on the other, and, in order to prevent the said town of Purcellville from exercising its rights, and requiring the said gates or the flagging of said trains at said crossing, the said defendant represented that it would thereafter run its said trains over said crossing at a rate of 4 miles per hour. Relying on this representation the said town of Purcellville did not require the gates, nor the flagging, but accepted the promise and representation of the said defendant that it would operate its said train over said crossing at 4 miles per hour, which understanding was given on January 10, 1918, in writing, and which understanding and promise was in force and operation at the time of the accident herein complained of."

And this second count further avers that the defendant was running its train on that occasion at a rate far in excess of 4 miles an hour, and could, if it had slowed down to the latter rate for the crossing, have easily stopped in time to avoid the accident.

There was no allegation that the plaintiff knew of or relied upon the alleged agreement with the town of Purcellville, and the agreement, therefore, did not relieve the plaintiff in any degree of his duty to look out for trains at the crossing, however much such agreement may have affected the primary liability of the defendant. The count, therefore, like the first, shows contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and further shows that the train was running too fast to stop, and, hence, however much this rapid rate of speed may have affected the alleged negligence of the defendant, there was no last clear chance to save the plaintiff.

[3] The third count describes the situation at the crossing by reference to the first count, and in addition thereto avers: (1) That the motive power of the train was electricity; (2) that the plaintiff, as he approached the crossing, "drove along at a slow rate of speed," and "listened intently for a train of the defendant approaching said crossing"; and (3) that the defendant, realizing the dangerous character of the crossing, had adopted and notified the town of Purcellville of a rule to reduce the speed of its trains in the town to 8 miles an hour, and over the crossing to 4 miles an hour, and that the observance of this rule would have enabled the operator to stop in time to avoid the accident, whereas on this occasion it ran its train over the crossing "far in excess of 4 or even 10 miles an hour," knocking and dragging the plaintiff a distance of 60 feet.

It is further stated in this third count that the defendant, by adopting and notifying the town of the rule aforesaid, "lulled the town and the public in that vicinity into the belief that it would conform to said rule"; but there is no averment that the plaintiff knew of or relied upon the rule.

This count, in our opinion, does not show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff as a matter of law. The allegation that he drove slowly, and listened intently for a train as he approached the crossing, was sufficient to take the case to the jury upon the question of his contributory negligence. By adequate reference to the first count, this one shows that it would have been futile to attempt to look for the train by leaving the buggy, and the plaintiff was entitled to have a jury say whether he exercised due diligence by driving slowly and listening intently, even though he did not actually stop to listen as he approached the crossing.

In Southern R. Co. v. Aldridge, 101 Va. 142 146, 43 S. E. 333, 334, Keith, P., delivering the opinion, said:

"This court has never decided that as matter of law it was the duty of a person approaching the crossing of a railroad to stop, look, and listen for an approaching train. It has been said in numerous cases that the railroad track itself was a signal of danger, and imposed upon one approaching it the duty to look and listen, but it has in no case been held that it was his duty to stop in order to look and listen, or that it was his duty when in a vehicle to get out in order to look and listen."

In Southern R. Co. v. Bryant, 95 Va. 212, 221, 28 S. E. 183, 185, Judge Riely, in delivering the opinion said:

"It cannot be inferred as a matter of law, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, that because Bryant drove upon the track without stopping, he did not listen. The instinct of self-preservation forbids the imputation of recklessness to any one. Where a traveler is killed at a railroad crossing, and the negligence of the railroad company is established, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption is, though perhaps slight, that the traveler did his duty in approaching the crossing."

In the instant case the fact is admitted by the demurrer that the plaintiff continued to look and listen intently.

In the case of Wilmouth v. Southern R. Co., 125 Va. 511, 521, 99 S. E. 665, Judge Sims, reviewing numerous cases with reference to the "stop, look and listen" rule, shows clearly that the rule could not be made to apply to the situation here.

It is insisted that the case of U. S. Spruce Lumber Co. v. Shumate, supra, is in conflict with the view here indicated, but there is in fact no real conflict between that case and the other Virginia cases last above cited. The gist of the decision in the Shumate Case, in so far as that decision is here involved, is that when a traveler on a highway undertakes to cross a railroad track, he must look and listen at such time and place as will make looking and listening effective, and that, if his allegations or proof show that he looked and listened where looking and listening would do no good, he makes a case of negligence on his own part, provided his failure to more effectively look and listen is "unexplained." 118 Va. 476, 87 S. E. 723.

In this case the averments of the count now under consideration contain an adequate and reasonable explanation of his conduct, and we are of opinion that the question of his negligence in failing to stop should be determined by a jury.

The demurrer to the third count of the declaration should have been overruled, and the action of the trial court in that respect was erroneous; but it is to be observed that the count does not, as plaintiff contends, present a case for the application of the last clear chance. Under its allegations the train was running too fast to have allowed any appreciable interval for the prevention of the accident after the discovery of the peril.

The fourth, and last, count of the declaration undertakes to state a case of liability on account of the defendant's failure to minimize the seriousness of the plaintiff's injuries and the extent of his damage, even though the collision itself could not have been avoided. With respect to this count in the declaration, we deem it sufficient to say that its allegations are too vague and general to state a good cause of action, and we find no error in the judgment of the lower court with respect thereto.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the court was right in sustaining the demurrer to the declaration as to counts 2 and 4, but that counts 1 and 3 are good, and that as to them the demurrer should have been overruled. We will accordingly enter an order in this court to that effect, and remand the cause for further proceedings.

Reversed.

MASHUWAS v. BENNETT. (No. 4350.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Taxation \S 749—Tax deed may not be obtained after two years from sale except under special circumstances as provided by statute.

Notwithstanding the provision in section 19 of chapter 31, Code, as amended by chapter 67, Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 31, § 19 [sec. 1077]), authorizing a purchaser of land at a tax sale, to file, or cause to be filed, with the clerk of the county court of the county in which the property is situated, the survey or report required by other provisions of said chapter 31, and request the execution of a deed, at any time after expiration of a year and three months from the date of sale, and before the expiration of two years from said date, a deed for the property cannot be made or obtained after two years from the date of sale thereof, in the absence of special circumstances made ground of exception by a provision of section 24 of said chapter 31, as amended by said chapter 67 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 31, § 24 [sec. 1083]).

2. Taxation \S 749—Sections of statute relating to tax sales and prescribing time for issuance must be construed together.

Under the rules of construction, said provision of section 19 and the limitation prescribed by said section 24 must be read and considered together, and both allowed effect as far as possible.

3. Taxation \S 749—Implication of right to take tax deed after two years from sale must yield to prohibitory terms of statute.

The mere implication of right to take a deed after two years, under ordinary conditions, arising from the terms of the provision in said section 19, must yield to the express prohibitory terms of the limitation in said section 24.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Suit by Peter Mashuwas against A. F. Bennett to set aside a tax deed. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Cuppett, of Thomas, for appellant.

J. P. Scott, of Parsons, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. The decree, under review on this appeal, set aside a tax deed made more than two years after the date of the sale of property, for the taxes as to which it was delinquent, without any proof or claim that execution thereof had been delayed by any proceedings under section 22 of chapter 31 of the Code (sec. 1081), to compel execution thereof, or that such execution had been enjoined or stayed by any legal process or proceeding. By section 24 of said chapter, as amended by chapter 67 Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 31, § 24 [sec. 1083]), execution of a tax deed after two years from the date of the sale of the real estate is expressly inhibited, except in the two cases just mentioned. The property was sold December 4, 1917, for delinquency as to the year 1915, and the deed made December 12, 1919. There is no disclosure of failure or refusal of the clerk of the county court to make or correct a deed, causing a proceeding to compel him to do so, nor of any injunction or other proceeding by which execution thereof was precluded or delayed.

[1] The argument submitted to sustain the deed and reverse the decree is founded upon the provision of section 19 of chapter 31 of the Code, as amended by said chapter 67, Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 31, § 19 [sec. 1077]), allowing the purchaser the privilege of filing his survey or plat and making his request for a deed, at any time between the expiration of fifteen months from the date of sale and two years from the date thereof. The contention is that, as he can file his report or plat and request the deed at any time after fifteen months and before the expiration of two years, the Legislature must have intended to permit him, after having done those things within two years, to take his deed at any time after two years. Such construction would put it in his power to have unlimited time to take the deed. That result was not within the legislative purpose. There has always been a time limit upon acquirement of the deed. Formerly it was five years. In the amendment effected in 1917 it was reduced to two. This action discloses intent to adhere to it as a matter of policy.

[2] Both provisions must be read together and allowed such effect as they can have, and be made to conform, as nearly as possible, with manifest legislative purpose and policy. So read, they allow nine months in which to perform all the acts required of the purchaser and clerk to vest the title in the former, and both are given reasonable and important operation and effect.

[3] The claim of right under section 19, to take a deed after two years, is based upon mere implication. That section does not give it in terms. The implication is not a necessary one, because section 24 negatives it, saying the deed shall not be taken after two years. A mere implication can seldom, if ever, stand against express terms.

Upon this construction of the two provisions of the statute involved, the decree complained of will be affirmed.

STATE v. SERGENT et al. (No. 4124.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 21, 1922. Rehearing Denied
April 4, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Taxation \Leftrightarrow 853—Party seeking redemption of lands from forfeiture must set up and prove title superior to state and all others.

One seeking to redeem land from forfeiture in a suit prosecuted by the commissioner of school lands, must in his petition filed pursuant to sections 16 and 17 of chapter 105 of the Code 1913 (secs. 4448, 4449), state in full his title to such land, accompanied by the evidence thereof, and by full and satisfactory proof show that at the time the title to the land is alleged to have vested in the State, he had a good and valid title thereto, legal or equitable, superior to that of any other claimant thereto, and failing in which requirements or any of them he should be denied redemption.

2. Taxation \Leftrightarrow 853—Claimant should be denied right of redemption of school lands from forfeiture, where he had transferred his title to adverse claimant.

Where one seeking to redeem such forfeited land shows by his petition that he has made or joined with others in a deed or contract settling or compromising a suit against him and others involving his right and title to such land, and whereby he has granted to the adverse claimant all his right, title and interest therein, he thereby shows want of right and title superior to such adverse claimant justifying a decree of redemption in his favor, and redemption should be denied him.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Suit by the State of West Virginia against Caroline Sargent and others, begun by the Commissioner of School Lands, and from a decree therein the defendant Caroline Sargent appeals. Affirmed.

S. P. Bell, John W. Lance, and Harper & Baker, all of Spencer, for appellant.

Thos. P. Ryan, of Spencer, and R. G. Altizer and Raymond Dodson, both of Charleston, for appellees.

MILLER, J. This suit was manifestly begun and prosecuted by the commissioner of school lands at the instance of the defendant Caroline Sargent, to enable her to apply for redemption of the tract described in the bill as the first tract, and containing one hundred acres, more or less, in Geary District of Roane County, and which the bill alleges and she admits was forfeited in her name. The answer of the United Fuel Gas Company, however, if not that of the defendants W. F. Cook and H. O. Simmons, not found in the record, denies the forfeiture thereof by the owners thereof. The decree complained of shows the filing of the joint and several answers of Cook and Simmons, but these are not found in the record, and some advantage is sought by the appellant on this ground, she insisting that the plaintiff's bill ought to be taken for confessed as to them. The State is not complaining of the decree, and she can not rely on the supposed pro confesso of the State's bill.

Prior to the filing of the bill of the state, the appellant Caroline Sargent had instituted her suit in equity in the same court against the said W. F. Cook, Ephriam Sargent, her husband, Henry D. Sargent, United Fuel Gas Company and South Penn Oil Company. In her bill she undertook to deraign her supposed title to the tract she sought to redeem, and therein and thereby sought to correct a certain deed made by her and her husband Ephriam Sargent to said W. F. Cook, dated April 5, 1915, in so far as said deed purports to convey any part of the tract of 211 acres claimed by her other than the part thereof conveyed by her and her husband to James Hall and W. F. Cook, by deed of December 8, 1906; also to correct another deed made by her and her husband to Henry D. Sargent, dated May 14, 1916, purporting to convey to the said Sargent one-half of the oil and gas in and under a tract described by adjoining lands as containing 52 acres, more or less, and as being the same land conveyed by said W. F. Cook to her and her husband by deed of April 5, 1915, in so far as said deed attempts or purports to convey any of the oil and gas within and underlying any part of plaintiff's said 211 acres, and praying the court to remove the same as clouds on her title to the said 211 acres, in so far as said deeds purport to convey any part or parts thereof other than so conveyed to the said James Hall and W. F. Cook; praying also for the cancellation of the oil and gas lease executed by said Hall and Cook to the South Penn Oil Company, particularly set out in the bill, and that it might be construed to embrace or include only that part of the plaintiff's land as constituted a lap or interlock upon what she describes in the bill as the McClaskey tract, and which was conveyed by her and her said husband to the said James Hall and W. F. Cook; and her bill also prayed for a perpetual injunction against the defendants, their representatives, agents and employees from entering upon plaintiff's said 211 acres and from putting down any well or wells, and from operating them or any of them, etc., except the portion thereof so conveyed by her and her husband to the said Hall and Cook as aforesaid; and there is also a prayer for general relief.

The bill in this case was answered by defendants, wherein all the allegations material to the alleged rights of the plaintiff to the relief prayed for were denied, who also and by way of estoppel pleaded and relied on the deeds of plaintiff which she sought to have corrected, set aside, canceled and annulled, and other deeds and contracts executed by her, and certain conduct on her part wholly inconsistent with her present claims to relief.

In appellant's petition and answer filed in the present suit of the commissioner of school lands she admits the forfeiture of the 100 acres, the first tract, as alleged in the bill, and then undertakes to show the manner of the forfeiture, alleging this land to be a part of the aforesaid 211 acres, that 61¼ acres thereof remaining after prior conveyance by her, which included about 14¼ acres continued on the land books for the years 1906, 1907 and 1908, were improperly dropped from the land books. She also in this connection alleges that about the year 1908 she purchased a tract of 83¾ acres, which was assessed to her for the year 1909 and each subsequent year, and that the balance, 14¼ acres with which she had been previously charged, seemed to have been dropped from the land books. So far as we find, she does not allege from whom she purchased the 83¾ acres in 1908 nor exhibit any deed therefor.

In the petition and answer of appellant she referred to the pendency of her suit against Cook and others, and asked that the original, amended and supplemental bills therein, together with all exhibits therewith, and the answers of the defendants thereto, and all exhibits therewith, and all depositions taken on behalf of plaintiff and defendants, together with all exhibits filed therewith, and all orders and decrees of the court made and entered therein, and papers filed therein, might be taken, read and treated as a part of her said answer and petition.

The answer of the defendant United Fuel Gas Company to the bill of the State also refers to the preceding suit of appellant and likewise prays that said suit may be consolidated or heard together with this suit. It alleges that the 100 acres sought to be redeemed was and is a part of a tract of 450 acres known as the McClaskey land, and that it was never any part of the 211 acres once owned by appellant, but was the residue of the 450 acres of McClaskey land left after three prior conveyances by the McClaskeys out of the same, and which Virginia McClaskey conveyed to W. F. Cook and James Hall by deed of May 6, 1905, and thereafter leased by them to the South Penn Oil Company, by deed of lease of July 18, 1906, which lease by subsequent assignment came to respondent.

The decree appealed from shows that the cause was heard upon the pleadings and proofs in both suits, with the stipulation of counsel that the suit of the appellant should be governed by the decision of the suit of the State against her and others.

[1] To entitle appellant to redeem said land from the forfeiture thereof, pursuant to sections 16 and 17 of chapter 105 of the Code (secs. 4448, 4449) it was necessary for her in her petition to set out fully her title thereto, accompanied by the evidence thereof, and by full and satisfactory proof show that at the time the title became vested in the State she had good and valid title thereto, legal or equitable, superior to any other claimant thereof. The only title upon which she apparently relied was the deed to her from W. H. Sergeant and wife, dated May 12, 1902, calling for 211 acres, by metes and bounds, apparently covering the greater part of the 100 acres sought to be redeemed, a part of a 700 acre tract which was conveyed by W. H. Sergeant and wife to Smith and Rader, January 12, 1856. But the record shows that the said W. H. Sergeant had not owned any part of this larger tract since that date, and therefore had nothing remaining within said 700 acre boundary to convey to any one on September 14, 1901, and moreover, that the petitioner, prior to the filing of her petition, had sold and conveyed away to others all of the land outside of the boundary of said 700 acre Smith and Rader tract, and certainly had no title to any land within that boundary. The record further shows that the particular tract of 100 acres was part of lot No. 34, containing 450 acres, allotted to Smith or his daughter Virginia McClaskey in the partition of said 700 acres, and out of which she had subsequently conveyed three parcels as follows: 262 acres to W. H. Justice, 133 acres to Peter Looney, and 165 acres adjoining the 100 acres here involved to appellant's husband Ephriam Sergeant; that the residue thereof, supposed to contain about 80 acres, but actually containing 104 acres, becoming delinquent, was sold by the State and purchased by the heirs of Virginia McClaskey, who on May 6, 1905, conveyed the same to W. F. Cook and James Hall, who afterwards finding the Sergeants laying some claim to the land, instituted their suit in ejectment against them, which was compromised and settled by the parties, and the defendants, in consideration of seventy-five dollars cash in hand paid, by deed of December 8, 1906, granted and conveyed unto the said Cook and Hall "all their right, title and interest in and to" the tract described as containing 95 acres and the same land conveyed to said Hall and Cook by Holly McClaskey and others by deed of May 6, 1905. The record further shows that subsequently, on March 22, 1913, James Hall and wife conveyed their half interest in said tract to W. V. Hall, who with his wife, on September 14, 1914, conveyed said half interest to appellant's husband Ephriam Sergent, reserving certain timber thereon, and that thereafter, by two deeds of April 5, 1915, the said W. F. Cook and Ephriam Sergent partitioned said tract of 95 acres, found to contain 104 acres and 27 square rods, equally between them, but each deed provided that the partitioners were to share equally in the oil and gas rentals should the then lessee drill on the tract for oil and gas. The record also shows that after these partition deeds were executed Ephriam Sergent and Caroline Sergent, in consideration of $600.00 cash in hand paid, conveyed to the defendant Henry D. Sergent their one-half interest in the oil and gas underlying the said 52 acres, and described it as the same 52 acres conveyed to the parties of the first part by W. F. Cook, by deed of April 5, 1915.

[2] It was the purpose of appellant's bill to set aside, cancel and annul the said compromise deed of herself and husband of December 6, 1906, and the deed of said W. F. Cook to Ephriam Sergent of April 15, 1915, and the assignment of the said Ephriam Sergent to Henry D. Sergent of his interest in the oil and gas under the 52 acres aforesaid, as clouds on her alleged title to the whole of the said 211 acres, or that part thereof covered by the boundary of 80 acres, her theory being that these deeds on her part amounted to nothing more than the relinquishment of her dower in the lands covered thereby, and were not intended to convey her title to or any interest in the 211 acres or any part thereof.

It is perfectly plain to us from the record recited as well as from other portions thereof not recited, that appellant has no semblance of right or title to any part of the 100 acre tract she seeks to redeem and never had any right or title thereto, acquired either under the deed from W. H. Sergent, of September 14, 1901, or by any other deed, and that even if she ever had any right outside of her inchoate right of dower in her husband's interest therein, she finally and forever concluded and estopped herself by the deeds of settlement and compromise of the said ejectment suit, by her joinder in said partition deeds and in the deed to Henry D. Sergent for the oil and gas rights in the 52 acres.

Much stress was laid upon the question of the true eastern and western boundary line between the W. H. Sergent and the so-called McClaskey or Smith and Rader tracts, and wide scope was taken in the pleadings and proofs, and in the briefs and argument of counsel, on this question. But as we view the case and the facts developed, this question is quite unimportant. The parties by contemporaneous and subsequent construction have placed this division line substantially where the appellees and their predecessors in title claim it to be, so as to conclude and estop appellant and her husband from asserting anything to the contrary. Appellant wholly failed to show right, legal or equitable, to correct, reform, modify or remove her deeds or the deeds of any of the other parties as clouds upon her title, and without this concededly she could have no right to redeem the land in controversy or any part thereof. We see no reason for citing authority for any of the familiar legal principles involved, and our conclusion is to affirm the decree.

JENKINS v. KIRBY et al. (No. 4307.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Taxation \S 679(5)—Where the state sues to subject land bought at tax sale to sale, a grantee of former owner is a necessary party.

Where a suit is brought by the state to subject real estate to sale for the benefit of the school fund, and the state's title is derived from a tax sale made in the name of a former owner, but after he had conveyed the land to another whose title is of record, such grantee is a necessary party to such suit.

2. Taxation \S 689(2)—Purchaser from owner may maintain bill to set aside state's resale of land purchased by it at tax sale where delinquent list was void.

Such a purchaser from the person in whose name the land was returned delinquent for taxes, if not made a party to such school land suit, may maintain a bill to set aside a sale made therein, where he contends that the state had no title to such real estate at the time of the sale thereof by the school land commissioner, because the delinquent list under which the sale was made by the sheriff was void, or because any title acquired by the state was transferred to him under the provisions of the Constitution because of his possession of and payment of taxes on such real estate.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Suit by H. J. Jenkins against W. H. Kirby and others to set aside a deed made by commissioner of school lands. Decree for the plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. H. Scott, of Bluefield, and Hartley Sanders, of Princeton, for appellant.

McClagherty & Richardson, of Bluefield, for appellee.

RITZ, J. Reversal is sought upon this appeal of a decree of the circuit court of Mercer county setting aside a deed made by the commissioner of school lands to the defendant conveying a house and lot situate in the city of Bluefield which the plaintiff claims belongs to him.

For the year 1914 the real estate in question was properly assessed upon the land books of Mercer county in the name of G. E. Stafford, the then owner thereof. The taxes for said year were not paid, and upon a return of the same delinquent for such nonpayment, which delinquent return is challenged, the same was sold and purchased by the state. A suit was brought by the state returnable to August rules, 1918, for the purpose of subjecting to sale this lot, among others, for the benefit of the school fund. Such proceedings were had in that suit that on the 13th of December, 1919, a decree was entered directing the sale of said real estate, and on the 2d of June, 1920, the same was sold by the commissioner of school lands, and purchased by the defendant Kirby. This sale was duly reported and confirmed by the court, and on the 2d of August, 1920, under the direction of the court, a deed was made by the commissioner of school lands conveying the lot to the said Kirby, and it is this deed and the decree confirming the sale, as well as the decree of sale, which is set aside by the decree complained of in this suit.

It appears that G. E. Stafford, who was the owner of this lot when it was assessed with taxes for the year 1914, was declared a bankrupt in that year; that just prior to being so adjudged bankrupt he conveyed this lot to one M. K. Harman, who in turn conveyed it to the wife of Stafford, who in turn conveyed it to one F. C. Bernard. The trustee in bankruptcy filed a bill alleging that these transfers by Stafford to Harman, and from Harman to Stafford's wife, and from her to Bernard, were fraudulent, and were for the purpose of depriving the creditors of said Stafford of the benefit of said real estate. Such proceedings were had in this suit that said deeds were set aside, and the said house and lot sold by the trustee in bankruptcy, at which sale L. J. Holland, trustee, became the purchaser. The said lot was conveyed to the said Holland by proper deed on the 2d of July, 1915, and on the 4th of August of that year said Holland, trustee, conveyed the same to the plaintiff in this suit. For the year 1915 said lot was entered upon the land books and assessed with taxes in the name of F. C. Bernard, the fraudulent grantee of said Stafford. For the years 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 it was regularly entered upon the land books of Mercer county and assessed with taxes in the name of the plaintiff to this suit, and all of the taxes charged or chargeable against the same for those years were paid by him. For the nonpayment of the taxes assessed and charged against the same for the year 1915 in the name of F. C. Bernard the said lot was returned delinquent, but before any sale thereof was made the taxes so delinquent thereon were paid to the proper authority by the plaintiff here, so that since his purchase of the lot the plaintiff has paid all taxes properly assessable against the same for six years. It also appears that he has been in the actual possession of the house during all of that time, living therein with his family. Upon discovering that his house and lot had been sold and conveyed by the commissioner of school lands to the defendant, he brought this suit for the purpose of setting aside the deed, as well as the decree of sale, and the decree confirming the sale thereof, alleging, in addition to the facts above stated, that he was not made a party defendant to the suit brought by the state for the purpose of subjecting the said property to sale, and in which suit the decree of sale was made; that the state at said time did not have any title to said property which it could properly sell, for the reason that the delinquent list made by the sheriff for the year 1914 was not sworn to by him before or at the time it was presented to and allowed by the county court; that, while the order of the county court allowing the same shows that it was sworn to, an examination of the delinquent list itself shows that, while it was presented and allowed on the 31st of July, 1915, it was not in fact sworn to until the 15th of August following, and for this reason the plaintiff contends that the state did not acquire any title to his lot under the sale made by the sheriff. He further contends that the state did not have any title to his lot at the time it sold the same to the defendant, for the reason that he had been in the actual possession thereof for more than five years, and paid all the taxes charged and chargeable thereon during that time, and that, even if the state did acquire any title thereto by its purchase at the tax sale aforesaid, such title became transferred to him under the provisions of the Constitution of this state; and, because he was not made a party defendant to the suit brought by the state for the purpose of selling the said lot, he asks that the decree of sale, as well as the sale itself, the decree confirming the same, and the deed made to the defendant in pursuance thereof, be set aside, in order that he may make defense to said bill after being properly made a party thereto.

[1] The law requires that all known claimants of real estate sought to be sold for the benefit of the school fund in a suit brought for that purpose must be made parties defendant, and the only contention of the defendant here is that the plaintiff was not such a known claimant at the time of the institution of the state's suit. He was at that time in possession of the property. He had been paying taxes on it assessed by the agents of the state for several years. He had a deed on record conveying the lot to him, and he comes clearly within the definition of a known claimant, as laid down by this court in the cases of Preston v. Bennett, 67 W. Va. 392, 68 S. E. 45, Neal v. Wilson, 79 W. Va. 482, 92 S. E. 136, and Ellis v. Hager, 87 W. Va. 313, 104 S. E. 607. It will not do to say, as is urged by the defendant, that it would be imposing upon the commissioner of school lands and his attorney an undue burden to require him to ascertain such claimants to lands sought to be sold. The officers of the state charged with the duty of assessing the real estate for taxes had no difficulty in determining that the plaintiff was the owner thereof, and in charging him with the taxes against the same, and it is not perceived that it would be any more difficult for the commissioner of school lands to have determined his interest therein than it was for such taxing officers to do so.

[2] Whether the plaintiff's contention that the state acquired no title under the sale made by the sheriff, because of the defective delinquent list, is tenable, or his other contention, that any title that the state may have acquired was transferred to him under the Constitution, because of his possession and payment of taxes upon the property, can be sustained, are questions which must be decided in the suit brought by the state for the purpose of subjecting the real estate to sale for the benefit of the school fund, but before the plaintiff in this suit can present such matters to the court in that suit it is necessary for him to first get rid of the decree of sale, the sale itself, the decree confirming it, and the deed made in pursuance thereof. He was entitled to be heard in that suit before a decree was entered therein adjudicating that his house and lot were subject to sale, and he is still entitled to be heard therein upon that question. The decree of the court below entered in this case simply sets aside the decree of sale, the sale made under it, and the decree confirming it, and the deed made to the defendant. This leaves the suit pending, and it will now devolve upon the state, if it desires to proceed further against the plaintiff's lot, to amend its bill and make the plaintiff a party defendant to that suit in order that he may assert the rights contended for by him; and, in case his contentions should be decided adversely to him, he would then have a right to redeem his property from the delinquency for which it was sold upon payment of the taxes and proper costs and charges. This case is not like that where a party admits the title in the state, and seeks to simply set aside a sale made by the commissioner of school lands for the purpose of being allowed to redeem, as was the case of Neal v. Wilson, supra. In that case we treated the bill as a petition in the school land suit upon the theory that the petitioner, not having any title by his own admissions, could not maintain a separate suit relative to the real estate. In this case, however, the plaintiff contends that he has good title to the lot, and that the state had no right to proceed against the same at the time it did, and of course the objection to the maintenance of the suit because of lack of interest which made necessary the treatment of the bill as a petition in the school land suit in the case of Neal v. Wilson does not here exist.

We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court is plainly right, and the same is affirmed.

MOST WORSHIPFUL GRAND LODGE A. F. & A. M. OF WEST VIRGINIA v. MOST WORSHIPFUL PRINCE HALL GRAND LODGE OF WEST VIRGINIA, A. F. & A. M. (No. 4151.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 7, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Beneficial associations ¶4—Members withdrawing and forming a new organization may use any derivative of the old name not so closely resembling it as to deceive.

Members withdrawing from a fraternal society and associating themselves together in a new organization, for the accomplishment of the same purposes for which the old society was formed, may use as their new name any derivative of the old name they may wish to employ, so long as it does not so closely resemble the name of the parent order as to be calculated to deceive ordinary persons proceeding with ordinary care.

2. Corporations ¶49(2)—Corporation may be enjoined from using a name similar to another but not deceptive, if officers misled people to deal with it as the other.

A corporation which adopts a name similar to another, but not of itself calculated to deceive, may nevertheless be enjoined from using it if it be shown that its officers and agents, by false representations and deceptive practices, are causing people to deal with it in the belief that they are dealing with such other concern.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Suit by the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free & Accepted Masons of West Virginia against the Most Worshipful Prince Hall Grand Lodge of West Virginia, A. F. & A. M. From a decree dismissing its bill the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Ellis, of Oak Hill, and A. G. Froe, of Welch, for appellant.

W. F. Denny, of Richmond, Va., and Sanders, Crockett, Fox & Sanders, of Bluefield, for appellee.

RITZ, J. The plaintiff seeks to enjoin the defendant from using as a part of its name the words "Ancient Free & Accepted Masons," or the letters "A. F. & A. M.," or the word "Masons," or from using these terms in any way in conducting its affairs. From a decree dismissing its bill the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Prior to the organization of the defendant the plaintiff, "the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free & Accepted Masons of West Virginia," was incorporated under the laws of this state. Its constituent elements were made up not of individuals, but of groups of individuals, known as subordinate lodges. Prior to 1918 there were about 40 of these subordinate lodges. Because of the conduct of some of its officers at a meeting held at Huntington in June, 1918, as well as for some other reasons, a schism arose which reached such proportions that, by the spring of 1919, more than a majority of the subordinate lodges withdrew from the plaintiff lodge and declined to further affiliate therewith. A number of the leaders of this schism were expelled from membership in the plaintiff lodge. In March, 1919, the withdrawing membership sent representatives to a meeting held at Huntington, for the purpose of organizing another grand lodge of Masons to be composed of such subordinate lodges as desired to affiliate with it. Representatives from more than 20 lodges attended this meeting, and it was there determined to form a grand lodge of Masons by the name of "Most Worshipful Prince Hall Grand Lodge of West Virginia, A. F. & A. M." This determination was effected by procuring a charter from the Secretary of State, and organizing in the manner provided by law. This suit was then brought by the plaintiff, for the purpose of enjoining the defendant from conducting its business under the name adopted by it, upon the theory that the plaintiff had the exclusive right to use the words "Ancient Free & Accepted Masons" or the letters "A. F. & A. M." as a part of its corporate name; that the defendant's corporate name is so similar to that of plaintiff as to be misleading and confusing and an encroachment thereon; and that the defendant and its officers are actually practicing fraud upon the plaintiff by inducing persons, intending to become members of the plaintiff, to join the defendant under the belief that they were really joining the plaintiff.

[1] That a court of equity will interfere to enjoin the use of a name by a corporation so closely simulating that of another corporation, as to result in fraud upon such other is very well established. Benevolent & Protective Order of Elks v. Improved Benevolent & Protective Order of Elks, 205 N. Y. 459, 98 N. E. 756, L. R. A. 1915B, 1074, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 639; Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias v. Improved Order Knights of Pythias, 113 Mich. 133, 71 N. W. 470, 38 L. R. A. 658; Emory v. Grand United Order of Odd Fellows, 140 Ga. 423, 78 S. E. 922. There are many other cases affirming the doctrine, but denying the relief upon the facts in some cases and granting it in others. In the New York case above cited the relief was granted. The court found that plaintiff had given to the word "Elks" a distinctive meaning when applied to a secret benevolent order, and that defendant might not use it. The court took occasion to say, however, that if the persons organizing the defendant corporation had been formerly members of the plaintiff, and had split off from it because of a schism in the order, they would perhaps be as much entitled to use the word "Elks" as part of the name of a corporation organized by them for the purpose of carrying on the work of the order, as would the plaintiff. The Michigan case above cited was one in which the only change in name was to change the word "Supreme" to the word "Improved," the new corporation being called Improved Order Knights of Pythias, while the old corporation was known as the Supreme Lodge Knights of Pythias. In this case, however, the members of the new order had been members of the old, having withdrawn therefrom because of dissatisfaction therewith, and organized the new corporation for the purpose of carrying on the same work in which they had been engaged in the old. The attempt was made to enjoin the use of the term, Knights of Pythias, but the court held that the new order might use any derivative of the old name so long as it was not calculated to deceive ordinary persons proceeding with ordinary care, and the relief was denied. That case is very much like the one we have here, and we cannot say that the name of the defendant corporation is so similar to that of the plaintiff as to deceive an ordinary person proceeding with ordinary care. In a case in which there was no former connection between the members forming the new corporation and the old corporation, the adoption by such new corporation of a name closely resembling the name of the old is naturally attributed to some sinister purpose, but, where the new corporation is organized by persons withdrawing from the old and for the purpose of promoting the very same objects, the adoption of a derivative from the old name, which is largely descriptive of the purposes sought to be attained accompanied by distinctive words, as a name for the new organization is not accompanied by any presumption of bad faith. The adopted words in this case indicate the work in which they are engaged. In English nomenclature they indicate to all, the uninitiated as well as the initiated, that the persons applying to themselves these terms are engaged in promulgating a principle of moral philosophy, having thousands of adherents among every civilized race of the world. To say that only the plaintiff's membership may call themselves "Masons" in West Virginia would be to give to it a monopoly in this great philosophical and moral principle, and no organization can ever secure a monopoly in practical benevolence and morality.

[2] The principal contention of the plaintiff, however, is that the defendant and its officers and agents are fraudulently inducing prospective members of the plaintiff to become members of the defendant's lodge; that many persons have joined the defendant organization in the belief that they were joining the plaintiff, because of false representations made to them by the defendant's agents; and that such fraudulent practices have been aided by the similarity in the names of the two organizations. That one may be denied the right to use a particular name in the conduct of his business, because of his fraudulent conduct and fraudulent use thereof to the prejudice of another, is too well established to require the citation of authority. When, however, we look to the proof in this case, we find that there has not been the slightest effort to produce confusion on the part of either party. As is usually the case in such instances, there seems to exist a rather exaggerated feeling of bitterness by each party toward the other, because of the claim of each that the other has departed from some of the established traditions of Masonry. This feeling has resulted in clearly setting forth the contentions of each side, and in vividly portraying that, in colored Masonry, there are at least two distinct and separate organizations, each claiming that the other is not orthodox. The evidence utterly fails to show any deception or fraud practiced upon the plaintiff, and the only injury that it has suffered, so far as appears from the evidence, has resulted from the withdrawal of a large number of its members because of dissatisfaction with its practices, and the organization of the defendant by these withdrawing members.

We find no error in the decree complained of, and the same is affirmed.

BULICK v. MILKINT et al. (No. 4351.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Evidence \S 383(7)—Recital that certain part of consideration has been paid is prima facie evidence thereof, but open to explanation.

While a recital in a deed that a certain sum of money, being a part of the consideration, has been paid, and the receipt thereof acknowledged, is usually open to explanation, and is not conclusive of the facts stated, it is prima facie evidence thereof.

2. Evidence \S 220(1), 263(1)—Check reciting that it is payment in full, when used by payee, is admission of such statement, but may be overcome by contrary evidence.

A check given for a sum of money less than the apparent obligation of the drawer of the check to the payee therein, which recites on its face, however, that it is in full for the balance due on the obligation, describing it, is an admission upon the part of the payee of the check that the amount named therein is all that remains unpaid at that time, if he accepts the check and indorses and uses the same, which admission may be overcome, however, by evidence showing that such amount was not in fact the true balance remaining unpaid.

W. K. Pritt, of Parsons, for appellee.

RITZ, J. In this suit, brought for the purpose of subjecting to sale certain real estate in satisfaction of a vendor's lien, the plaintiff had a decree adjudging that a certain deferred purchase-money note for the sum of $1,000, with interest, was unpaid, and constituted a lien upon the real estate, and providing for a sale of the same in satisfaction thereof, to review which decree the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

It appears that plaintiff's decedent, Joe Bullick, sold to the defendant P. L. Milkint lots Nos. 115 and 116 in the town of Thomas for the consideration of $3,000. This transaction was had on the 1st of March, 1919, but, because of the absence of Bullick's attorney, the deed was not prepared until the 11th of March, 1919, and acknowledged on the 12th day of that month. This deed recites a consideration of $3,000, of which $1,000 was cash in hand paid, the receipt thereof being acknowledged in the deed, and the remainder was evidenced, according to the recitals of the deed, by two notes dated the 1st of March, 1919, due respectively at six and nine months from that date. It appears that Joe Bullick left his home in Thomas some time in the fall of that year and went to the city of New York with the purpose and intent of returning to his former home in Austria. He had with him the note due December 1, 1919, and turned it over to a banker in New York, by the name of Isador Hirz, to be collected, and the proceeds remitted to his wife who was left behind at Thomas. It appears that Bullick did not notify his wife that he was returning to his former home, but his reasons for clandestinely leaving are not apparent. He took a receipt from the New York banker to whom he delivered the note, and, on the eve of his expected departure for Europe, wrote his wife a letter advising her of his intention, and enclosing the receipt given him for the note, and also informing her that it would be collected by this banker and the proceeds sent to her. Before the time fixed for his departure he died, and the plaintiff here was appointed and duly qualified as administratrix of his estate. This note was presented for payment when it became due, and the defendant Milkint refused payment of the same, contending that he had paid the amount thereof to Joe Bullick long before its due date, to wit, in the month of August, 1919. The administratrix then brought this suit for the purpose of enforcing the vendor's lien reserved in the deed to secure the deferred payments of purchase money. Milkint answered the bill and asserted that he paid $1,000 at the time the transaction was closed, as recited in the deed; that in the month of May, 1919, in advance of the date when it was due, he paid off the first deferred note, and exhibited a receipt signed by Bullick showing this fact, as well as the note itself. He also averred in this answer that he paid off the second deferred note due December 1st to Bullick long before it was due; and produced a check for the sum of $350 paid in August, 1919, in which was contained a recital that it was in full of balance on note due December 1, 1919, and a like check for $28.33 given on the same date, which recites on its face that it was for interest on note, and a calculation discloses that it is for the exact amount of interest which would be due at its date upon the sum of $1,000 from March 1, 1919; and, by way of affirmative relief, he asked that the plaintiff be required to surrender the note to him, and that the lien upon the lots reserved in the deed be formally released of record.

Milkint, because of the death of Bullick, could not, of course, testify as to the personal transactions that he had with him, and the evidence to support his contention of payment is largely writings admitted to have been executed by Bullick in his lifetime. After the defendant's answer came in, the plaintiff amended her bill in an endeavor to explain the payments indicated in Milkint's answer, and to apply them to the cash payment recited in the deed instead of to the deferred notes, and it is insisted that, because Milkint made no formal answer to this amendment, its allegations are taken as true. There is nothing in this contention. The amendment is not substantial. It was only an attempt to explain a payment, which it is admitted by all parties was in fact made in some manner, and Milkint's answer to the original bill, setting up definitely all the facts in regard to the transaction, is a complete answer to all of the pleadings filed in the case by the plaintiff.

[1] The plaintiff contends that the recital in the deed that $1,000 of the purchase money was paid in cash, the receipt whereof was acknowledged, is not conclusive, but is subject to be rebutted by parol evidence, and the real facts shown. Just what is the effect of this recital in the deed? It seems to be very well established that such a recital is no more than an admission of payment, and that the grantor in the deed, or his personal representative, may show that in fact the payment was not made, or was in a different amount from that expressed in the deed, but that such recital is presumptive evidence that the transaction happened just as stated, until it is overcome by some competent proof. Flannagan v. Tie & Lumber Co., 77 W. Va. 158, 87 S. E. 165; Jones on Evidence, § 469; Wigmore on Evidence, § 2433; Shehy v. Cunningham, 81 Ohio St. 289, 90 N. E. 805, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1194, and note at page 1197; 10 R. C. L., title "Evidence" § 237; Click v. Green, 77 Va. 827. It seems quite clear that a recital in a deed such as is contained in the deed involved in this case is prima facie evidence of the facts recited. It has just exactly the same effect as a receipt showing the payment of money would have, and the effect of such a receipt is well established in this jurisdiction. Anderson v. Davis & Ould, 55 W. Va. 429, 47 S. E. 157; Onyx & Marble Co. v. Miller, 74 W. Va. 686, 82 S. E. 1078. It is not conclusive, but it is evidence that the payments recited to have been made were actually made, and is proof thereof, in the absence of evidence impeaching its integrity.

[2] In addition to the recital in the deed that $1,000 was paid in cash, the receipt of which was acknowledged, there is also introduced in evidence a check for $650, given by Milkint to Bullick on the 12th of March, 1919, the date on which the deed was delivered, and it is admitted by the plaintiff that this check was part of the cash payment. There is also introduced in evidence by the defendant, a receipt dated May 6, 1919, for the sum of $1,000, which recites upon its face that this sum was received in payment of the first deferred purchase-money note on lots 115 and 116, and the note itself is likewise produced by Milkint, and, as before stated, there is introduced in evidence a check given by Milkint to Bullick on the 19th of August, 1919, in which there is a recital that it is in full of the note due December 1, 1919, and another check given on the same date for the sum of $28.33, which recites that it is for interest on the note. It is shown by the bank officers that Bullick indorsed both of these checks and deposited them to the credit of his account on the day after their date. The plaintiff contends that the defendant has not proved the payment of the $3,000; that the $650 check of March 12th, the receipt given in May for $1,000, and the check of August, 1919, for $350, making $2,000 in the aggregate, is all the competent evidence offered showing the payment of the debt, and the court below accepted this view.

It cannot be doubted, from the authorities cited above, that the recital referred to in the deed is competent evidence to show the payment of the sum of $1,000, unless the plaintiff has successfully impeached it, and shown that that sum was not in fact paid at that time. It is admitted that the sum of $650 was then paid, but it is claimed that $350 of this cash payment was to be paid at a later date, and that some of the subsequent payments, or some part of them, must be applied to the discharge of this $350. The evidence offered by the plaintiff to impeach this recital in the deed is inconclusive and unsatisfactory. In fact, it may be said that it does not amount to evidence upon the question at all. The justice of the peace, who took the acknowledgment, testifies that at that time no money was paid by Milkint to Bullick, and he also says that the deed was not delivered at that time. Counsel for the plaintiff attempted to get him to say that there was some conversation in regard to a note being given, representing the cash payment, expressed in the deed, but he declined to make any statement of that kind, so that all his evidence amounts to is that there was nothing paid in his presence. Another witness, a brother of the plaintiff, testifies that, a short time after this sale, Joe Bullick showed him three notes signed by the defendant, but he did not know the amount of them, what they were for, or that they were notes except that Joe Bullick stated that they were, and, upon being shown one of the receipts introduced in evidence, which it appears bore no resemblance whatever to the notes, and which was signed by Bullick instead of by Milkint, he stated that the paper shown him by Bullick was like the paper exhibited upon the examination. This evidence is entirely insufficient to overthrow the acknowledgment of the receipt of the money contained in the deed. This acknowledgment is unequivocal, and the evidence to overcome it should at least be equally satisfactory and unequivocal. Such is not the case. We are therefore constrained to hold that the evidence proves that $1,000 was paid upon the delivery of the deed.

It is admitted that $1,000 was paid on the 6th of May, and, whether admitted or not, it is satisfactorily proven by a receipt introduced in evidence executed by Bullick, and by the first deferred purchase-money note offered in evidence by Milkint.

This leaves for consideration the last note due December 1st. That there was at least $350 paid on this note there can be no question. There is no attempt made to show that Bullick did not get the check for $350 above referred to, or that it was not then in exactly the same condition that it was when offered in evidence, that is, that it contained a recital that it paid the balance of the note due December 1st; nor is there any attempt to show that such was not the fact. What is the effect of this recital in the check received by Bullick and indorsed and collected by him? In the case of Polino v. Keck, 80 W. Va. 426, 92 S. E. 665, a check containing a recital that it was in full of account was offered in evidence and insisted upon as barring a right to recover, and we held, in that case, that the effect of such a recital in the check was the same as if a receipt had been given containing the language used therein; that it was subject to explanation but would be proof of payment unless overcome by some evidence. This, it occurs to us, settles the question here. If Bulick had given a receipt to Milkint for the sum of money for which the check was given, and recited in that receipt that it was in full of the balance of the note due December 1, 1919, this would have been equivalent to saying $650 of this note has been paid, and this $350 represents the remainder thereof, which is now paid. The recital in the check accepted and indorsed by Bulick must be taken to mean exactly the same thing, and to be an admission upon his part. It is not in any way contradicted or explained, and fully proves the payment of the note sued on in this case. The fact that the check given for interest on the same day is for an amount which exactly equals the interest on $1,000, from March 1st to August 19, 1919, is also significant.

We are clearly of the opinion that the evidence shows that the purchase money for these lots has been fully paid, and the court below should have so decreed. We will enter that decree here, and will remand the cause to the circuit court with directions to have the note delivered up to the defendant for cancellation, and the lien reserved in the deed properly released.

WOODYARD v. SAYRE et al. (No. 4305.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Mortgages §319(1)—Burden of proving payment on mortgage.

Where a deed, absolute on its face, conveys real estate for a consideration equal to its value, and the personal representative of the grantor sues to have it declared and treated as a mortgage, and it is admitted by the grantee to be a mortgage to secure payment of indebtedness owing to him, it is error to cancel said deed until it is established that the indebtedness is paid. The burden of proving payment, by a preponderance of evidence, is on the personal representative.

2. Executors and administrators §221(9)—Decedent's protested check and negotiable notes in payee's hands prima facie evidence of debt against the estate.

A protested check and negotiable notes, executed by a decedent a short time before his death, and in the hands of the payee, are prima facie evidence of indebtedness against the estate, and, when produced and filed in a proper suit, the burden of proving payment rests upon the administrator, by a preponderance of the evidence.

3. Executors and administrators §83(5)(4)—Decedent's creditor's possession of bank stock is prima facie evidence of creditor's absolute or conditional ownership, and the burden of proof is on the administrator seeking to recover it.

Possession of a certificate of shares of bank stock, held by a creditor of a decedent at the time of his death, is prima facie evidence of the ownership thereof by the creditor, either absolute or conditional, and, if the administrator of the decedent seeks to recover the stock, the burden is upon him to successfully rebut such evidence of ownership in the creditor.

4. Witnesses §178(3)—Administrator relying on cross-examination of party waives objection to his evidence which otherwise might be incompetent.

And in such case, if the administrator relies upon cross-examination of the possessor of the stock to disprove such absolute or conditional ownership, he thereby makes him his witness, and waives objection to his evidence, which otherwise might have been incompetent.

5. Discovery §27—Answers to interrogatories in bill of discovery held to constitute prima facie evidence for answering party.

Answers under oath to interrogatories propounded in a bill for discovery, which are responsive, full, complete, and unequivocal, constitute prima facie evidence in favor of the answering party, of the facts therein contained.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wirt County.

Action by William Woodyard, as administrator of the estate of Harry Sayre, deceased, against Lizzie Sayre and others, and, from a decree therein, the defendant H. P. Bode appeals. Reversed and annulled in part, and decree for defendant in part.

See, also, 110 S. E. 689.

V. B. Archer, of Parkersburg, for appellant.

T. A. Brown and C. M. Hanna, both of Parkersburg, for appellee.

LIVELY, J. From a decree of the circuit court of Wirt county, entered November 29, 1920, an appeal and supersedeas is prosecuted by H. P. Bode.

This decree divests Bode of his legal title to, and equitable interest in, a house and lot in the city of Huntington in Cabell county, and vests the title in the estate of Harry Sayre; divests him of title to, and possession of, a certificate of 5 shares of stock of the Wirt County Bank, delivered to him by Sayre, and in Bode's possession at the time of the institution of this suit; renders a personal judgment against him for $168, in favor of said estate; disallows certain notes as indebtedness against it; and decrees a protested check of the decedent in his favor as an unsecured debt.

Plaintiff, as administrator of Sayre's estate, filed his bill for the purpose of marshaling assets, converting the real estate into money, ascertaining and paying the indebtedness, and distributing the remainder, if any there should be, to the heirs. The bill charged that Bode held title to the house and lot in Huntington in trust, the exact nature of which was unknown to plaintiff, and asked for full discovery from Bode of the terms, conditions, and provisions of the trust, and propounded interrogatories for that purpose. It also averred the possession of the certificate of shares of bank stock by Bode, alleging that the latter claimed to hold the same as collateral security for a debt owing by Sayre to him, and that he was demanding payment of his debts against the estate, and refused to surrender possession of the certificate until payment was made to him. Bode answered the bill, stating specifically and fully his transactions with Sayre, the amount of the debts he claimed, how and when contracted, when due, when and for what purpose the house and lot was deeded to him, and how and for what purpose he held the certificate of stock. The interrogatories propounded were fully and unequivocally answered, both with reference to the Huntington property and the bank stock.

The cause was referred to a commissioner in chancery, before whom Bode appeared, unaccompanied by counsel, and presented his evidence of indebtedness against the estate, consisting of a protested check in his favor, signed by Sayre, for the sum of $1,956, dated November 18, 1918, which was a few days before the maker's death; a note of $850, signed by Sayre, dated June 15, 1916, payable at 4 months, to order of Bode, at the First National Bank of Marietta, Ohio; and a like note for $853.33, dated the same day and payable in 4 months at said bank, less $57.87 interest paid June 15, 1917. He exhibited the certificate of bank stock with a memorandum attached, made by him at the time of the delivery of the stock to him, showing that he had loaned at that time $500 to Sayre, and that he held this stock for repayment of the loan. He was then examined at great length by counsel for the administrator, by the commissioner, and by counsel representing a bonding company, which was surety on the decedent's official bond as sheriff of Wirt county. From this examination it was shown that Sayre and Bode had dealt with each other extensively in the purchase and sale of live stock, horses, mules, and the like for many years, and up until Sayre's death. In the year 1914 Sayre was indebted to Bode in the sum of $1,700, and desired a loan of $300, to secure which he made the deed to the Huntington property on March 11, 1914, which deed was duly placed on record. A short time before Sayre's death, on November 18, 1918, they had a settlement, when it was ascertained that Sayre owed, in addition to the notes, the sum of $1,956, for which he gave this check. Said check was protested for nonpayment, and Sayre was notified, and stated he would at once deposit a sufficient sum in the bank to meet the check, but unfortunately died a very short time thereafter. It also appeared, from this examination, that, since 1914, Bode had paid the taxes on the Huntington property and had collected, through Davis as agent, the rents which, less taxes, repairs, and commissions, were credited on the indebtedness, and accounted for in the settlement; that since Sayre's death he had received $168 from rents, which should be credited on the indebtedness; that the property was held by Bode in trust to secure the payment of his said indebtedness, a fact which he had freely admitted both before and after Sayre's death, and so told the administrator when he came to see him about the property. In the cross-examination by Mr. Brown, of counsel for the administrator, he also detailed fully the circumstances under which he became the possessor of the bank stock, and for which stock he had loaned to Sayre $200 in cash and delivered to him certain live stock in the year 1917. There was no evidence before the commissioner to show release of the trust property, or payment of the various notes or the check.

We find nothing in the record which controverts the evidence of Bode, or which is not entirely consistent with his claims of indebtedness, except the evidence of G. W. Roberts, a creditor of the estate, wherein he undertakes to detail a conversation with Bode in Robert's storeroom after Sayre's death and in which he says that Bode said he held title to the Huntington property and wound up the remark by saying that he did not have a dollar against it; and the statement of the administrator that Bode had told him that he (Bode) would make a deed for the property to any one he designated, that he had nothing in the property, and simply held it in trust for Sayre. These alleged conversations are entirely inconsistent with the evidence of Bode, his sworn answer and his conduct, all buttressed by the notes and protested check, given eight days before Sayre's death. The mortgage on the property (admitted to be such), the existence of the notes and check, the possession of the stock certificate with memorandum attached thereto, were sufficient proof of the indebtedness claimed, and the burden was upon the plaintiff to show payment. He offered nothing to this end. Apparently the administrator had no evidence to offer, showing payment, and it seems that the attorney for the bonding company assumed to conduct the cross-examination of Bode, for the purpose of showing payments or credits to which the estate was entitled. After he had testified, counsel for the administrator, not finding anything of benefit in the testimony, objected to his evidence as incompetent. It is now insisted that Bode's evidence did not establish his claims. If the lengthy and searching cross-examination of Bode be stricken out in its entirety, we do not think the plaintiff has carried the burden of proof to overcome the prima facie case made by appellant. It will be remembered that Bode's deed was unconditional and, on its face, conveyed to him absolute title; his possession of the shares of stock created presumptive ownership; and hence it may be that his cross-examination evidence, even if it had been given in chief, being adverse to his absolute interest in the properties, would be admissible under the statute. However, this is a suggestion only, and, not necessarily arising here, is not decided.

[1-3] The commissioner reported that Bode claimed the stock as security for a debt, which debt was not proven by competent evidence, although it showed that Bode was in possession of the stock at the time of Sayre's death. As to the Huntington property, he reported that there was no competent proof of Bode's debt and therefore that the property belonged to the estate of Sayre, held in trust by Bode, but free from the trust claimed by him. The commissioner "after some hesitation" reported the protested check of $1,956 as an unsecured debt in favor of Bode. He reported against allowing either of the notes as debts. The rents collected by Bode after Sayre's death, amounting to $168 were reported as an obligation due the estate. Bode took exceptions to all of these findings of the commissioner, but the court overruled them and pronounced the decree, the substance of which is hereinbefore recited. The production and filing of the trust deed, notes, protested check, and certificate of stock do not fall within the prohibition of section 23, c. 130, of the Code (sec. 4879), as relating to personal transactions or communications between Bode and Sayre. These are silent witnesses and speak for themselves. The notes and check are evidences of debt. The burden of proving payment was on the administrator. Dodrill v. Gregory, 60 W. Va. 118, 53 S. E. 922. We are unable to find the slightest evidence to discharge this burden. The commissioner reported against allowing these notes as debts against the estate, because he was unable to ascertain whether they had been paid by the protested check, or whether the check was given in settlement of them. Bode testified that they were not, but he considered his evidence incompetent for that purpose and rejected it. But where is the evidence to the contrary? Both notes and check were in Bode's possession and imported valuable consideration. The shares of stock, evidenced by the certificate, are personal estate, and were transferable by delivery. Lipscomb v. Condon, 56 W. Va. 416, 49 S. E. 392, 67 L. R. A. 670, 107 Am. St. Rep. 938. Bode's possession evidenced some title or right therein. He was asked to discover his right of ownership or possession by the bill, to which he responded fully in his answer. He was cross-examined by counsel for the administrator in order to ascertain the character of the consideration paid for the stock, by which it was elicited that $500 had been loaned to Sayre with right of redemption, and a memorandum to that effect made at the time of the loan in 1917, and attached to the certificate. By such cross-examination, upon a matter not testified to by Bode in chief, the administrator made him his witness in that particular and is bound by the answers. McGuire, Administrator, v. Railroad, 70 W. Va. 538, 543, 74 S. E. 859; Miller v. Miller's Administrator, 92 Va. 510, 23 S. E. 891. Upon the character of Bode's trust on the Huntington property, he was examined minutely by counsel representing the bonding company, and freely and fully explained when, where, for what purposes, and under what circumstances the deed was made to him, fully sustaining the facts set out in the answer. Davis, the agent in charge of the Huntington property, said that, after the deed was made, he was directed by either Sayre or Bode, or possibly both, to collect rents and remit to Bode. The testimony of Underwood, who had agreed to buy the house and lot from Sayre, by exchange of his farm in Wirt county, clearly evinces the ownership and interest of Bode therein. Bode inspected the farm of Underwood for the purpose of ascertaining its value, and took an active part in the proposed trade. This was a short time before Sayre's death. If he had no interest in the property why did he expend time and money in its proposed sale?

The deed, notes, check, and possession of the stock establish a prima facie case of indebtedness against the estate, and that the properties were held, at least, as security for the payment; and this prima facie case has not been successfully overthrown by the evidence; on the contrary, it has been strengthened.

There is another cogent reason why the deed to the Huntington house and lot should have been adjudged to be held in trust to secure appellant's debts, and why the certificate of bank stock should have been decreed as collateral security for the payment of the loan of $500. The bill charges that the deed to the house and lot was not an absolute deed, but was a trust, the exact nature of which was unknown to plaintiff, and it asked for a full discovery from Bode, under oath, of the terms, conditions, and provisions of the trust under which he held, and propound-ed interrogatories for that purpose, to be answered by him; as to the bank stock, it charged that Bode had possession thereof as collateral security for money advanced to Sayre in his lifetime, as claimed by Bode, and also propounded interrogatories seeking discovery of the right by which he held the stock, and, if as a security for a debt, then to state when and what amount he advanced, with full particulars of the transactions. These interrogatories, as before stated, were fully, specifically, and unequivocally answered. His cross-examination confirmed and strengthened his answers. Can we consider the answers as evidence? If so, how has it been met by the administrator?

The bill, so far as Bode is concerned, is a mixed bill of discovery. It has a different status from the ordinary bill. Plaintiff, having no evidence of the right of his intestate to the house and lot and to the stock, has sought to make appellant his witness by requiring him to answer interrogatories, under oath, and to ascertain from him the true ownership. He has asked for a full statement of the dealings between Bode and his intestate, and specifically, if there are any money claims against the properties, and if so when, where, how, and for what purposes contracted. Can these answers be treated as nullities, without probative value, at the option of plaintiff? How can it be said that no indebtedness has been proven in consideration of the full answers to these interrogatories backed by the notes, check, and possession of the properties? Answers to interrogatories in bills for discovery are very generally held to be evidence, but not conclusive, and may be contradicted by other testimony. 18 C. J. p. 1108, § 95, title "Conclusiveness of Answer," and authorities cited. In this connection we have considered the case of Knight v. Nease, 53 W. Va. 51, 44 S. E. 414, wherein it is held that answers to interrogatories propounded in a suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance cannot be considered as evidence for defendant. That suit was for the purpose of setting aside a deed from Nease to Lleving, his father-in-law, of a tract of land made in fraud of plaintiff, who held a note against Nease at the date of the deed. The interrogatories were made to search the consciences of defendants as to payment of valuable consideration and the bona fides of the transaction. Necessarily, the bill charged fraud. The burden of rebutting the fraud was upon defendants, the vendee and his son-in-law. Lleving, the father-in-law, answered the bill and interrogatories, claiming to be an innocent purchaser of the land for value. It was incumbent upon him to sustain these answers by evidence sufficient to overcome the charges of fraud, which evidence he failed to produce. The interrogatories were not necessary, for it was incumbent upon defendants, in order to fully answer the bill, to incorporate therein the substance of the data asked for by the interrogatories. That case is different from the case under consideration. Here there is no charge of fraud or of bad faith, simply a discovery in aid of a proper administration of the estate.

[4, 5] The administrator has asked the appellant to speak about personal transactions with his decedent, about which the statute sealed his lips. But the broad statement is made in Knight v. Nease, supra, that in no case is an answer now entitled to any weight as evidence, by virtue of sections 36, 38 and 59 of chapter 125, Code (secs. 4790, 4792, 4813), citing Rogers v. Verlander, 80 W. Va. 619, 5 S. E. 847; and Judge Brannon's dissenting opinion in Johnson v. Riley, 41 W. Va. 147, 23 S. E. 698. It will be observed that the two cases last cited, like Knight v. Nease, were suits to set aside conveyances as fraudulent, and the observations therein are not properly applicable to answers to interrogatories in bills of discovery.

The rule therein announced, that answers to bills are not evidence for defendant, is based upon our statute, chapter 125 of the Code. Does this statute, properly construed, divest answers to interrogatories in bills of discovery of probative value? Section 36 of chapter 125 of the Code makes true and not requiring proof every material allegation of the bill, and every material allegation in the answer constituting claim for affirmative relief, which is not denied; section 38 requires verification of the bill, if the answer is desired under oath; but if the bill be not verified, then the answer need not be verified, but, if the answer be verified, it has no more weight than if not verified; and section 59 provides that, when a material allegation of the bill is denied by the answer, it puts the plaintiff to proof of the averment. These sections apply where there is an issue, an affirmation of some right and a denial of it. By section 48 (sec. 4802) of the same chapter, where interrogatories are propounded, defendant may be attached, or brought into court by an order for the purpose of answering the interrogatories, although the bill may have been taken for confessed as to him. Does not this contemplate that the information, as disclosed by the answers, shall be of some value as evidence? If not, why should a vain thing be required? If evidence for plaintiff, why not for defendant? Plaintiff cannot sift the answers thus obtained and use that portion favorable to him and discard that which is unfavorable. All must be considered or none. This section (48) seems not to have been considered in the case of Knight v. Nease, supra. A defendant may be forced, by compulsory process, to testify by answers to specific questions. Plaintiff is not conclusively bound by the answers. He may overcome them by satisfactory evidence. If they have no weight, it is difficult to perceive any good reason for bringing them in to the case. Certainly the drastic step authorized by the statute meant that the replies should be given some importance in arriving at a just adjudication of the matters involved. Moreover, in the cases cited above, there was an issue between the parties; the defendants were charged with fraud in making the conveyances attacked. There is no such issue here, no controversy; plaintiff is seeking the aid of Bode in the proper settlement of the estate.

Now, since all parties are allowed to be witnesses, discovery is less needed than formerly, and less frequently asked by technical bills of discovery, which in practice have been largely superseded by other methods of ascertaining the facts from the parties. But there are instances where a party has some important knowledge of a material fact and remains silent, thus requiring discovery. Section 48 provides for such cases. In the case at bar, the rule of evidence prescribed by section 23, c. 130, Code, prevented Bode from voluntarily testifying about his transactions with Sayre, out of which his title and possession of the property arose. He was relieved from that rule of evidence by the administrator of Sayre, when he was called upon to testify in relation thereto under oath. The case of Knight v. Nease, so far as it, by its general and broad terms, holds that answers to interrogatories in cases of this character are not to be considered as evidence, is disapproved. It will be observed that all of the above sections of chapter 125 of the Code were in the same chapter of the Code of 1868, bearing the same section numbers. The only addition (made in 1882) is to the latter part of section 88, as follows:

"A general replication to an answer claiming affirmative relief, shall not apply to so much of said answer as states facts constituting a claim to such relief."

This addition has no bearing upon the question now under consideration. In the case of Jones v. Cunningham, 7 W. Va. 707, 713, Judge Haymond said:

"When the plaintiff, by bill of discovery, seeks a discovery from the defendant as to any matter of fact, the answer is evidence for the defendant so far as it is responsive to such bill, as to the fact as to which discovery is sought; yet as to matter in respect of which the bill seeks no discovery, if the answer alleges anything affirmatively, it is not evidence for the defendant, but it is to be proved by him. Taylor v. Moore, 2 Rand. 575 and 576, opinion of Judge Green; 2 Rob. (Old) Prac. 330."

The provisions of chapter 125, Code, above referred to were then in existence. We regard this case as in point, specific discovery having been sought therein, and of equal, if not superior, authority to Knight v. Nease. The courts of Virginia have consistently held to the rule that, in order to overcome the evidential effect of an answer to a mixed bill of discovery, it is necessary to have a certain amount of opposing proof. Shenandoah Land Co. v. Clarke, 106 Va. 100, 55 S. E. 561. The Virginia rule is stated in Thompson v. Clark, 81 Va. 428, as follows:

"By that rule the answer is treated as evidence, including its affirmative statements of fact which are pertinent to the discovery sought by the bill, and is conclusive, unless overcome by the testimony of two opposing witnesses, or of one witness corroborated by other circumstances, or by corroborating circumstances or documentary evidence alone."

This decision followed the case of Fant v. Miller, 17 Grat. (Va.) 187, which is the principal case, and which has been approved in Morrison v. Grubb, 23 Grat. (Va.) 350; Corbin v. Mills, 19 Grat. (Va.) 438; Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Grat. (Va.) 663; Shultz v. Hansbrough, 33 Grat. (Va.) 581; Bell v. Moon, 79 Va. 849; and Batchelder v. White, 80 Va. 109. See monographic note to Tate v. Vance, 27 Grat. (Va.) 571, Va. Reports Annotated, p. 599.

We think the sections of chapter 125 of the Code, above referred to, were not intended to, and do not, take from answers to interrogatories propounded in bills for discovery all value as evidence. On the contrary we think such answers, in so far as they are responsive to the interrogatories, are prima facie evidence of the matters therein contained. They may be rebutted and overthrown by evidence satisfactory to the chancellor. The answers of Bode to plaintiff's interrogatories are responsive, full, complete, and unequivocal, are evidence in his favor, and have not been overcome by plaintiff.

The court erred in not sustaining the exceptions of appellant to the commissioner's report. The decree will be reversed and annulled in so far as it divests appellant of his equitable interest in the house and lot in Huntington, Cabell county, W. Va.; divests him of his equitable title to the 5 shares of capital stock of the Wirt County Bank, as security for the repayment to him of his debt of $500, secured thereby; disallows the two notes, one for $850 and the other for $853.33, both dated June 18, 1916; decrees the $1,956 protested check as an unsecured debt; and renders judgment against appellant for $168, rents collected by him from the Huntington property since Sayre's death. In all other respects the decree is not disturbed.

Reversed and remanded.

SWIGER v. RUNNION. (No. 4308.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 21, 1922. Rehearing Denied
April 4, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Damages \S 216(1)—In an action for damages resulting from automobile collision, an instruction as to damages allowable to plaintiff for injuries to his wife and child held erroneous.

Where action is brought to recover damages arising from an automobile collision for injuries to plaintiff and to plaintiff's automobile, for expenses incurred in effecting the cure of injuries to plaintiff's wife and child, and for loss of her services during her illness consequent upon such injuries, it is error to give a general instruction to the jury that, if they find that defendant negligently permitted his automobile to run into plaintiff's and thereby injured plaintiff and his wife and child, or any of them, then the jury shall find for the plaintiff, and assess such damages as they believe from the evidence he is entitled to, because such instruction does not properly limit or define the damages for which plaintiff is entitled to recover for the injuries received by his wife and child.

2. Trial \S 253(4)—Instruction held error because ignoring the defense of contributory negligence.

In an action for personal injuries, growing out of a collision of automobiles on a public road, where the defense relied on is plaintiff's contributory negligence, it is error to instruct the jury that, if they believe that at the time of the collision the defendant's automobile was not on his right-hand side of the road, there is a presumption that defendant was at that time guilty of negligence, and he is liable to plaintiff for the injuries sustained, and that defendant is not relieved from such liability even though the jury may believe that plaintiff did not have his automobile under control at the time, because such instruction ignores such defense.

3. Highways \S 184(4)—In action for personal injuries, refusal of an instruction on contributory negligence held error.

In an action for damages arising out of an automobile collision, where defendant relied upon plaintiff's contributory negligence as a defense, it was error to refuse the following instruction offered by him:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence in this case that, at the time of the injury and collision complained of in this case, that the plaintiff was running on a public highway at a greater rate of speed than is allowed by law, and did not have his automobile under control at the time of the accident, and as a result he collided with defendant's automobile, he cannot recover in this action because of contributory negligence, even if the jury may believe that at the time of the accident complained of the defendant was on the wrong side of the public road, and the jury should find for the defendant."

4. Damages \S 215(3)—Instruction on punitive damages held erroneous.

It is error to instruct the jury that, if they find the plaintiff is entitled to damages, they shall take into consideration the injuries sustained by him, and what amount is necessary to compensate him therefor, and that, if they further find that the defendant did the injuries complained of in a wanton or willful manner, or from a reckless indifference to the rights and safety of plaintiff or his property, they may find such further damages as they may believe the plaintiff is entitled to, in assessing punitive damages the correct rule being that, if the jury find that the acts complained of were malicious or wanton, or in reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights, they may allow punitive damages for such amount as, added to the actual damages sustained, will be sufficient to punish the defendant, and to deter others from committing like offenses.

Error to Circuit Court, Roane County.

Suit by C. C. Swiger against A. J. Runnion. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

Thos. P. Ryan, of Spencer, for plaintiff in error.

Harper & Baker, of Spencer, for defendant in error.

MEREDITH, J. Plaintiff, C. C. Swiger, sued defendant, A. J. Runnion, in trespass on the case for damages arising out of a collision of plaintiff's with defendant's automobile, about a quarter of a mile east of the city of Spencer, on the Spencer-Arnoldsburg pike. There are four counts to the declaration, covering injuries to the plaintiff's car, injuries to plaintiff, expenses incurred on account of injuries to his wife and child, and for loss of services of his wife during her consequent illness. There was a verdict for plaintiff. The court refusing to set aside the verdict on defendant's motion, judgment was entered for plaintiff, and defendant obtained a writ of error to this court.

Defendant's counsel complains in this court of the overruling of his demurrer to the declaration, but neither the printed record nor the original record, which is also before us, shows that any demurrer was entered in the court below. While the demurrer cannot be entered here, it may not be improper to say that, in our opinion, the declaration is sufficient.

From the record it appears that plaintiff was driving from Spencer and defendant was driving toward Spencer. The collision occurred at or a short distance beyond a curve in the road, plaintiff's car being on the inside of the curve. A small garage building which then stood about 3 feet from the inside curb obstructed the view of both parties for some distance at or near the curve. About 75 or 80 feet east of the garage there is a small bridge over which the road runs. About the farther end of the bridge defendant claims he passed two men with horses, and hence had to pass them on their left, thus throwing his car over on his left-hand side of the road, and that he passed the horses slowly, and that he did not have time to get his car fully over to his right-hand side of the road before the plaintiff's car, which, as defendant claims, was running at a very high rate of speed around the curve, struck defendant's car; defendant claims that plaintiff gave no warning, and did not have his car under proper control, considering all the circumstances, and he relies on plaintiff's contributory negligence as a bar to recovery. Plaintiff claims he gave proper warning, but that defendant was looking down into the bottom of his car, and paid no attention to the warning if he heard it; that he (plaintiff) had his car under proper control, and that the collision would not have occurred had defendant not been on plaintiff's side of the road. As is usual in such cases, each party seeks to justify himself and to place the whole blame on the other. We express no opinion as to which party is right; we make no comment further than is necessary to afford a clear understanding of the points raised as to the instructions given for plaintiff or refused for defendant.

[1] Defendant complains of instructions Nos. 1 to 5 given at plaintiff's instance. Instruction No. 1 tells the jury that, if they find that plaintiff was driving his car at a reasonable rate of speed, and with his car within his control, and on his right-hand side of the road, and that defendant carelessly and negligently permitted his car to run into plaintiff's car, and cause injury to plaintiff and his wife and child, or any of them, then the jury shall assess such damages for the plaintiff as they believe he is entitled to, not exceeding the amount sued for.

The objection to this instruction is that it does not limit or point out the kind of damages for which plaintiff might recover because of injuries to the wife or child. He could recover for the expense incurred by him in effecting their cure and for loss of services of his wife during her consequent illness, but not for permanent injuries to her or the child, or for their pain and suffering. We think the court should not have given this instruction without modification.

[2] Plaintiff's instruction No. 3 is as follows:

"The court further instructs you that, if you believe that, at the time the automobiles of plaintiff and defendant collided with each other, as described in the evidence, that the automobile of defendant was not on his right-hand side of the road, that the presumption is that defendant was at that time guilty of negligence, and is liable to the plaintiff for any injuries sustained by him, by his wife and child then with him, and to his automobile, and defendant is not relieved from such liability even though you may believe that plaintiff did not have his automobile under control at the time."

This instruction practically told the jury that defendant had no defense; that, no matter if plaintiff were driving his car at too high a speed, or for that or any other reason may have lost control of his car, and thereby contributed to or caused the injury, yet the defendant was liable because he was on the wrong side. If they were both at fault, and if plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury, then plaintiff cannot recover. It was plaintiff's duty to have his car under control; not merely such control as might enable him to guide the car and keep it in the road, but such control as would enable him to stop it within half the distance that the road was in view, as required by section 118, c. 66, Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, c. 43, § 118 [sec. 1940—118]). The collision occurred near a curve, and both parties were familiar with the road at that point, and both knew of the frequent use of automobiles upon this road. We think this instruction should not have been given, because it ignores the defense of contributory negligence.

Instruction No. 4 has the same vice that is contained in Nos. 1 and 2, relative to the kind of damages for which the plaintiff might recover, and also directs the jury to find for the plaintiff "unless it affirmatively appears that such collision was the fault of said plaintiff." It must be remembered that defendant was not, under the defense of contributory negligence, required to show that plaintiff was wholly at fault; if plaintiff's negligence in part contributed to the injury, the plaintiff could not recover.

Instruction No. 5 is proper in so far as it covers compensatory damages, but as to punitive damages is directly contrary to many decisions of this court. While the instruction does not mention punitive damages by that name, it tells the jury they may, in addition to the damages necessary to compensate the plaintiff for the injuries sustained, also find such further damages as they may believe the plaintiff is entitled to in case they believe the defendant did the injuries complained of in a wanton or willful manner, or from a reckless indifference to the rights and safety of the plaintiff and his property. As was said by Judge Ritz in the case of Goodman v. Klein, 87 W. Va. 292, 298, 104 S. E. 726:

"The correct rule for the allowance of exemplary damages is that if the jury determine that the acts complained of are malicious or wanton, and in reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights, they may allow exemplary damages for such amount as taken together with the actual damages will be sufficient to punish the defendant and deter others from committing like offenses."

To the same effect are the cases of Clairborne v. Railway Co., 46 W. Va. 363, 83 S. E. 262; Allen v. Lopinsky, 81 W. Va. 13, 91 S. E. 369; Hess v. Marinari, 81 W. Va. 500, 94 S. E. 968; Pendleton v. Railway Co., 82 W. Va. 270, 95 S. E. 941; and Fisher v. Fisher, 89 W. Va. 199, 108 S. E. 872.

[3, 4] Defendant also complains of the court's refusal to give his instruction No. 2 as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence in this case that, at the time of the injury and collision complained of in this case, that the plaintiff was running on a public highway at a greater rate of speed than is allowed by law, and did not have his automobile under control at the time of the accident, and as a result he collided with the defendant's automobile, he cannot recover in this action because of contributory negligence, even if the jury may believe that at the time of the accident complained of the defendant was on the wrong side of the public road, and the jury should find for the defendant."

The court seems to have tried the case on the theory that, if defendant was on the wrong side of the road when the collision occurred, he had no defense; that this in and of itself constituted such an offense against the law of the road that, no matter whether the plaintiff was negligent or not, the defendant is liable. The record does not disclose whether the place of the collision is inside the corporate limits of Spencer or in a "closely built up" section, as defined by section 117, c. 68, Acts 1917 (Code Supp. 1918, § 117 [sec. 1940—117]) or not. If it were not, it was not unlawful for defendant to drive his car on the left-hand side of the road. Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 Pac. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Staten v. Monroe (Tex. Civ. App. 1912) 150 S. W. 222; Giles v. Ternes, 93 Kan. 140, 143 Pac. 491; Linstroth v. Peper (Mo. App. 1916) 188 S. W. 1125; Baker v. Zimmerman, 179 Iowa, 272, 161 N. W. 479. Of course when they approached each other it was the duty of each to pass to the right; but defendant contends that plaintiff was driving so fast defendant did not have time to turn to the right and get out of his way; that plaintiff was coming at such a rapid rate of speed that he did not have his car under control, such control as would enable him to stop his car within the distance required by law, and hence defendant contends that if, as a result, the collision occurred he is not liable because of plaintiff's contributory negligence. Defendant was entitled to this instruction, and it was error to refuse it. We do not think this error was cured by the other instructions given.

Defendant's instruction No. 7 should have been given, but its refusal was not error, as its substance is covered by defendant's instruction No. 6, which was given, and we see no error in the court's refusal to give defendant's instruction No. 8 as offered, and giving it in its modified form.

For the errors of the court in giving plaintiff's instructions 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and in refusing to give defendant's instruction No. 2, we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for a new trial.

STATE v. GOLDEN. (No. 4387.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Criminal law § 473—Physician's testimony as to age of fetus held admissible to show pregnancy by another than defendant, as tending to show consent.

In a prosecution for rape, where the prosecutrix fixes the time and place of the assault, and testifies that as a result thereof she became pregnant, and had a miscarriage within three months from the time of the assault, and that she never had other sexual intercourse either before or after the time of the assault, testimony of the physician, who attended her miscarriage, to the effect that the fetus had been conceived "in the neighborhood of 8 to 4 months" prior to its delivery, is admissible as tending to show that the prosecutrix had become pregnant by some other person, and as tending to prove consent, thus sustaining defendant, who swears he had intercourse with her by her free consent.

2. Criminal law § 473—Where attending physician stated sex of fetus was easily ascertained, contradictory testimony of other physicians held admissible.

In such case, where the attending physician swears that the sex of the fetus was easily ascertained by casual examination, evidence of other physicians is admissible to prove that the sex of a fetus cannot be ascertained by such inspection until four months from the date of its conception.

3. Criminal law § 594(1), 600(2)—Where defendant will otherwise be deprived of material evidence, affidavit of absent witness should be admitted or hearing postponed.

Where it is plainly apparent that a misunderstanding has innocently arisen between opposing counsel as to the introduction of an affidavit at the trial, in lieu of the testimony of a witness who has been summoned, but who has left the state on urgent business, and whose evidence is material and vital to the defense in a prosecution for rape, and by reason thereof defendant will be deprived of such evidence, the court should either permit such affidavit to be admitted as evidence, or continue the hearing until the attendance of such witness could be procured.

4. Criminal law §936(1)—New trial awarded where defendant has been deprived of material testimony by surprise.

Where a defendant in a criminal case, without fault on his part, has been deprived of material and vital evidence in his defense by surprise, thus preventing a fair trial, the verdict should be set aside and a new trial awarded.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. Rape §54(1)—Prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony is sufficient.

Prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony is sufficient to sustain verdict convicting of rape.

6. Rape §49(2), 57(1)—Prosecutrix's failure to make prompt complaint may be explained, and value of testimony is for the jury.

Failure of prosecutrix to make prompt complaint of the alleged rape may be explained as being through fear of being sent away as threatened by her foster mother, "if she ever did any such thing," its value being for the jury.

7. Rape §40(1, 3)—Evidence of prosecutrix's reputation for chastity and of other illicit sexual acts is admissible to show resistance unlikely.

In a prosecution for rape evidence of prosecutrix's reputation for chastity, and of acts of illicit intercourse with other men, was admissible to show that prosecutrix's resistance was unlikely, and to corroborate defendant's testimony that she told him at the time that she "had been out with other boys" and had consented.

8. Criminal law §656(2)—Court's remarks as to cross-examination of prosecutrix criticised.

Where prosecutrix testified that the rape took place at time of her menstrual flow, and that she had an absorbent pad pinned to her underclothing, and the defense theory was that she had no flow at such time, and it became material on cross-examining prosecutrix to inquire what disposition she made of such pad, the court's statement to defendant's counsel, "I want you to understand that this girl is only a child and not much latitude will be allowed in your examination of her; you can ask this one question, but you cannot go into this any further," held subject to criticism.

Error to Circuit Court, Mineral County.

John Golden was convicted of rape, and he brings error. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

H. G. Shores, of Keyser, J. Philip Roman, of Cumberland, Md., and F. M. Reynolds, of Keyser, for plaintiff in error.

E. T. England, Atty. Gen., R. Dennis Steed, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Arthur Arnold, Pros. Atty., of Piedmont, for the State.

LIVELY, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, and on the 3d day of June, 1921, sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for 10 years, and prosecutes this writ of error.

The prosecutrix, Thelma Graham, who had been adopted in the family of Herbert Short, and who was known as Thelma Short, was 14 years and 5 months old at the time of the alleged rape. She was fairly well developed physically and weighed 122 pounds. The defendant was 31 years of age, was married, of well-developed physique, and weighed about 175 pounds. These two persons were casually known to each other, possibly having nothing more than a speaking acquaintance. The prosecutrix testified that on the 13th day of December, 1920, about the hour of 8 o'clock p. m., she had been sent on an errand to a downtown store, and while performing that errand she observed defendant, who preceded her in a small Chevrolet touring car, and waited for her on another street, where he stopped his car and asked her to come over, that he had something to tell her; that after some conversation, in which he asked her to take a drive with him, she finally consented and got in the front seat of the car with him, and they drove out of town about three miles to a bridge on the turnpike which spanned a small stream, where he turned his car and came back in the direction of Keyser until he reached a lane near the house of a Mr. Paris, which lane led up near to what was called the red barn. He stopped the car about 35 or 40 yards from the main road, which was at that time frequently traveled, automobiles passing in either direction continuously, and within about 100 yards of the residence of Mr. Paris and somewhat nearer to the red barn. She testified that, after stopping the car and working a short time with some of the machinery, he got back in the car, and "stood her up" behind the front seat, and then climbed over the front seat, sat her down upon the rear seat of the car, sat down by her, put his arm around her, and "loved her a little," kissed her, and then by force and against her will laid her on the back seat and had intercourse with her. She testified that she "hollered," was scared, and resisted until her strength gave out; that in about 10 minutes he drove away, having placed her in the front seat with him, and took her back to the city of Keyser, conversing with her upon general topics while on the way; that she alighted from the car near her home on an unfrequented street, and thence went to her foster parents' residence. After then explaining to her foster parents that she had been detained down town on the errand she had started to run, as an excuse for not returning earlier, she went into the kitchen, where she obtained a newspaper and was reading it when her foster mother came in.

She told her foster mother she was going to bed, and her foster mother said, "Yes; it is time to go to bed," and then she, prosecutrix, retired for the night. The reason she gave why she did not divulge the alleged crime was because, as she said, her foster mother had told her if she ever did anything of that kind she would be sent to some institution or home, presumably some place of correction for such girls. There was nothing unusual about her appearance; her clothing was in no way disarranged or torn; no marks or bruises about her body, and nothing unusual in her demeanor, except, as stated by Mr. Short, that she appeared stupid and "did not act like herself at all." She said that she was menstruating at the time of the assault, and described the clothes she wore, including an absorbent pad. According to her testimony she became with child as a result of the alleged rape, but said nothing about the crime until about the 1st of March, when her condition impelled inquiry on the part of her foster parents, at which time she told them that a rape had been committed upon her by the defendant, as above set out. She swore that she never had illicit, carnal intercourse with any other person before or after this time.

The version of the affair by the defendant is altogether different from that stated by the prosecutrix. He said he was standing in front of Evans' jewelry store on some day during Christmas week, in company with Frank Githens and Elmer Wilson, when this girl passed them. A short time thereafter he got in his car, and he again saw her on another street, and he asked her if she would take a ride with him; and she replied that she would like to go, but was afraid because her people were watching her; and, after making an appointment to meet him on Orchard street, he subsequently drove to that street, where he took her in the car and rode with her out to the bridge, as testified to by her, and there turned and came back to the intersecting road next to the red barn, where he turned out of the main road up toward the barn, where the car was stopped; and, after asking her to get over in the rear seat, he there sat down by her and "courted her," hugged her, kissed her, and asked her if she had ever been out with any other men; and, after some conversation along that line, he made a proposition to her to which she consented, and that he had intercourse with her without objection on her part, but with her consent readily given. He testified that while it was dark the car could be readily seen from the main road, which was nearby and frequented at the time, many automobiles passing along over it, or from the residence of Mr. Paris, if any one had come out, or from the barn, which was somewhat near. The minutiae of the sordid affair were detailed by him. He further stated that after getting his car started out of the lane she got in the front seat, where he sat down by her, and took her back to a place near her residence, and at her request, put her off at a street near her home. He is in part corroborated by Frank Githens, who testified that he was in company with defendant near the jewelry store at the time designated.

Thus it will be seen that the act of intercourse actually occurred near the time and place stated by the principal actors. The question then to be determined by the jury was whether the act was committed against the will and without the consent of the prosecutrix. On this question the statements of the two are diametrically opposed. There is nothing to corroborate the prosecutrix in that regard except a statement made by Alma Paris to the effect that, some time before Christmas, the exact date she was unable to state, whether it was the 12th, 13th, or 14th, she heard some girl scream in the direction of the lane which was near her house, but that she paid no attention to it, stating, "We hear those screams so often we do not think anything of it anymore." There is little probative value in this vague and general statement, both as to the time the screams were heard and their character. However, it was possibly admissible and might be considered by the jury for what it was worth.

[5, 6] On the other hand, there is some corroboration of the testimony of the defendant in the fact that the girl's clothing was not torn or disarranged; no bruises or marks on her person, and nothing in her appearance or demeanor to indicate an unusual occurrence. But it is well established in this jurisdiction that the uncorroborated statements of the prosecutrix in such cases are sufficient to sustain a verdict. Another fact which tends to buttress the defendant's contention that no rape was committed is that prosecutrix made no complaint and said nothing about the occurrence until more than two months afterwards, when it became apparent that she was enceinte, and had to give some reason for her condition. But she was young and inexperienced apparently, and she gave a reason which might have been sufficient to her why she did not tell of the occurrence to her foster mother. As before stated, her reason was that she was afraid of being sent from her then home because her foster mother had told her that if she ever did anything of that kind she would be sent away. Failure to make a prompt complaint on the part of the prosecutrix may be explained, in order to make her evidence admissible, and then the value of the testimony is to be weighed by the jury. 33 Cyc. p. 1469; People v. Gage, 62 Mich. 271, 23 N. W. 835, 4 Am. St. Rep. 854. In People v. Gage prosecutrix was a girl of very tender years, and for a considerable time after the assault upon her did not divulge it, giving as a reason her fear that her father would whip her. The court said:

"Delay in making complaint in case of rape calls for explanation before the court will admit the complaint in evidence. But the fact that the person injured was a girl of tender years, and appeared to be under a sort of duress, caused by fear of the whipping which the perpetrator of the offense impressed upon her mind would befall her if she told her parents, is a sufficient explanation of the delay to justify the court in admitting her complaint in evidence."

The defense introduced evidence to show that the reputation of the prosecutrix for chastity was bad. It was shown by Viola Fleming that there was a fair in progress near the city of Keyser on the 13th, 14th, and 15th of December, 1920, and that she, in company with prosecutrix and Mrs. Dorsey's small children, attended this fair, and while there Vernon Rose was introduced to the prosecutrix by Orlando Whetzell, Rose being introduced under the assumed name of Sisk, who accompanied these two girls on their return to the home of Mrs. Dorsey, and from there the prosecutrix and Vernon Rose, alias Sisk, went in the direction of the home of Thelma Short. Viola Fleming is corroborated by Whetzell and Vernon Rose, and they all three fix the date as of the 13th day of December, 1920, the time at which the alleged assault by defendant was committed. Rose testified that instead of accompanying the Short girl home he took her to some old abandoned fort on the outskirts of the town, and had sexual intercourse with her on the top steps at a convenient place. All of the statements made by these witnesses are flatly denied by the prosecutrix. The Fleming girl also testified that between the 1st and 10th of that month and year she and Thelma Short were on the streets of Keyser one night when Thelma began flirting with two boys on the street who were in soldier's uniform. These boys, Austin Sayre and Roy Baker, accompanied them a short distance from the town, where they entered through a fence into a field, where there was a straw rick or stack of some kind, and Thelma and Baker went behind the stack and remained there for 10 or 15 minutes. For some reason the court refused to permit Viola Fleming to detail a conversation she had with the prosecutrix just before or about the time they entered this field, and exceptions were made to the ruling of the court, but the record does not show what the witness would have said. It is apparent that it related to the purpose for which they went to the haystack; but this is a surmise, as the record was not vouched. Neither Sayre nor Baker was introduced as a witness, because it was shown that they were in the military service, and their whereabouts could not be ascertained. As rebuttal to this statement of Viola Fleming, L. T. Carskadon testified that he was the owner of the field and haystack, and had moved the haystack some distance away previous to the time of the visit, as stated by the Fleming girl. This was at the close of the trial, and the court and prosecuting attorney understood that each side had rested their case, and the instructions on behalf of the state were placed in the hands of the court for his consideration. The defense was not ready to submit its instructions then, but stated that they could be prepared and placed in the hands of the court after adjournment. At the session of the court the next morning the defense stated to the court that it had three witnesses then coming to the court house in response to summonses, who would testify positively that Carskadon was mistaken as to the time when the haystack had been removed by him, and that the haystack was at the place at the time designated by Viola Fleming, and asked that the evidence be permitted to be introduced. The court refused to permit this to be done, stating that each side had closed their evidence at the last adjournment of the court the evening of the day before.

Much evidence was produced for the state to the effect that the reputation of the prosecutrix for chastity was good; that she was a member of a church and an attendant at Sunday school.

[7] The evidence of the reputation for chastity of the prosecutrix, and of the acts of illicit intercourse with other men, was for the purpose of showing that it was not likely that she resisted the defendant, and that it was not against her will or without her consent; and, conversely, to sustain the evidence of the defendant that she had told him that she "had been out with other boys," and had consented. It is clearly established by our own decision that such evidence may be introduced and considered for that purpose. State v. Kittle, 85 W. Va. 116, 101 S. E. 70.

[1, 2] It appears that on the 13th day of March, 1921, just three months after the alleged commission of the assault, the prosecutrix had a miscarriage, and Dr. H. F. Coffman was called about two o'clock a. m. to attend her. He made an affidavit to that effect, in which he stated that he examined the fetus, which was in a bucket near her, and that the sex was plainly discernible. Dr. Coffman was summoned as a witness for the defense, but for some good reason was compelled to leave the state just before the trial, and so stated to the special judge who had been elected to conduct the trial, and the judge informed him that he should see the attorney for the defense and possibly his absence could be arranged for. This attorney prepared the doctor's affidavit, which contained the material fact above referred to, and presented it to the prosecuting attorney, prior to the trial, and a conflict arose at the trial between the attorney for the defense and the prosecuting attorney as to the agreement to introduce this affidavit as evidence. Defendant's counsel made affidavit that when the case was called for trial he announced that he would be ready if this affidavit was admitted as evidence. This is denied by the state's attorney, and the trial judge has no recollection that such a statement was made. The record is silent upon that part of the controversy. William MacDonald, a practicing attorney at the bar, made an affidavit, which is in the record, to the effect that he heard the prosecuting attorney and the counsel for the defense talking about an affidavit made by Dr. H. F. Coffman, and that his attention was called to the affidavit and he read it. He also stated that he asked the prosecuting attorney if the statement of Dr. Coffman would not be evidence to show that the prosecuting witness was mistaken as to the time when she had intercourse with Golden, and that the prosecuting attorney agreed that it might be evidence on that point. This affidavit of Dr. Coffman was offered in evidence after the state had closed its evidence in chief, and objection was made by the prosecution to its introduction. After some controversy about its introduction, one point being urged against it by the assistant prosecutor, that Dr. Coffman, in the affidavit, had not qualified himself as an expert, the court took the matter under advisement. Doctors Chas. S. Hoffman, Arnold A. Scherr, and M. R. Bell were in attendance as witnesses for the defense, and, as they were anxious to be about their professional duties, the court then took their evidence in the absence of the jury and pending his decision upon the admissibility of the affidavit of Dr. Coffman. These three doctors all stated that they were qualified physicians of long practice, and had experience in matters of childbirth and miscarriage. They stated that Dr. Coffman was an eminent and well-qualified physician of long standing, and an expert in such matters. They stated, with slight variance, that it would be impossible to ascertain from a fetus, which had been miscarried and delivered, the sex of the child until it had been in existence for four months; and, if the sex of this fetus was plainly discernible, as was stated by Dr. Coffman in his affidavit, then the child would have been begotten about four months prior to the date of this miscarriage. It is apparent that if the affidavit of Dr. Coffman had gone to the jury, buttressed by the affidavits of these three other eminent physicians, it would have had a material bearing upon the case, tending strongly to show that the prosecutrix was mistaken by a month's time as to the date of the alleged assault; or that she had become with child by some other person prior to the 18th of December, 1920. This evidence would have been admissible for the same purpose as that of carnal communication of prosecutrix with other persons, and therefore tend to support the contention of the defense that the prosecutrix had consented. It can be readily seen that this was vital and important testimony for the defense.

[3] When the court again convened, and the presiding judge had considered the relevancy of the affidavit of Dr. Coffman, he stated that he was of the opinion, on the authority of Mendum v. Commonwealth, 6 Rand. (Va.) 704, and State v. Maynes, 61 Iowa, 119, 15 N. W. 864, that it was competent to show that Dr. Coffman was a physician, and the court would so hold; and then counsel stated that they could not reach an agreement in reference to admitting any portion of such statement, and counsel for the defendant then asked the court to admit only the relevant part thereof. The court then investigated the circumstances under which the affidavit was taken, and whether the attorneys had agreed upon its introduction. The attorney for the defense was positive that he had exhibited the affidavit to the prosecuting attorney, and that he had agreed that it should go to the jury as evidence. The prosecuting attorney stated to the court that he knew nothing of the statement until early in the term, and he was asked to sign an agreement to the effect that it could be used in the trial, but he refused to sign an agreement, and so informed defendant's counsel, and that he stated to defendant's counsel that he would object to the offer of the statement at the trial. Thereupon the court refused to admit the affidavit of Dr. Coffman or any part of it or any of the evidence of Drs. Hoffman, Scherr, or Bell, taken out of the hearing of the jury, to which ruling of the court the defendant by counsel objected and excepted. Counsel for the defendant makes affidavit that he then stated he was taken by surprise, and asked for a continuance of the case, which was refused. This statement is denied by the trial judge and the prosecuting attorney, and the record does not disclose that such motion or statement was made. It is reasonably clear that counsel for the defense was under the impression that the affidavit of Dr. Coffman would be admitted as evidence in the trial, or at least the material part thereof, and that he gained such impression or understanding after conference with the prosecuting attorney. The prosecuting attorney admits having the affidavit presented to him for that purpose, but denies that he agreed to its introduction. The affidavit of Wm. MacDonald is persuasive that some negotiation or understanding was pending between the attorneys prior to the trial with reference to its introduction as evidence. Defendant's counsel is very positive in his affidavit that there was such an understanding, and that he relied upon the same, and as a result thereof permitted his important witness to be absent from the trial. The fact that he did allow this witness to go without the jurisdiction of the court, carrying with him evidence of the most vital and important character to his client, charged with a capital offense, is strongly indicative that he relied upon an assurance that the affidavit would be permitted. Which of the contentions is true we do not know, and it is immaterial. Here was an unfortunate misunderstanding, and a matter of serious import to the defendant. The trial court could see that the evidence, if it had been introduced, would be material and vital to his defense. The defendant himself was not to blame. Can we say that blame should be charged to any person? The defendant has been the innocent victim of an unfortunate circumstance. The question that concerns us here is whether the defendant under these circumstances has had a fair trial. Seeing the importance of this pertinent evidence, would it not have been proper for the trial court to delay the trial, or discharge the jury and await a time until the defendant could procure his evidence, and present a full defense under all these facts and circumstances? The Constitution provides that a person accused of crime "shall be confronted with the witnesses against him, and shall have the assistance of counsel, and a reasonable time to prepare for his defense; and there shall be awarded to him compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." The spirit of this provision in our Bill of Rights is summed up in the expression "the defendant shall have a fair trial." We are not unmindful that the accused must use diligence, and if he does not do so it is at his peril. But can we say that diligence has not been used here? It is apparent that from the time the indictment was returned defendant had made diligent preparation for his trial. We think under the circumstances that the material part of Dr. Coffman's affidavit, together with the supporting evidence of the other physicians, should have gone to the jury, or that the trial should have been delayed until reasonable effort had been made to procure the attendance of Dr. Coffman. It is apparent that such evidence could have been procured, that it was material to the issue, and that it was prejudicial error to the defendant, under all these facts and circumstances, to proceed with the trial in its absence. In Boxley v. Commonwealth, 24 Grat. (Va.) 649, the prosecutrix made a different statement on the trial from that made by her in the preliminary hearing before Justice of the Peace Melvin, who at the time of the trial was not in attendance upon the court and had not been summoned. His absence and failure of the defense to introduce him as a witness was satisfactorily accounted for, and, upon affidavit showing in what particulars she had varied in her two statements and that such variance could be shown by Justice of the Peace Melvin, the verdict was set aside, and a new trial awarded on the ground of surprise. Is it not apparent that there was surprise in the case at bar?

[8] Error is assigned because the court refused to permit the defense to cross-examine the prosecutrix about what became of an absorbent pad which she claimed to have had pinned to her underclothing at the time of the alleged assault, and because of the remarks made by the judge to defendant's counsel in that connection. It was the theory of the defense that the ride in the automobile took place in Christmas week, and at a time when the girl had no menstrual flow, and therefore it became material to inquire specifically as to what disposition was made of this pad on the occasion designated by her. Upon inquiry along this line, the court said, "Mr. Shores, I want you to understand that this girl is only a child and not much latitude will be allowed in your examination of her. You can ask this one question, but you cannot go into this any further." While the court has wide discretion in controlling the manner of examination of young and unsophisticated witnesses, it should not prevent full investigation of facts in their knowledge which may have a material influence in deciding the issues. The court permitted this witness to be led to some extent in her examination, which, in tender consideration of her age and inexperience, may have been proper; but, on the other hand, defendant was on trial for his life, and a full cross-examination on the details of the alleged crime should have been permitted. We cannot say that the remarks of the court as shown by the record, were prejudicial. It is the result of the ruling, couched in these remarks, which is subject to criticism.

Many exceptions were taken by the defense to refusals to permit answers to be made to questions propounded, but in most instances there is nothing to show what the answers would have been, and hence these assignments of error cannot be sustained.

There are many other assignments of error which, in view of a new trial, it will not be necessary to consider.

[4] The fact that defendant was deprived of the benefit of material evidence by reason of an unfortunate misunderstanding between counsel, clearly shown, coupled with refusal of the trial judge to permit the introduction of witnesses to show that Carskadon was mistaken as to the time when he removed the haystack, together with lack of corroborating evidence of force used in the commission of the alleged assault, the silence of the prosecutrix until she became pregnant, the verdict of the jury wherein they recommended leniency of the court, and all the other facts, have impelled us to the conclusion that a new trial should be accorded defendant.

The judgment is reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded.

Reversed and remanded.

THAYER v. HOLLEY. (No. 4347.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1033(9)—Verdict for less than sum called for by contract, and supported by evidence, will not be set aside on defendant's theory that it should be treated as a finding against any contract.

Where in an action for damages the verdict of the jury is much less than the sum sued for or called for by the contract sued on and supported by the evidence, the judgment on the verdict will not be set aside on writ of error by the defendant, on the theory that the verdict should be treated as a finding of the jury against the fact of the contract, and lack of evidence to support the verdict, or upon any other theory.

2. Trial \Leftrightarrow 260(1)—Instructions repeating law applicable may be rejected without error.

Instructions to the jury which properly present the different theories of the parties are all that can properly be demanded on the trial, and instructions repeating the law applicable to the case may without error be rejected.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action in assumpsit by John J. Thayer against James A. Holley. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. E. Chilton and Conley & Johnson, all of Charleston, for plaintiff in error.

S. B. Avis, of Charleston, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. In assumpsit, upon the common and two special counts, the plaintiff sued for $4,000.00 and obtained a verdict and judgment for but $700.00.

The suit was for commissions or compensation alleged to have been earned by the plaintiff, employed by defendant on March 24, 1919, to negotiate and make sale of the standing timber on a tract of 1,075 acres of land in Lincoln County, the terms of the contract, a verbal one, being that plaintiff was to have as his commissions or compensation all that he should obtain for the timber over and above $14,000.00, the net price stipulated to be paid to defendant. The only plea was non assumpsit, on which issue was joined.

[1] On the trial plaintiff proved and relied on the negotiations with and sale of the timber to one George E. Breece, which negotiations he and Breece swear were begun some time prior to April 1, 1919, but the sale was not actually concluded until about May 17, 1919. Breece it is proven was able, ready and willing to consummate the purchase at the price of $18,000.00, and upon the other terms stipulated, of which defendant had notice but refused to execute the contract on his behalf for various reasons.

The first of these reasons is that the verbal authority given plaintiff was on April 1, and not on March 24, 1919, a controverted fact, which, if material, must be regarded as having been settled adversely to defendant's contention by the verdict of the jury.

The second reason affirmed by defendant is that one Sweetland, who had an interest with him in the land, was advised by him by letter of April 1, 1919, that he had that day offered the timber to plaintiff at the price of $14,000.00 net to them, in which letter he advised Sweetland that, "I think his people are the Courtneys who are stave people," etc., also saying, "If the price mentioned is satisfactory and you have any information you can give me relative to this timber let me have it right quick." He further says that Sweetland replied, by letter dated April 3d, received by him April 4th, expressing dissatisfaction with the price for various reasons, but did not disaffirm the proposition made to Thayer, of $14,000.00. And defendant swears that he showed this letter from Sweetland to Thayer on April 5, 1919, and that on that occasion limited his authority to a sale to Courtney, whom Thayer had represented to him to be his immediate customer for the timber; and that Thayer accompanied by Courtney a few days after April 21st went upon the land to inspect the timber, and subsequently decided not to take it upon the terms stipulated; and that Thayer thereafter had no authority to negotiate a sale to Breece or to any one else, his authority to sell being limited on April 5th to Courtney.

That defendant showed Thayer Sweetland's letter of April 3d is admitted by Thayer, but he says that this occurred in Holley's room in the Holley Hotel, about the 16th or 17th of April, the Wednesday or Thursday before the city election which occurred on April 21st. Thayer flatly contradicts defendant that his authority was then, or at any time, limited to a sale to Courtney. On the contrary he says that he had not then talked to Courtney, but had him as well as Breece and others in mind as prospective customers for the timber, but did not then refer to Courtney; that several days after he was employed to sell the timber, he met defendant in the lobby of the Union Building, and among other things re-questioned that if anybody should come to him to make a price, to name $25.00 per acre; that Holley replied that he would not do that, but would refer them to plaintiff. He denies that Holley ever showed him the Sweetland letter in his office. Other facts and circumstances were introduced in evidence tending to corroborate the parties in their respective contentions on the question of this limited authority of Thayer. The fact is a very much controverted one, and was one clearly for the jury, and must be regarded as having been found in favor of the plaintiff.

So that the fact of the negotiations with and sale to Breece being settled by the verdict in favor of plaintiff's contention, we can not say that the evidence preponderates on the side of defendant.

It is insisted that the documentary evidence introduced corroborates Holley, referring especially to Holley's letter to Sweetland and the latter's letter to him, and to Holley's letter to Thayer of May 17th. We do not find much, if anything, in these letters to support Holley's contention on the question of limited authority. In his letter to Sweetland of April 1st, he says not a word about having limited Thayer's authority to a sale to Courtney, or to any one in any way. He does not even say he knew Thayer's customer was Courtney. All he said was: "I think his people are the Courtneys." This could have been but a surmise, if it be true, as Thayer swears, that he had not yet seen Courtney. In Thayer's letter to Holley of May 20th, in reply to that of Holley of May 17th, he denies flatly that Holley had limited his authority to a sale to Courtney, and calls Holley's attention to the fact that he, when he showed him Sweetland's letter, said go ahead and sell the timber and that he would stick to his agreement with him. This letter advised Holley that afterwards he had completed the sale to Breece. We think this documentary evidence tends rather to corroborate Thayer than Holley. The letter of Holley to Thayer contained self-serving declarations, after Thayer had made sale to Breece, and thus denied by Thayer, Holley's letter had no preponderating force in his favor.

On this contention, however, it is strenuously urged that all the evidence introduced by plaintiff was under the third count, counting on the alleged contract, and sale of the timber to Breece, and demanding the stipulated compensation of $4,000.00, to which plaintiff would have been entitled, if entitled to anything thereunder, and that the jury's verdict for $700.00 should be regarded as a finding against plaintiff on the theory of a sale to Breece, and as a finding in his favor on the theory of a quantum meruit, under the second count; but that as there was no proof of the actual value of his services or expenses, there is nothing in the evidence on which the verdict should be allowed to stand for any sum. The amount of the verdict is exactly five per cent. of the net price stipulated to be paid defendant for the timber. It is possible the jury may have concluded that under the circumstances this sum would sufficiently compensate the plaintiff. But we can not say this was the basis of their verdict. On the contrary they might have found the full amount claimed by plaintiff. That they found a less sum defendant can not complain, and plaintiff does not complain of the verdict. In such a case this court will not be justified in disturbing the verdict. Morris v. Risk, 86 W. Va. 30, 102 S. E. 725.

Counsel for defendant say we have decided on several occasions that a verdict contrary to the decided weight of the evidence, or resting upon both oral and documentary evidence and uncontroverted facts decidedly against the preponderance of the evidence, will be set aside, and a new trial awarded. And we have so decided. Fuccy v. Coal & Coke Ry. Co., 75 W. Va. 135, 83 S. E. 301; Devericks v. Fair Grounds Improvement Co., 73 W. Va. 174, 80 S. E. 143; McDermitt v. Forbes, 73 W. Va. 240, 80 S. E. 356; South Penn Oil Co. v. Blue Creek Development Co., 77 W. Va. 682, 88 S. E. 1029; Kyle v. Huddestun, 80 W. Va. 439, 92 S. E. 679. But we find no justification in the evidence for the application of these principles in the present case.

[2] Errors are assigned in the giving and refusing of instructions. Only one instruction was given on behalf of the plaintiff. It simply told the jury that if they found from the evidence that the contract was as alleged and sworn to by plaintiff, and that he had negotiated the sale to Breece, they should find for the plaintiff, unless they should find from the evidence that prior to such sale defendant had revoked plaintiff's agency. This instruction did not exclude the theory of revocation of Thayer's authority by defendant.

Of the six instructions requested by defendant the court gave numbers 1, 2, 3, and 5, and rejected numbers 4 and A. Those given covered fully defendant's theory of a revocation of Thayer's authority to sell to any one except Courtney, and the duty of plaintiff as a condition of recovery to present a case of preponderant evidence in his favor. Instruction A, which would have directed the jury to find a verdict for defendant, was of course properly rejected.

The judgment must be affirmed.

TALBOTT v. PAYNE, Director General of Railroads. (No. 4430.)(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 14, 1922. Rehearing Denied April 4, 1922.)(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Carriers \S 205, 216—Not an insurer of live stock; not liable for injuries arising from inherent nature and propensities of animals.

A carrier is not an insurer of live stock delivered to it for transportation as in the case of inanimate property. For injuries to such live stock shipments arising from the inherent nature or propensities of the animals the carrier is not liable.

2. Carriers \S 228(1)—Where animals found dead at destination were shown to have been in good condition and properly loaded and carried promptly without accident, result attributed to animals' propensities.

Where it is shown that a shipment of live stock was in good condition when delivered to a carrier; that the car was not improperly loaded, where the loading was done by the shipper; that the car was promptly and expeditiously moved from the initial point to destination without any accident to the train carrying the same; and, that no injury could have occurred to such stock from negligence in the transportation thereof, notwithstanding which it is found that some of the stock are dead upon arrival at destination—such result will be attributed to the inherent nature or propensities of the animals, and not to the negligence of the carrier.

3. Carriers \S 218(3)—Shipper not barred from suing for loss to interstate shipment because failing to file claim as per contract.

A shipper is not barred from maintaining a suit against the carrier to recover for a loss to an interstate shipment of live stock occasioned by the carrier's negligence, because he did not file his claim with the carrier within four months, as provided by the live stock contract; the federal Interstate Commerce Act providing that no such notice shall be required in such case as a condition precedent to recovery.

Error to Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Action by L. H. Talbott against J. B. Payne, Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, verdict set aside, and cause remanded for new trial.

Fitzpatrick, Campbell, Brown & Davis and O. W. Strickling, all of Huntington, for plaintiff in error.

R. L. Clark, of Union, for defendant in error.

RITZ, J. The defendant, the Director General of Railroads, by this writ of error seeks reversal of a judgment against him for the value of certain live stock which, it is claimed by the plaintiff, died while being transported over the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad as a result of the negligence and carelessness of the carrier.

About the 1st of October, 1919, the plaintiff ordered a stock car for a shipment of hogs from Ft. Spring, W. Va., to Baltimore, Md. Pursuant to this order, the defendant placed a car upon the tracks at Ft. Spring. The hogs for shipment were gathered by the plaintiff from various parts of Monroe county, being driven to the point of shipment from these points, ranging in distance from 6 to 30 miles therefrom. They reached Ft. Spring and were placed in the pens about noon on the 2d of October, where they were watered and fed, and were, according to the testimony of the parties who drove the hogs in, being the plaintiff's son and another man hired for the purpose, in good condition. Later in the evening, the exact time not appearing, they were loaded into the car, and at 9:20 picked up by an east-bound freight train. The shipment reached Clifton Forge at 4:30 on the morning of October 3d. It remained there until 6:30 on that morning, when it continued its journey east, arriving at Charlottesville at 3:25 p. m. on October 3d. It seems that the train containing this shipment moved out of Charlottesville five minutes after it reached that station, to wit, at 3:30 p. m. on October 3d, and arrived at Potomac Yards at 9:05 p. m. of that day, covering the whole distance from Ft. Spring to Potomac Yards, more than 300 miles, in a little less than 24 hours. At Potomac Yards the car was cut out for the purpose of feeding, watering, and resting the animals. It was discovered upon unloading the car that 21 of the hogs therein were dead. The remaining 88 were fed, watered, and rested, and sent forward on the next morning to their destination at Baltimore, where they arrived in good condition, as testified to by the party receiving them, and where they were sold without depreciation in the price on account of their condition. It is for the value of these 21 hogs that died between Ft. Spring and Potomac Yards that recovery is sought in this suit. The plaintiff testifies that the hogs were worth $25 apiece, or a total of $525. There was no other direct evidence as to their value. The jury found a verdict for $175, and upon this verdict the court rendered judgment.

[1] There is no substantial conflict between counsel as to the liability of a common carrier of live stock. It seems to be very well established that the general rule making a carrier absolutely liable for the loss of goods intrusted to it for transportation, unless such loss occurs from the act of God or the public enemy, is qualified when applied to live stock, and made subject to the further exception that it is not an insurer against injury resulting from the inherent nature or propensities of the animals, and without fault of the carrier. And this rule in this case is still further modified by the fact that the shipment was loaded by the plaintiff, or his agent, and because thereof, under a condition in the bill of lading authorized by the act of Congress regulating interstate commerce, the shipper is liable for any injury resulting from negligence in loading the car.

[2] The plaintiff introduced the two men who drove the hogs into Ft. Spring, who testified that they were in good condition when placed in the pens for loading. These witnesses also testify that the number of hogs with which they started was 114, that one died on the way, and that they reached Ft. Spring with 109. They do not account for the other four. They further state that a car of the size of the one in which these hogs were loaded could easily contain the number loaded in it. In fact, their testimony is that such a car could comfortably contain from 120 to 125 of such hogs. The party who loaded the hogs for the plaintiff likewise testifies that they were in good condition when loaded, and that the car was not crowded; that it was of sufficient size to contain from 120 to 125 hogs of the size of the ones loaded therein. The commission merchant in Baltimore who received the hogs testified that the 88 received by him were in good condition when received, and that the car in which they were shipped was of sufficient size to comfortably haul from 120 to 125 hogs of that size. On this showing the plaintiff contended that it was incumbent upon the defendant to account for the death of these hogs from some cause for which he was not responsible, and this he undertook to do. He showed by the three conductors who had charge of the trains that carried the hogs from Ft. Spring to Potomac Yards the movement of these trains, as above indicated. Each of these conductors testified from their records of the trip made by them at the time, showing when the shipment left Ft. Spring, when it reached Clifton Forge, and when it left Clifton Forge and reached Charlottesville, and left that point and its arrival at Potomac Yards. In addition to this showing, it is proven that the trip made was an exceptionally good one; the time consumed being less than is ordinarily consumed by live stock shipments. It is shown further by each of these conductors that there was no rough handling of the train, nor any accident of any kind which could have caused the injury to the animals. The conductor who moved the car from Ft. Spring states that when he picked it up the hogs were restless, and were squealing, and that he called the attention of the agent to this fact at the time, and that it was his belief that they were overcrowded in the car; that, while the shipment was made on the 2d of October, the weather was unusually warm for that time of the year, the thermometer reaching 94° at Charlottesville, Va., on the 3d of October, the day on which the hogs passed through that place. The conductor who took the shipment from Clifton Forge to Charlottesville testifies that there was no accident to his train between Clifton Forge and Charlottesville, nor any unusual handling of it that could have caused any injury to the animals. It appears from the testimony of one of the conductors that when the hogs reached Charlottesville come of them were then dead, and that they were extremely restless, were attempting to break out of the car, and were fighting and squealing at that time. The conductor who took the train from Charlottesville to Potomac Yards made an exceptionally quick trip, covering the 110 miles in less than six hours. He testifies that his train only made two stops between Charlottesville and Potomac Yards; that there was no rough handling of it, and no accidents happened to it. All three of these conductors observed this car of hogs while in the train in their charge, and all swear that the hogs were at various times fighting and squealing, and that in their opinion the car was overloaded; there not being sufficient space therein for the hogs to be carried in comfort. The man in charge of the stockyards at Potomac Yards who unloaded the hogs states that the death of the 21 hogs was evidently due to the fact that too many hogs were placed in the car. He has had many years' experience in handling live stock, and is very confident that this car was badly overloaded. It is further testified by one of the witnesses for the plaintiff that hogs raised out in the fields will stand being driven or shipped very much better than hogs raised in pens, but it is not shown how many of these hogs were raised in pens and how many were raised out in the fields.

The court instructed the jury that the defendant would not be liable for the loss of the hogs if they believed that such loss was caused by the car being overloaded, or if they believed that the hogs died as a result of their inherent nature or propensities and without fault of the carrier. By its verdict the jury has answered both of these questions in the negative, that is, it has found that the car was not overloaded, and it has also found that the hogs did not die as the result of any inherent propensities or weaknesses which they possessed as animals, but from the negligence and carelessness of the defendant in handling them. The defendant insists that this finding cannot be sustained by the evidence.

As before stated, it seems to be well established that the measure of liability of a carrier of live stock is a little different from that of a carrier of dead freight. In the case of dead freight, there is nothing inherent in the nature thereof against which the carrier cannot protect himself. He can safely secure the boxes or packages in which the same is contained against interference, either from the freight itself, or from any other cause, except the act of God or the public enemy. In the case of live stock such is not the case. He can, of course, handle them with all of the care which is required in the case of handling any other freight, but, because of the fact that the animals have the power of locomotion and action, he is not in a position to secure them against injury from each other; and, further, because of the fact that their value depends upon their being alive at the point of destination, he is unable to prevent their death from causes due to their natural propensities. This doctrine is well recognized by the authorities. Maslin v. R. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 180, 35 Am. Rep. 748; 4 R. C. L. tit. Carriers, § 421; 10 C. J. p. 123.

Recognizing this to be the law, does the evidence in this case justify the finding that the death of the 21 hogs was due to the negligence of the defendant? The evidence is clear, positive, and distinct that no act was done or duty omitted by the defendant, or any of his agents, which could have resulted in injury to the animals. There is no attempt made upon the part of the plaintiff to show that such was the case, but negligence is sought to be implied from the fact alone that the hogs were dead when they reached Potomac Yards. Assuming, as the jury has found, that the car was not overloaded, and that the hogs were in good condition when placed in the car, and taking as true that the carrier handled the shipment with all reasonable dispatch, and with all reasonable care, and we must take this as true because it is proven beyond question, and the time consumed in making the trip fully corroborates the evidence of the witnesses, then is there a presumption that the hogs died from some negligent act; or, rather, under such circumstances, would not the presumption be that the death of the hogs came from some cause for which neither of the parties might be responsible? In other words, should it not be attributed to the natural propensities of such animals when taken from the surroundings in which they had been raised, and placed on board a railroad car to be transported a long distance under circumstances to which they were entirely unaccustomed? In the case of Schaeffer v. R. R. Co., 168 Pa. 209, 31 Atl. 1088, 47 Am. St. Rep. 884, it was held that where it is shown that the carrier has used all reasonable care in the transportation of the animals, and their death cannot be accounted for upon any satisfactory grounds, it will not be presumed that the same arose from the negligence of the carrier; and in Lewis v. R. R. Co., 70 N. J. Law, 132, 56 Atl. 128, 1 Ann. Cas. 156, it is held that, where the injuries received by the live stock are such that they are as likely to have been caused by the nature of the animals as by the negligence of the carrier, the court cannot assume, in the absence of evidence, that the injuries were due to the latter cause. There is a note to this case as the same is reported in the Selected Case Series cited, in which it is stated that, upon proof that the carrier performed the duty incumbent upon it, the loss or injury to live stock is presumed to have been due to the natural propensities of the animals, and not to the negligence of the carriers, which is supported by elaborate citation of the authorities. If no explanation of the handling of this shipment had been made by the carrier, we think undoubtedly, under the showing made by the plaintiff, the jury might very well attribute the loss of the hogs to the carrier's negligence. This presumption, however, is removed by the proof of proper handling of the shipment from the initial point to the point of destination. In such a case, where the evidence fails to attribute the death of the animals to any particular cause, and it is shown that the carrier has fully discharged its duty, we must presume that their death was occasioned by the natural propensities of the animals. Of course, it is well known that such animals are much more likely to die when being transported in stock cars than while being kept in the pens or fields to which they have been accustomed. Death may overtake such animals even when kept in the pens or fields where they are ordinarily raised without negligence upon the part of those charged with their custody, and this likelihood is much increased when they are taken from the mode of living to which they are accustomed and submitted to one imposing upon them a very much severer strain for a long space of time. We are of opinion that when a case like this is presented in which the evidence clearly shows that the carrier has been guilty of no default in the performance of his duty, and it is doubtful whether the plaintiff was not himself in default, although the jury has found that he was not, the death of the animals in transit must be attributed to the natural propensities of such animals.

[3] There is another question raised by the defendant which it is contended bars recovery, and that is that no notice of claim was given to the defendant by the plaintiff within four months from the loss of the animals, as required by a provision in the bill of lading. This contention is met by the first section of the Bills of Lading Act, being section 7976 of Barnes' Federal Code (U. S. Comp. St. § 8604a), wherein it is provided:

"That if the loss, damage, or injury complained of was due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded, or damaged in transit by carelessness or negligence, then no notice of claim nor filing of claim shall be required as a condition precedent to recovery."

This was an interstate shipment, and is controlled by the federal Interstate Commerce Act (24 Stat. 379), and it is unnecessary under that act to give the notice or make the claim within 4 months, as contended for by the defendant.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict of the jury, and remand the case for a new trial.

WARREN et al. v. BOGGS et al. (No. 4301.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 21, 1922. Rehearing Denied
April 4, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Boundaries \Leftrightarrow 46(3)—Under a compromise agreement, held that land should be surveyed as of the date of a designated deed using surface measurement.

Where claimants to land compromise their differences by a writing, and the land which one of the claimants shall take thereunder is designated by corners, lines, and distances as found in a deed of a certain date, recorded, and made to his predecessor in title, and, in locating and surveying the land, it appears that all of the corners have been destroyed and the true locations thereof disputed, except one on which the parties agree, the land should be surveyed as of the date of the designated deed, and not as of the time of the compromise agreement, and by the method of measurement used in the original survey, beginning at the undisputed corner; and, if the deed shows on its face that the corners, lines, and distances were made by surface measurement, the same measurement should be used in restoring the destroyed corners and in ascertaining the true boundaries. The proper construction of the compromise agreement is that the parties intended that the corners and boundaries should be ascertained by the measurement set out in the original deed referred to by them.

2. Boundaries \Leftrightarrow 3(2)—Where distance of one line and the course of another conflict, either should control, according to intent.

Where there is a conflict between the distance of one line and the course of another, either the course or the distance shall control, according to the manifest intention of the parties.

3. Boundaries \Leftrightarrow 35(1)—What is to be weighed and considered in determining whether one line should control the courses of another line, or vice versa, stated.

In such case the method of making the original survey, whether by surface or horizontal measurement, the quantity of land conveyed and the price paid therefor, and generally the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of the survey and deed, may be weighed and considered in determining whether the distance of one line of the survey should control the courses of another line, or vice versa.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Action by Agnes Warren, an infant, etc., and others against J. O. Boggs and others. From a decree sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing plaintiffs' bill, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion.

S. P. Bell, of Spencer, A. G. Mathews, of Grantsville, and Daniel Pendleton and Harper & Baker, all of Spencer, for appellants.

V. B. Archer and C. N. Matheny, both of Parkersburg, and Geo. F. Cunningham, of Spencer, for appellees.

LIVELY, J. This cause was formerly considered by this court on appeal from a decree sustaining a demurrer to, and dismissing, plaintiffs' bill. Warren v. Boggs, 83 W. Va. 89, 97 S. E. 589. A statement of the facts, as set out by the pleadings, is there found.

The respective property interests of the parties in the subject-matter of the litigation have been determined in a compromise agreement entered into by them and dated May 12, 1913. By that agreement the parties have designated the metes and bounds of the 94-acre tract and the metes and bounds of the 17-acre and 115-pole tract, designated in the pleadings "as the 18-acre tract," which interlocks on the 94-acre tract. The controversy is now as to the proper location, with respect to these two tracts, of an oil well known as Boggs No. 5. If that well is on the 94-acre tract, the plaintiffs are entitled to seven-eighths of the one-eighth royalty therein and defendants to one-eighth of the royalty; if the situs of the well is on the 18-acre tract, then defendant is entitled to all of the royalty. The lower court decided that the well was on the 18-acre tract, that plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief, and dismissed their original, amended, and supplemental bills. This appeal was awarded from that decree.

[1, 3] The compromise agreement of May 12, 1913, which is the basis of this litigation and on which the contentions of the parties is predicated, recites that defendant Boggs is the owner of the 18-acre tract—

"which was conveyed by C. C. Smith and wife and A. B. Wells and wife to N. B. Hoff by deed dated March 1, 1886, of record in the Roane county court clerk's office in Deed Book No. 12 at page 64, which is therein bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a stake and pointers Hiram Nestor's northwest corner; thence N. 2° E. 16½ poles to a stone pile and pointers; thence S. 87½° E. 180 poles to pointers on line of No. 9 and 10; thence S. 2° W. 15 poles to a white oak corner to said Nestor; thence N. 87½° W. with Nestor line 180 poles to the beginning—which said tract of 18 acres of land is claimed by the said J. P. Boggs to lap or interlock on the said tract of 94 acres."

The deed from Smith and Wells to Hoff is exhibited, and the same courses and distances are found therein as above given, with the addition thereto, after the last course and distance (N. $87\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ W. with the Nestor line 180 poles to the beginning), of the words "surface measurement containing 17 acres and 115 poles." The consideration named is \$106.80. In 1892 Hoff executed a trust deed on this land to J. A. A. Vandale, trustee, to secure a debt owing to H. W. Goff, in which the same corners, courses, and distances are given, and the acreage stated to be 18 acres, more or less. And on July 29, 1907, Vandale, trustee, executed the trust and deeded the land to J. O. Boggs for \$160, in which the same courses, distances, and corners are given, "being the same tract of land conveyed to the said N. B. Hoff by C. C. Smith and A. B. Wells by deed bearing date on the 1st day of March, 1886, and recorded," etc. In the two last-named deeds no reference is made to surface measurement. The boundaries of the 94-acre tract are incorporated in the compromise agreement, but they have little bearing upon the question at issue, the location of the well, as the entire 18-acre tract seems to be an interlock upon and lying within the boundaries of the 94-acre tract. The location and establishment of the northern line of the 18-acre tract running from the stone pile and pointers "S. $87\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ E. 180 poles to pointers on a line of No. 9 and 10" decides the issue. If this line runs south of the well, then plaintiffs are entitled to relief, as the situs of the well would be on the 94-acre tract; conversely, if the true location of the line is north of the well, then the well is on the 18-acre tract, and the decree should be affirmed.

Twelve surveyors, six on each side, went upon the land and surveyed the 18-acre tract, and those introduced as witnesses for plaintiffs, Thorn, Taylor, Shoup, Bell, Childs, and Parks, place the northern line of the 18-acre tract from 4 to 13 feet south of the well; and those employed by defendants, Wolf, Woodyard, Dunbar, Scott, Ewing, and Daniels, place the line from 4.6 to 11 feet north of the well. On this conflicting evidence we are called upon to ascertain the location of the lines, especially the northern line of the 18-acre interlock. These surveyors have had many years of practical experience in their profession and seem to be well versed both in theory and practice. How can it be that in the ascertainment of one line of so small an area, bounded by four lines only, a difference of from 8 to 24 feet arises? The science of geometry and mathematics is exact. The infinite depths of stellar space are measured with such exact nicety that the apposition of stars and planets can be calculated to the fraction of a second of time. One corner of the survey, the southeastern corner, the white oak stump replaced by an iron pipe, is agreed upon as the only corner about the location of which there is no controversy. From this point the surveyors began, and from that point the three remaining corners are differently located by them. It is evident that the methods pursued, and not a defective science, have brought about the different results, different maps. By what method should the surveys have been made? Plaintiffs insist that the surveys should be made according to the courses, lines, distances, and corners denoted as of the date of the compromise agreement of May 12, 1913, allowing for the magnetic variation from that date, or, if the survey be made as of the date of the original survey in 1886, and the magnetic variation calculated from that date, then surface measurement should be invoked, the method of measurement then used, as expressly stated in the original deed from Smith and Wells to Hoff. Defendant asserts that the survey should now be made with magnetic variation calculated from 1886, and by horizontal measurement, under section 2, c. 67, Code (sec. 3685). It appears that all of the surveyors calculated the magnetic variation from 1886, each using practically the same degree of variation when running the lines. If the survey is to be made as of that date, and we think it proper to do so, the same measurement should be used as was then used—surface measurement. In that way only could the footsteps of the original surveyors be followed. In that way only can the boundaries be determined and fixed as they were then ascertained and fixed. Any other method will bring about a different result. That is fully demonstrated, for, by using horizontal measurement, the side lines have been shortened about 6 poles and the eastern line lengthened by $1\frac{1}{2}$ poles. These surveyors should, as nearly as possible, do exactly what the surveyor then did.

Was it the intention of the parties, when they made the compromise agreement in 1913, that the 18-acre tract should be run out and located by the survey and deed as of 1886? Such seems to be the contention of defendant, for his surveyors have calculated and used the magnetic variation from that date. It follows that the surface measurement as set out in that deed must also be adopted. The beneficial portions of that deed cannot be taken by either party and the portions which are not beneficial ignored. The agreement refers specifically to the deed of 1886, and the courses, distances, and corners are copied "as therein bounded and described." Horizontal measurement should govern unless surface measurement is contracted for. Smith and Wells contracted for surface measurement with Hoff, and the parties here have contracted for the location of the land just as the original deed stipulated, by specific reference thereto.

"A deed, for a description of the land, may refer to another deed or map, and the deed or map is considered as incorporated in the deed itself for description of the land." Blowpipe v. Spencer, 46 W. Va. 590, 33 S. E. 342.

The parties, by referring to the deed of 1886 as the basis for the location of the land, are bound by all of its provisions with reference thereto. Surface measurement of the southern line running from the white oak stump westwardly 180 poles to the northwest corner of Nestor (the beginning corner of the deed of 1886) is practically the same as horizontal measurement; and the same is true of the western line running from the northwest corner of Nestor north to the stone pile and pointers 16½ poles. But the northern line is over rough, hilly land, and horizontal measurement of this line reaches the line of Nos. 9 and 10 at 174.43 poles to 175.4 poles instead of 180 poles, as called for in the deed. Again, the distance from the point thus located by them on the line of lots 9 and 10 as the northeast corner of the 18-acre tract was found to be 16½ poles, horizontal measurement, from the white oak at the southeastern corner, the beginning point of their surveys, instead of 15 poles, as called for in the deed. It is argued that, this being the closing line, and the north and south side lines being parallel, the distance must give way, and 1½ rods added thereto in order to close the survey and make the eastern line equal to the western line.

At the time of making the survey and deed in 1886 it appears that Smith and Wells had no title to the land, but arbitrarily went upon the Warren land (now the 94-acre tract), made the survey, and conveyed the 17 acres and 115 poles to Hoff for the sum of $106.30, exactly $6 per acre. Smith was the surveyor, with Wells and Samuel Evilsizer as chain carriers. The surveying was begun by them at the northwest corner, thence on a bearing S. 87½° E. 180 poles to a hickory, but for some reason they did not care to go that far north on the line of lots 9 and 10, and either Smith or Wells went up the hill further south and located the northeast corner, and from there southwest 15 poles to the white oak corner. Then the western and southern lines were run. The eastern 15 poles line was not the closing line of their survey; neither is it the closing line in the deed made by them. There is no more substantial reason why the eastern line should be lengthened so as to correspond with the length of the western line than that the western line should be shortened to be the same length as the eastern line. In the first instance the acreage will exceed 18 acres (more than that conveyed in the deed); and in the latter instance the acreage would be less than that conveyed in the deed. It will be observed that the quantity of land conveyed in the deed is exact, 17 acres and 115 poles, not "more or less." It will also be observed that the purchase price, $106.30, is exactly $6 per acre. These are pertinent and significant facts and are peculiarly indicative of the intentions of the then contracting parties. Did they not intend to convey a tract of land 180 poles long by 16½ poles wide at one end and 15 poles wide at the other end, when we find that these produce the exact acreage conveyed at an exact figure per acre? Why, then, should these lines be lengthened or shortened, thus making a conveyance of a greater or less quantity of land than that intended to be and actually conveyed? It is especially to be noted in this connection that after the northern 180-pole line was run on a bearing of S. 87½° the vendors deliberately moved the corner thus ascertained as the northeast corner on a line of lots 9 and 10 further south and a distance of 15 poles surface measurement from the white oak, and made their deed accordingly. Under these facts should not the bearing of the northern line give way to the distance of the eastern line thus deliberately located?

"It is proper to consider a correspondence of quantity given by a line with the quantity mentioned in the deed or in the approximation to such quantity as tending to establish the truth of such line." 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 1045.

See, also, Goff v. Goff, 78 W. Va. 423, 89 S. E. 9; Croghan v. Nelson, 3 How. 187, 11 L. Ed. 554.

"There is no uniform rule that the length of one line, as mentioned in a deed, shall control the course of another line, or that the latter shall control the former. Other circumstances will determine the adoption of the one or the other." Western M. & M. Co. v. Peytona C. C. Co., 8 W. Va. 406 (syl. 4).

"Where the description of land by monuments, distances, or otherwise is vague and indefinite, by reason of conflicting lines or omission of a line, or from other cause, the statement of the acreage is an essential part of the description." Smith v. Owens, 63 W. Va. 60 (point 6, syl.) 59 S. E. 762; State v. Hicks, 76 W. Va. 508, 85 S. E. 665.

According to Ewing, one of defendants' surveyors, if the eastern line be extended to 16½ rods level measurement, so as to make it correspond in length with the western line, it would make the deed convey 18 acres and 90 poles by level measurement. How much more it would include by surface measurement does not appear.

[2] "Where there is a conflict between the distance of one line and the course of another, either the course or the distance shall control, according to the manifest intent of the parties and the circumstances of the case." Ruffner's Heirs v. Hill, 31 W. Va.

428, 7 S. E. 13. See, also, Smith v Chapman, 10 Grat. (Va.) 445.

It appears to be conceded by all of the surveyors that, if the courses and distances are run by surface measurement with proper magnetic variation from 1886, the well is not on the 18-acre tract, even if the eastern line be extended to 16½ poles. Surveyor F. F. Daniel testified that, if a line were run from the northwest corner of the 18-acre tract as fixed by Mr. Ewing (another witness for defendant) to the end of the 16½-rod surface measure line from the white oak (southeast corner) towards the gum sapling (the northeast corner fixed by defendants' surveyors), the well would be north of the line about 1.14 feet; and if the eastern line were measured 15 poles horizontal measurement from the white oak towards the gum sapling, and the northern line extended from the end of the 15 poles so measured westward to the northwest corner, then the well would be north of the last-mentioned line about 1½ rods, and on the 94-acre tract. G. C. Ewing testifies to practically the same. J. V. Dunbar, a witness for defendants, states that the only way the well can be located on the 18-acre tract is to lengthen the eastern boundary line running north from the white oak from 15 poles as called for in the deed to 16½ poles and change it from surface to level measurement. The surveyors agree that, if the eastern line is measured from the white oak a distance of 15 rods either by surface or horizontal measurement, and the northern line extended therefrom to the northwest corner, giving proper variation from 1886, the well would be north of the northern line, or outside of the 18-acre tract known as the interlock.

Having concluded that the survey of the 18-acre tract should be made by surface measurement, the method by which Smith and Wells made their original survey in 1886 as shown by their deed to Hoff, and it appearing that such measurement will place the situs of the well without the interlock and on the 94-acre or Warren tract, it follows that the decree must be reversed. All of the defendants' surveyors ran out the lines and distances by horizontal measurement, giving proper magnetic variation from 1886, and extended the eastern line 16½ poles, by which method it was found that the well was within the 18-acre tract from 4.6 feet to 9.2 feet. Lawson Scott by this method placed the well a little over 11 feet south of the northern line of the tract. It is argued that horizontal measurement should control, inasmuch as nothing is said in the compromise agreement about how it should be measured, and hence the statute reads into the agreement horizontal measurement. It is argued that the reference to the deed of 1886 is a mere recital under a "whereas" clause; and yet, when defendant surveys the land, the deed of 1886 is invoked, and the survey made as of that date; that is, the magnetic variation is calculated from that date. If the reference to the deed of 1886 be a mere recital and of no effect as evidencing the intentions of the parties, then the land should have been located under the calls and distances of the agreement of 1913, and the magnetic variation calculated from that date. It is conceded by the surveyors that, unless the variation is calculated from 1886 and used in the survey, the well will lie north of the 18-acre tract. It seems that a survey of that tract, if it had been made as of the time of the agreement, and with horizontal measurement, would place the well without the 18-acre tract. As before stated, defendants cannot invoke the benefit of the recital under the "whereas" clause in the agreement and ignore that which is not beneficial therein. The true test is a survey of the land in the manner in which it was originally surveyed. We so construe the compromise agreement of 1913.

In view of our disposition of this cause largely upon the evidence of defendants' surveyors, in which it is shown that by surface measurement the well will be located on the 94-acre tract, we do not deem it necessary to pass upon plaintiffs' exceptions to certain portions of defendants' depositions.

The decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity herewith.

Reversed and remanded.

ROUSH v. ROUSH. (No. 4291.)

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 14, 1922.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. Divorce \S 27(8)—False charges of adultery against husband will not ordinarily be deemed "cruel or inhuman treatment."

False charges of adultery made by the wife against the husband ordinarily will not be deemed cruel or inhuman treatment, within the meaning of section 6, chapter 64, of the Code 1913 (sec. 3641), entitling the husband to a divorce from bed and board.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cruelty.]

2. Divorce \S 27(12)—Refusal of intercourse is not cruelty.

Nor is denial of sexual intercourse cruel or inhuman treatment within the meaning of the statute.

3. Divorce \S 287—On reversal of decree for husband, awarding alimony to wife, Supreme Court will provide for wife's maintenance and remand.

Where a decree awards a divorce to the husband and alimony to the wife, and it appears that they are living separate and apart, this court, in reversing the decree as to the divorce, will enter a decree providing for the payment of the alimony as for the wife's maintenance, upon a prayer therefor in her answer, and will remand the cause for the execution thereof.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Action by Homer Roush against Rosa Roush for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff for divorce from bed and board, and awarding him the custody of their four children, and awarding the defendant $25 per month alimony, and she appeals. Reversed and remanded, for execution of decree entered in the Supreme Court for alimony as for wife's maintenance.

W. K. Pritt, of Parsons, for appellant.
D. E. Cuppett, of Thomas, for appellee.

MEREDITH, J. Defendant complains of a decree granting her plaintiff husband a divorce from bed and board, awarding him the custody of their four children, and by which decree she was awarded alimony of $25 per month.

This suit is based on the legal charge of cruel or inhuman treatment; numerous acts are alleged, but the two relied on by the husband are: (1) False charges by the wife of the plaintiff's adultery; and (2) denial of sexual intercourse. All allegations are denied by the wife's answer, except the one charging the plaintiff with adultery; this is admitted and reiterated in her answer.

[1] The suit is brought under section 6, chapter 64, of the Code (sec. 3641):

"A divorce from bed and board may be granted for cruel or inhuman treatment, reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt, abandonment, desertion, or where either party after marriage becomes a habitual drunkard. A charge of prostitution made by the husband against the wife falsely, shall be deemed cruel treatment, within the meaning of this section."

It will be observed that the terms used in the statute are not defined. It does not say what shall be "cruel or inhuman" treatment, except in the one instance—"a charge of prostitution made by the husband against the wife falsely." It does not even say that a false charge of adultery made by the husband against the wife is cruel or inhuman treatment, but it uses the word "prostitution," a very different word. We do not mean to say that such a charge, when made against the wife, would, under no circumstances, be considered cruel treatment, but it is significant that the term "prostitution" is used, and not the term "adultery." We think that this statute, which in general terms enumerates grounds on which a divorce from bed and board may be granted, and, in the one instance, points out one specific act on the part of the husband toward the wife, which shall be deemed cruel treatment, and omits saying that repeated charges of adultery, falsely made against the husband by the wife, shall also be considered cruel treatment, inferentially, at least, negatives the idea that such false charges against the husband shall be deemed cruel treatment.

For obvious reasons a charge of adultery against the wife ordinarily is much graver than the same charge against the husband; and, if such charge is falsely made by the husband, and especially so if it is malicious and unfounded, and tends to cause the wife great mental distress and to undermine her health, it is ground for divorce. But it should take much stronger proof where the husband sues on this ground. Such a charge would affect different men differently. A gay Lothario would feel complimented; while a sensitive man of high position, good character and reputation might be subjected to great mental suffering, far beyond that which such a charge would naturally have upon the average man. But in the present case we do not think plaintiff has shown that he has been so affected. The charge does not seem to have disturbed his standing among his neighbors and friends, nor can we say that the evidence shows that he has been caused such mental distress as would tend to undermine his health. In the case of Maxwell v. Maxwell, 69 W. Va. 414, 71 S. E. 571, it was held that, in a suit for divorce from bed and board, based on cruel or inhuman treatment, the true issue and test is whether, under all the facts proven, plaintiff can, with safety to person and health, continue to live with defendant. And in the case of Goff v. Goff, 60 W. Va. 9, 53 S. E. 769, 9 Ann. Cas. 1063, it was held that such treatment of the wife by the husband as produces reasonable apprehension of personal violence, or produces mental anguish, distress, and sorrow, and renders cohabitation miserable, impairing, or likely to impair, the wife's health or mind, is cruel and inhuman treatment under the statute. But the proof in the present case in no sense comes up to this standard. We think, so far as this charge is concerned, the plaintiff can, with perfect safety to himself, continue to live with his wife.

[2] There is nothing whatever in plaintiff's second alleged ground, denial of sexual intercourse; he not only failed in his proof, and even had that not been the case, under the circumstances shown, he would not be entitled to a divorce. The record shows that, when the suit was instituted and for three months thereafter, the parties lived together, ate at the same table, slept under the same roof and in the same bed. Not until plaintiff's attention was called to this inconsistent and strange position, while being cross-examined by defendant's counsel in giving his deposition in this case, did he leave his wife's bed, and then simply moved into another part of the home. From the record it appears they continued to live that way up to the time of the final decree, and we would not know that they are now living separate and apart, had we not been so informed by counsel upon the oral argument of this case. But had it been clearly and positively proved that intercourse had been denied by the wife, under the circumstances shown in this case, the plaintiff would not be entitled to a divorce. Under the decisions of some states this is considered good ground, by a few as cruelty. Campbell v. Campbell, 149 Mich. 147, 112 N. W. 481, 119 Am. St. Rep. 660; Sisemore v. Sisemore, 17 Or. 542, 21 Pac. 820; Nordlund v. Nordlund, 97 Wash. 475, 166 Pac. 795, L. R. A. 1918A, 59; by others as desertion, Vosburg v. Vosburg, 136 Cal. 195, 68 Pac. 694; Graves v. Graves, 88 Miss. 677, 41 South. 884; Whitfield v. Whitfield, 89 Ga. 471, 15 S. E. 543; Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky. 510, 20 S. W. 605. The great weight of authority, however, is the other way. Platt v. Platt, 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 551; Pinnebad v. Pinnebad, 134 Ga. 496, 68 S. E. 73; Varner v. Varner, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 381, 80 S. W. 386; Cowles v. Cowles, 112 Mass. 298; Schoessow v. Schoessow, 83 Wis. 553, 53 N. W. 856; Underwood v. Underwood, 50 App. D. C. 323, 271 Fed. 553; Steele v. Steele, 1 MacArthur (D. C.) 506; Stewart v. Stewart, 78 Me. 548, 7 Atl. 473, 57 Am. Rep. 822; Pratt v. Pratt, 75 Vt. 432, 56 Atl. 86. So has this court held in the cases of McKinney v. McKinney, 77 W. Va. 58, 87 S. E. 928; Wills v. Wills, 74 W. Va. 709, 82 S. E. 1092, L. R. A. 1915B, 770; and Reynolds v. Reynolds, 68 W. Va. 15, 69 S. E. 381, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 889. There might be some reason for holding otherwise, though we do not mean to say we would so hold, where such denial would defeat one of the essential objects of the marriage; but in this case the parties have four children, ranging from five to seventeen years of age, perhaps more than the number in the average family, so one of the principal objects of marriage has been attained.

[8] The charge that the wife threatened to poison the husband is wholly unfounded. Plaintiff's conduct disproves it. He makes this charge and, in the same breath, complains that his wife refused to cook his meals, clearly showing that he has no fears on this ground. We have purposely refrained from detailing any of the evidence. Charge has been met with countercharge, crimination with recrimination; neither party is wholly free from fault, but the situation is not hopeless. The plaintiff is not entitled upon the record to a divorce. The defendant has not asked one, and she would not be entitled to it if she had; she does, however, ask for alimony, and the court allowed her $25 per month. In the case of Lord v. Lord, 80 W. Va. 547, 92 S. E. 749, we held that, in a suit for divorce, in which the prayer for relief was denied and, no divorce granted, there is no jurisdiction to alter the custody of the children, so that the decree, in so far as it grants a divorce to the plaintiff and awards the custody of the four children to him will be set aside; and upon her prayer for an allowance for her maintenance a decree will be entered here, requiring the plaintiff to pay to the defendant the sum of $25 per month, from the 1st day of January, 1921, that being the date fixed in the final decree of the circuit court, until the parties become reconciled and renew cohabitation, or the allowance becomes barred by her misconduct, or until the further order of the circuit court of Tucker county, as was done in the case of Huff v. Huff, 73 W. Va. 330, 80 S. E. 846, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 282, and upon principles announced in Lang v. Lang, 70 W. Va. 205, 73 S. E. 716, 88 L. R. A. (N. S.) 950, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1129, and Vickers v. Vickers (W. Va.) 109 S. E. 234; but the sums so decreed are to be credited with whatever payments have been made by plaintiff under the decree of the circuit court since the entry thereof, and the cause will be remanded for the execution of the decree entered in this court, and the defendant will be allowed her costs upon this appeal.

(188 N. C. 752)

STATE v. YATES. (No. 274.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Habeas corpus \Leftrightarrow 113(1)—No appeal from denial of writ, only remedy being by certiorari.

No appeal lies from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings, except in cases concerning the care and custody of children (C. S. § 2242), such judgment, if it involves the denial of a legal right, being reviewable only by certiorari, under Const. art. 4, § 8, authorizing the court to issue any remedial writs necessary to give it general supervision and control over proceedings of inferior courts.

2. Habeas corpus \Leftrightarrow 113(12)—Though no appeal lies from denial of habeas corpus, contention that parole cannot be revoked after expiration of term of sentence may be considered on merits.

Though no appeal lies from a judgment denying a writ of habeas corpus to one recommitted for violation of a parole, appellant's contention that such parole could not be revoked after expiration of the time for which he was sentenced, being a question of public importance and general interest, may be considered on the merits.

3. Pardon \Leftrightarrow 9—"Parole" construed as conditional pardon.

Since neither Const. art. 3, § 6, nor the statutes (C. S. §§ 7642-7644, 7749, 7752, et seq.), relative to pardons, authorize a "parole," unless the word be construed as importing a conditional pardon, an order granting a parole must be interpreted as a pardon on condition that the recipient comply with the terms imposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Parole.]

4. Pardon \Leftrightarrow 14—Prisoner violating parole may be recommitted for unexpired term, though time of sentence has expired.

If the conditions contained in a parole or conditional pardon be not illegal, immoral, or impossible of performance, the recipient, by accepting the pardon, accepts such conditions, a breach of which avoids the pardon and subjects him to rearrest and reincarceration to serve the balance of his unexpired term, though the time for which he was sentenced has expired; the essential part of the sentence being the punishment, and not the time when it shall begin or end.

Appeal from Superior Court, New Hanover County; Connor, Judge.

Application by Joe Yates for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Appeal by defendant from judgment on writ of habeas corpus. In October, 1919, the defendant was tried and convicted in recorder's court of the city of Wilmington for violation of the prohibition laws, and sentenced to the roads for a term of 12 months. He had served about 42 days of his term, when on December 10, 1919, Gov. Bickett granted the following "parole":

"To the Sheriff of New Hanover County:

"Upon the recommendation of the prosecuting attorney, the judge of the recorder's court of New Hanover county, and other representative citizens, the prisoner Joe Yates, now serving a sentence on the roads of New Hanover county, is hereby paroled for the balance of his term upon condition of good behavior and remaining a law-abiding citizen, and upon the further condition that should he violate the foregoing condition he shall receive no credit of his sentence for the time he is out on parole."

Between December 10, 1919, and December 2, 1921, the defendant was charged with repeated breaches of the criminal law. On December 2, 1921, Gov. Morrison issued the following "revocation of parole":

"To the Sheriff of New Hanover County, Greeting:

"I hereby revoke the parole of Joe Yates, granted December 10, 1919, upon satisfactory information that terms of said parole have been violated. You are hereby commanded to take the prisoner and to recommit him, in order that he may serve the remainder of his term, with no time allowed for previous good behavior, if any such time was entered to his credit.

"The prisoner was tried in the recorder's court of the city of Wilmington, on October 28, 1919, it being charged in the warrant that he violated the state prohibition law by operating a monkey rum still and making monkey rum. The judgment of the Court was that he serve 12 months in jail to be assigned to work on the county roads of New Hanover."

On December 4, 1921, the clerk of the superior court of New Hanover issued a capias for the defendant, and upon his arrest the defendant applied to Judge George W. Connor for a writ of habeas corpus. His honor heard the petition during the December term, 1921, of New Hanover, and, adjudging that the defendant was in lawful custody, refused to release him. The defendant excepted and appealed.

J. C. King and Herbert McClammy, both of Wilmington, for appellant.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ADAMS, J. [1] In Holley's Case Hoke, J., said:

"Our statute law has made no provision for appeal from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings, except in cases concerning the care and custody of children. Revisal, § 1854; C. S. 2242. Therefore it is, that when on such a hearing a question of law or legal inference is presented, and the judgment therein involves the denial of a legal right, it may be reviewed by certiorari, under and by virtue of the power conferred on this court by the last clause of section 8, article 4, of our Constitution: "And the court shall have power to issue any remedial writs necessary to give it general supervision and control over the proceedings of the inferior courts." In re Holley, 154 N. C. 164, 69 S. E. 872; State v. Lawrence, 81 N. C. 523; State v. Herndon, 107 N. C. 934, 12 S. E. 268; In re Croom, 175 N. C. 455, 95 S. E. 908; In re Fountain, 182 N. C. 49, 108 S. E. 342.

[2] For this reason the defendant's appeal must be dismissed; but as the record presents a question of public importance and general interest we will regard it as one of the exceptional cases that warrant consideration of the defendant's contention upon the merits. In re Sermon's Land, 182 N. C. 127, 108 S. E. 497; Cement Co. v. Phillips, 182 N. C. 440, 109 S. E. 257.

[3] The Constitution confers upon the Governor the power to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons, except in cases of impeachment, upon such conditions as he may think proper, subject to such regulations as may be provided by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons. Const. art. 3, § 6. In the exercise of the authority granted in the provision last cited the General Assembly has prescribed certain statutory duties which are to be observed by the applicant. Every application for pardon must be made to the Governor in writing, stating the grounds upon which executive clemency is sought, and must be signed by the applicant, or by some person in his behalf; and the Governor may grant a pardon subject to such conditions, restrictions, and limitations as he may consider proper and necessary. C. S. §§ 7642, 7643. When the prisoner violates the conditions which he must observe or perform, the Governor, "upon receiving information of such violation," shall forthwith cause him to be arrested and detained until proper examination can be made; and if it appears by his own admission or by such evidence as the Governor may require that he has violated the condition of his pardon, the Governor shall order him remanded and confined for the unexpired term of his sentence. C. S. § 7644.

[4] It is worthy of note in this connection that neither the Constitution nor the statute law authorizes a "parole," unless the word be construed as importing some form of conditional pardon. The advisory board of parole created by section 7749 merely determines whether in their judgment a person confined in the state prison is a proper subject of parole under a conditional pardon. Section 7752 et seq. We therefore regard it clear that Gov. Bickett's order must be interpreted as a pardon on condition that the defendant should comply with the terms imposed. So the instant and only question is this: Did Gov. Morrison have the legal right to revoke Gov. Bickett's conditional pardon after the time fixed in the original sentence had expired?

"It seems agreed that the King may extend his mercy on what terms he pleases, and, consequently, may annex to his pardon any condition that he thinks fit, whether precedent or subsequent, on the performance whereof the validity of the pardon will depend." Bacon's Abr. 412.

Under the modern law the power to grant a conditional pardon is generally subject to the limitation that the conditions imposed must not be illegal, immoral, or impossible of performance. The conditions contained in the parole granted by Gov. Bickett cannot be impeached on either of these grounds; and the defendant by accepting the pardon accepted also the conditions subsequent, a breach of which avoided the pardon and cancelled his right to further immunity from punishment. In re Williams, 149 N. C. 436, 68 S. E. 108, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 238; Fuller v. State, 122 Ala. 32, 26 South. 146, 45 L. R. A. 502, 82 Am. St. Rep. 1. In other words, when such breach by the defendant was duly determined and his conditional pardon thereby avoided, the defendant at once became subject to rearrest, although the time for which he had been sentenced had expired. Any other process of reasoning would disregard the primary fact that the essential part of the sentence is the punishment and not the time when the punishment shall begin or end. This doctrine is clearly stated in State v. Horne, 52 Fla. 125, 4 South. 388, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 719. There the defendant was convicted in 1898 of assault with intent to murder, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment; in 1901 a conditional pardon was granted; and in 1906 "long after the term of years of his original sentence had expired," the Governor of the state revoked the pardon, and the defendant was recommitted to prison. The defendant contended that his imprisonment was illegal, and the lower court discharged him on the ground that the alleged breach of the conditions occurred after the period of his sentence had expired. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment, and, among other things, said:

"The time fixed for executing a sentence, or for the commencement of its execution, is not one of its essential elements, and, strictly speaking, is not a part of the sentence at all. The essential portion of the sentence is the punishment, including the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, without reference to the time when it shall be inflicted. The sentence, with reference to the kind of punishment and the amount thereof, should, as a rule, be strictly executed. But the order of the court with reference to the time when the sentence shall be executed is not so material. Expiration of time without imprisonment is in no sense an execution of the sentence. Hollon v. Hopkins, 21 Kan. 638; Dolan's Case, 101 Mass. 219; State v. Cookerham, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.)

204; Ex parte Bell, 56 Miss. 282; Re Edwards, 43 N. J. Law, 555, 38 Am. Rep. 653, note."

And further:

"The defendant in error accepted the conditional pardon, thereby securing his release from imprisonment, and he is bound by its legal conditions and limitations. The provisions of the pardon are, in effect, that if, at any time during his life, the defendant in error shall fail to observe its conditions, the pardon shall be null and void, and he shall be arrested to serve out the remainder of his sentence of imprisonment that he has not already actually suffered. The violation at any time of the conditions of the pardon renders it by its terms null and void, and the status of the defendant in error is as though he had never received the conditional pardon. If, when the conditions of the pardon are violated, a portion of the quantum of imprisonment fixed by the sentence has not been suffered or served, the party should be returned to serve the remainder of his time of imprisonment, as stipulated in the terms of the pardon; and, besides this, the pardon by the breach of its conditions, is rendered in law void; and, if the sentence of imprisonment has not been fully executed, the law imposes the obligation to complete the service of imprisonment fixed in the judgment of conviction and sentence of punishment. The pardon may, as one of its restrictions and limitations, designate the time for the observance of its conditions; but, when the conditions are violated, the pardon becomes void in law, and the party is subject to the unsatisfied portion of the sentence as though no pardon had been granted."

In State v. Barnes, 32 S. C. 14, 10 S. E. 611, 6 L. R. A. 743, 17 Am. St. Rep. 832, the same question arose, and McIver, J., said:

"While it is quite true that the term of two years' imprisonment, to which the defendant had been sentenced in 1883, has long since expired, yet it is equally true that the defendant has not yet suffered imprisonment for that length of time; and as the pardon which he pleads has been adjudged insufficient to relieve him from suffering the whole punishment originally imposed upon him, it follows, necessarily, that he is still liable to be required to complete the term of imprisonment originally imposed, just as if he had escaped during that term. And such is the clear result of the authorities, both English and American."

These and other decisions fairly illustrate the principle which we think should be applied in the case at bar. There are others which apparently are in accord with the defendant's contention, but our researches have convinced us that the conclusion we have reached is supported by the better reasoning and authority. Fuller v. State, 122 Ala. 32, 26 South, 146, 45 L. R. A. 502, 82 Am. St. Rep. 1; State v. McIntire, 46 N. C. 1, 59 Am. Dec. 576; Ex parte Hawkins, 61 Ark. 321, 33 S. W. 106, 30 L. R. A. 736, 54 Am. St. Rep. 209; State v. Chancellor, 1 Strob. (S. C.) 347, 47 Am. Dec. 557; State v.

In our opinion the defendant cannot maintain his defense of exemption from rearrest on the ground that the breach of his parole took place after the expiration of the time for which he was originally sentenced.

The appeal is dismissed.

PATE v. GAITLEY et al. (No. 291.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Landlord and tenant §197—Lessee held liable for rent notwithstanding lessor's execution of deed to lessee pursuant to option given lessee to purchase land before date on which rent fell due.

Lessee, having expressly agreed to pay lessor the rent for certain year at the time when lessor gave him an option to purchase the land and also at the time that lessor gave lessee a deed pursuant to lessee's exercise of the option, was liable to lessor for such rent, though the deed was executed prior to the date when the rent for such year fell due according to the lease.

2. Evidence §419(5), 432—Frauds, statute of §158(3)—Vendor may prove nonpayment of purchase price and amount thereof notwithstanding statute of frauds or inconsistent recitals in deed.

In a suit for the purchase price of land, the vendor may prove by parol the amount thereof, the terms of payment, and its nonpayment, though deed contains a recital or acknowledgment contrary to the real transaction, since such recital constitutes only prima facie evidence of the payment of purchase price and may be rebutted by parol testimony, notwithstanding the statute of frauds or the rule against parol evidence varying the terms of written instrument.

Appeal from Superior Court, Robeson County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by Harmon Pate against R. T. Gaitley and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. No error.

McIntyre, Lawrence & Proctor, of Lawrence, for appellants.

Johnson & Johnson and McLean, Varser, McLean & Stacy, all of Lumberton, for appellee.

STACY, J. The defendants leased from the plaintiff a valuable farm, located in Robeson county and containing about 200 acres, for the years 1918 and 1919; and, as rent for said farm, it was stipulated and agreed in a written contract between the parties that the defendants should deliver to the plaintiff, "at Parkton, N. C., on or before the 15th day of October, of each year, during the life of said lease, fifteen bales of middling lint cotton, averaging 500 pounds to the bale." Later, and during the continuance of said lease, the defendant R. T. Gaitley took a written option from the plaintiff, whereby he acquired the right to purchase the farm in question at and for the price of $15,000. This option was exercised on or about September 10, 1919, at which time the plaintiff executed and delivered to the said defendant a warranty deed, with full covenants, conveying to him the locus in quo; same being the originally demised premises.

At the time of the execution of the option, and again upon the signing and delivery of the deed, conveying the property in question to the defendant, it was specifically agreed and understood between the parties that the rent, as previously stipulated, for the year 1919, should be reserved and paid to the plaintiff by the defendants in accordance with the terms of the rental contract. The jury have found that this understanding and agreement existed not only before the execution of the said option and deed, but that the same, as alleged in the complaint, was "specifically reiterated, repeated and agreed to at the time of the execution of the said option and execution and delivery of said deed, all of which was fully assented to and agreed to by the defendant R. T. Gaitley, and he did then and there repeat his promise to pay said rent for the year 1919, in accordance with the said written lease."

But the said defendant, R. T. Gaitley, now contends that, as he held a deed for the land and was the owner thereof, at the time the 1919 rent fell due, he is no longer liable to the plaintiff therefor, but that said rent passed to him under his deed, as owner of the property. For this position he relies upon the following decisions: Mixon v. Coffield, 24 N. C. 301; Lewis v. Wilkins, 62 N. C. 307; Kornegay v. Collier, 65 N. C. 69; Rogers v. McKenzie, 65 N. C. 218; Lancashire v. Mason, 75 N. C. 459; Holly v. Holly, 94 N. C. 674.

[1, 2] We do not think this position can avail the defendant in the face of the jury's finding that he had agreed otherwise and that such constituted a part of the consideration given for his option and deed. It is well settled that a vendor, in a suit for the purchase price of land, may prove by parol the amount thereof, the terms of payment, and its nonpayment, notwithstanding the deed may contain a recital or acknowledgment contrary to the real transaction between the parties. Faust v. Faust, 144 N. C. 383, 57 S. E. 22; Grabow v. McCracken, 23 Okl. 613, 102 Pac. 84, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1218 and note, 18 Ann. Cas. 503. Such recital is only prima facie evidence of the payment of the purchase price, and may be rebutted by parol testimony. Barbee v. Barbee, 108 N. C. 581, 13 S. E. 215

In Michael v. Foll, 100 N. C. 179, 6 S. E. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 577, the deed recited a consideration of $500, but the court admitted parol evidence to show that, at the time of the conveyance, the grantee agreed with the grantor that he should have one-half of the proceeds of the sale of the mineral interest in the land, if such sale were made during his lifetime, and that such entered into and became a part of the consideration and inducement for the transaction. To like effect is Manning v. Jones, 44 N. C. 368.

The admission of this character of evidence is not at variance with the rule against changing or adding to the terms of a written instrument by parol, nor is it prohibited by the statute of frauds. Harper v. Harper, 92 N. C. 300. The deed is not in controversy. It was executed by the plaintiff in performance of his part of the contract for the sale of the land, and it is but meet that the defendant should likewise comply with his agreement in regard to the amount that should be paid. The statute of frauds was not intended to shelter or to shield frauds, but to prevent them. 39 Cyc. 171; McNinch v. Trust Co., 183 N. C. —, 110 S. E. 663, and cases there cited.

In the instant case, the sale of the land is an accomplished fact; the deed has been executed and delivered; title has passed; but this ipso facto did not have the effect of relieving the defendant from his obligation to pay what he had agreed to pay. The contract in regard to the rent added no new covenant to the deed, nor did it contradict or explain any one that was incorporated in it. On the other hand, the plaintiff specifically affirms the deed and is now seeking to recover the full purchase price of the land. The suit is based upon an independent contract outside of, but in no wise in conflict with, the covenants appearing in the deed. "The recital of the amount of the consideration or of its receipt can be contradicted in an action to recover the purchase money, but that is because this is no part of the conveyance." Campbell v. Sigmon, 170 N. C. 351, 87 S. E. 118, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 40.

As the rent-cotton was evidently intended to be paid out of the crops grown upon the farm in question, it would seem that the reservation might be justified, also, under the doctrine announced in Flynt v. Conrad, 61 N. C. 191, 93 Am. Dec. 588, and other cases to like import; but, as the fact does not affirmatively appear—the written lease not being set out in the record—we deem it unnecessary to discuss this suggested phase of the case.

We have found no error in the trial, and the judgment of the superior court will be upheld.

No error.

ARMOUR FERTILIZER WORKS v. SIMPSON. (No. 285.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Sales \S 358(1)—In action on note for fertilizer, defendant may show delay in shipment, with knowledge of purpose for which fertilizer was to be used.

In an action on a note for fertilizer, which defendant claimed was not promptly delivered as agreed, evidence that plaintiff's agent was acquainted with the quality of defendant's soil, and informed of the purpose for which the fertilizer was to be used, was improperly excluded.

2. Sales \S 358(1)—In action on note for fertilizer delayed in shipment, defendant may show relative production with and without fertilizer, or usual effect of delayed planting when fertilizer is used.

A purchaser of fertilizer, claiming delay in shipment, may show, when sued on a note given therefor, the relative production of his land with and without the fertilizer, and the usual effect under ordinary conditions of delayed planting when fertilizer is used, and evidence as to cultivation and tillage, the crop planted, when planted, quality of the soil, and the condition of the weather and the seasons may be considered.

3. Courts \S 107—Speculative and conjectural elements, having no foundation for proof, excluded in applying former decisions.

In applying former decisions, all purely speculative and conjectural elements, which have no foundation for proof, should be excluded.

4. Sales \S 178(6)—No waiver of breach by execution of note for purchase price where loss could not then be ascertained.

A purchaser of fertilizer, the shipment of which was negligently delayed, did not waive such breach of the contract by executing a note for the fertilizer when delivered, where the loss subsequently sustained could not be ascertained or estimated at such time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Kerr, Judge.

Action by the Armour Fertilizer Works against George F. Simpson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Civil action tried before Kerr, Judge, and a jury at the October term, 1921, of Cumberland. Plaintiff sued to recover the amount alleged to be due on a note executed by defendant for fertilizer. Defendant admitted the execution of the note, and pleaded plaintiff's breach of contract in failing promptly to deliver the guano. There was evidence for defendant tending to show that the order was given plaintiff's agent in February; that a contract was made for delivery in March; that plaintiff had delivered other fertilizer in Cumberland county in March upon an order given in February; that plaintiff's shipment was made about the 1st of May and received a few days later; and that in consequence of the delay in making the shipment the defendant's crop was damaged to the extent of $700 to $900. The defendant pleaded a counterclaim for such loss. The note was executed after the fertilizer had been accepted by the defendant. At the close of the defendant's evidence the court held that the defendant could not recover on the counterclaim, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Bullard & Stringfield, of Fayetteville, for appellant.

Cook & Cook, of Fayetteville, for appellee.

ADAMS, J. [1] The defendant admitted the execution of the note, and introduced several witnesses, who testified in his behalf. Their evidence tended to show that the plaintiff's agent was acquainted with the quality of the defendant's soil, and informed of the purpose for which the guano was to be used, and that the plaintiff through inadvertence in misplacing or losing the defendant's order delayed the shipment from March until May. We think the evidence should have been submitted to the jury.

"Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive, in respect of such breach of contract, should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, that is, according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it." Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 353.

[2] If the purchaser of guano may show a breach of warranty as to its quality by the effect of its use upon his crops (Carter v. McGill, 168 N. C. 507, 84 S. E. 802), why may he not by proper evidence show the relative production of land with and without the fertilizer, or the usual effect under ordinary conditions of delayed planting when fertilizer is used. Evidence as to cultivation and tillage, the crop planted, the time of planting, the quality of the soil, and the condition of the weather and the seasons may, under proper instructions, be considered by the jury. Carter v. McGill, supra; Tomlinson v. Morgan, 166 N. C. 560, 82 S. E. 953; Herring v. Armwood, 130 N. C. 177, 41 S. E. 96, 57 L. R. A. 958; Spencer v. Hamilton, 113 N. C. 49, 18 S. E. 167, 37 Am. St. Rep. 611; Neal v. Hardware Co., 122 N. C. 105, 29 S. E. 96, 6 Am. St. Rep. 697; Gatlin v. Railroad, 179 N. C. 433, 102 S. E. 779.

[3] In material respects Ober v. Katzen- stein, 160 N. C. 440, 76 S. E. 476, is distinguishable from the case under consideration; but in that case it is said that when the vendor knows that the fertilizer is for the purchaser's crops and fails to deliver it, and the purchaser because of the lateness of the season is unable to purchase it elsewhere, he is entitled to damages. In the present case there was evidence that the plaintiff's agent repeatedly told the defendant that the shipment would be made.

But in applying the decisions, as suggested in Carter v. McGill, 171 N. C. 775, 89 S. E. 28, all purely speculative and conjectural elements which have no foundation for proof should be excluded.

[4] We cannot hold as an inference of law that the defendant waived his alleged defense by the execution of the note; for, according to his contention, the loss he claims subsequently to have suffered could not then be ascertained or estimated.

The judgment of his honor in dismissing the defendant's counterclaim is reversed, and this will be certified to the end that the court may determine the matters in controversy in accordance with law.

Reversed.

(183 N. C. 271)

AYCOCK v. GILL. (No. 112.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Contracts §128(1)—Agreement to stifle prosecution of any kind is void.

Since the concealment of a felony is an indictable offense, which is greatly aggravated by compounding the felony, that is, by an agreement not to prosecute, and, in the case of offenses less than felony, the concealment or compounding, though not indictable, is contrary to public policy, an agreement to stifle a prosecution of any kind is void and unenforceable.

2. Contracts §128(1)—Agreement to use influence to procure mitigation of punishment is illegal.

An agreement by one who had procured the arrest of plaintiff's nephew on a criminal charge to use his influence to induce the court to be lenient is contrary to public policy, and a note given by plaintiff for the amount of defendant's claim in consideration of that agreement is illegal, and cannot be enforced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by J. J. Aycock against J. E. Gill, for the cancellation of a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff on admissions in the answer, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought for the cancellation of a promissory note for $400 made by the plaintiff to the defendant, upon the ground of duress, and because it was given upon a promise to suppress a criminal prosecution, or to mitigate the punishment of the plaintiff's nephew for the crime of false pretense. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff upon admissions in the answer, holding that the note was not enforceable, but was "invalid, null, and void," as against public policy, and ordered that it be delivered up by the defendant to be canceled.

Plaintiff's nephew, J. D. Hinnant, had been arrested under a warrant of a justice of the peace, issued at the request of the defendant, for false pretense. The answer admitted that, at the request of the deputy sheriff and Hinnant, J. E. Gill drove Hinnant and deputy sheriff and police officer from Zebulon, N. C., to Fremont, N. C., in order that Hinnant might arrange for his bond, and not be committed to jail, Gill stating to Hinnant and the deputy sheriff that he would charge the sum of $20 for the round trip; that, arriving at Fremont, Hinnant talked to his uncle, the plaintiff, J. J. Aycock, and to another uncle named Aycock, whose initials this defendant does not now recall; that J. J. Aycock informed the sheriff and the defendant, Gill, that he had raised J. D. Hinnant, and was very much concerned about him; that the plaintiff, J. J. Aycock, asked the defendant, Gill, would he release his nephew, Hinnant, if he (the said Aycock) would sign a note guaranteeing the payment of the debt that Hinnant owed the defendant, Gill, which then amounted, including the expense of the automobile trip, to $398.95; that the defendant, Gill, informed the plaintiff, Aycock, that he could not agree to discharge his nephew, Hinnant, but that, if the plaintiff, Aycock, desired to guarantee the payment of the debt, he, the said Gill, would state to the court that the same had been settled, and would request the court to be as lenient as possible with said Hinnant; that, after some discussion, the plaintiff, Aycock, signed a note, together with said Hinnant, payable to the order of the defendant, J. E. Gill, on December 1, 1920, for $398.95, with interest from its date, July 27, 1920.

The defendant appealed from the judgment.

J. Faison Thomson, of Goldsboro, and W. G. Massey, for appellant.

Langston, Allen & Taylor, of Goldsboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendant, it is true, denied that there was any duress employed in obtaining the note in question, or that the consideration of it was against public policy, and also denied that he had done anything to stifle a criminal prosecution, and in support of this general denial he stated what was done, which is above set forth. It will not be necessary to inquire if there was any legal duress exercised by the defendant to procure the note, as, if the note is void because the consideration of it is illegal, being against public policy, it is not enforceable, whether obtained by duress or not.

[1] The cases in this court have settled the general principle involved in this case. Blythe v. Lovinggood, 24 N. C. 20, 37 Am. Dec. 402; Garner v. Qualls, 49 N. C. 223; Vanover v. Thompson, 49 N. C. 485; Lindsay v. Smith, 78 N. C. 328, 24 Am. Rep. 463; Corbett v. Clute, 137 N. C. 546, 50 S. E. 216. In Thompson v. Whitman, 49 N. C. 47, it is decided that the concealment of a felony is an indictable offense, and that the offense is greatly aggravated by compounding the felony; that is, "by an agreement not to prosecute or make known what has come to the knowledge of the party." In offenses less than felony, this compounding or concealment is not indictable, but it is, nevertheless, against the policy of the law and the due course of justice, and a court of law will not lend its aid to enforce any such contract or agreement. In Garner v. Qualls, 49 N. C. 223, the same doctrine is held, the court declaring that no executory contract, the consideration of which is contra bonos mores, or against the public policy, or the laws of the state, can be enforced in a court of justice. The consideration there was the compounding, or suppressing, a prosecution for an alleged forgery. The bond was declared void, although the act may never have been, in the view of the law, a forgery. In Ingram v. Ingram, 49 N. C. 188, the court declared that an agreement among persons interested in an estate not to bid against each other at the administrator's sale is void, as being against the public policy. It may be now, therefore, pronounced a settled principle "that contracts founded upon agreements to compound felonies or to stifle prosecutions of any kind" are void, and cannot be enforced. The court said, by Pearson, J., in Thompson v. Whitman, supra:

"His honor was of opinion that the consideration of the bond sued on was not against public justice. In this there is error. According to the view we take of the case, Taylor was not at liberty to take care of his private interest by accepting an indemnity, and thereby depriving the state of an active prosecutor; which is one of the means relied on for the conviction of offenders. The testimony of Taylor, when contrasted with that of Martin before the committing magistrates, in reference to the same transaction, suggests the fear that this douceur had taken effect. When the person directly interested is appeased before the trial, he is under strong temptations to favor the offender."

There are many cases decided by this court to like effect as those already cited, which it is not necessary to consider, as they all settle the principle above stated in the same way.

[2] The defendant contends that his admissions do not bring this case within the principle above stated, as he did not agree to stifle a criminal prosecution or to do anything contrary to the public policy, but only agreed, as the consideration for the note given by the plaintiff to him, that he would intercede with the court in behalf of the plaintiff's nephew, and induce it to be lenient with him. But we are of opinion that even that consideration was illegal, and rendered the note void. It has been held that agreements to use influence, or tending to encourage the use of influence, with the prosecuting attorney in respect to criminal prosecutions are illegal. 9 Cyc. p. 502, and note 33, where the cases will be found; Merwin v. Huntington, 2 Conn. 209; Rhodes v. Neal, 64 Ga. 704, 37 Am. Rep. 93; Shaw v. Reed, 30 Me. 105; Wilkey v. Collier, 7 Md. 273, 61 Am. Dec. 346; Ormerod v. Dearman, 100 Pa. 561, 45 Am. Rep. 391; Barron v. Tucker, 53 Vt. 338, 38 Am. Rep. 684; Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 344. Bonds or promises in consideration of "ease or favor" to prisoners held under criminal process are illegal. The case of Buck v. Bank, 27 Mich. 293, 15 Am. Rep. 189, is so much like this one, and the decision of it was made by a court of such eminence, the opinion being by Judge Cooley, that we may well rest our decision of this case upon it, as it covers fully the questions we have here to determine. The syllabus of that case thus states the substance of the decision:

"B. having robbed the plaintiff, the defendant, a relative of B.'s, was induced to execute to plaintiff promissory notes in consideration of a promise by the plaintiff to petition the court to mitigate the punishment of B. Held, that the notes were against public policy, and not enforceable by the plaintiff."

After reciting the evil tendencies of a contrary rule, Judge Cooley says:

"If the real inducement to the defendants to give the notes was the assurance of the officers that they would sign, or be more likely to sign, a petition for favor to R. M. Buck, then it is obvious that the transaction, stripped of whatever, in a legal point of view, was immaterial, was simply this: One party was to give a pecuniary consideration, and the equivalent was, that another would sign, or promise to sign, or be more likely to sign, a petition for the mitigation of a criminal punishment. It is too plain for argument that such a transaction is not only wanting in the requisites of a legal contract, but that in its tendency it is immoral and pernicious. * * * Such consequences can only be precluded by an inflexible rule of law, that services or assistance of any kind or any description, calculated or intended to influence the action of a court, except in the open and public modes of argument and evidence which the law provides for and allows, can never be a legal consideration for the promise of a pecuniary return.

"We do not stop to point out that assistance from pecuniary motives to lighten the punishment of a criminal is the same in nature and only different in degree from assistance from the like motives to shield him from punishment entirely. We prefer to put this case entirely upon the tendency such an understanding as the defendants set up, must have to encourage deception of the judge, and to mislead him in the facts upon which his judicial action should be based. * * * The highest considerations of public policy demand that the pecuniary interests of individuals should not be recognized as legitimate motives to influence the action of official persons, and that in the case of courts most especially, every avenue should be carefully guarded against the intrusion of such motives. Caution is especially required in the case of parties injured by crime, who apply to avert or mitigate the penalty, because the court would be likely to give exceptional weight to their suggestions."

It was said in Lindsay v. Smith, 78 N. C. at page 331 (24 Am. Rep. 463), to be a matter of the gravest public concern that all infractions of the criminal law should be detected and punished. A party cannot take care of his private interest by depriving the state of a witness or an active prosecutor, which is the means relied on for the conviction of offenders; much less can he pollute the very fountains of criminal justice by suppressing an indictment already instituted against him. And it has been said that anything inconsistent with the impartial course of justice will not be upheld, even if the intent of the parties is not fraudulent, and although no evil resulted in the particular case. 1 Mod. Amer. Law, p. 125. It is the temptation to do wrong where money is to be received for the service that does the harm, as it is likely to prevent, obstruct, or prejudice the due administration of justice. In this case it was not purely voluntary and gratuitous service that was to be performed, but it was to be done under the stimulus of a consideration the promisor should receive for mitigating the punishment.

It would seem that, in this case, the object of the defendant, if not his sole object, was to collect his claim against Hinnant through resort to a criminal prosecution, so that he might later, by the use of duress, induce the plaintiff to come to the relief of his nephew, who was being prosecuted, as he did by giving the note upon the illegal promise that J. E. Gill would induce the court to act with leniency toward the nephew.

If the defendant, J. E. Gill, had his debt against Hinnant secured, and had promised, as a consideration therefor, that he would use his influence to mitigate the punishment of Hinnant, the result would be that his interest in the further prosecution of the case would be greatly diminished, if not totally withdrawn, and he would cease to fulfill his duty in the vindication of public justice, or the enforcement of the law. The state, as said in Thompson v. Whitman, supra, would thereby be "deprived of an active prosecutor," and instead would be met by passive indifference.

As was said in a somewhat similar case:

"Although this case comes, as we think, under familiar principles of law, it is yet somewhat peculiar and novel in its facts; and in this decision we do not intend to trench upon the rights of respondents, or of their friends and counsel in their behalf, in the use of all legitimate means of defense." Barron v. Tucker, 53 Vt. 338, 38 Am. Rep. 684.

Our conclusion is that the court was right in the judgment it rendered upon the pleadings.

Affirmed.

J. E. LANE & CO. v. CENTRAL ENGINEERING CO. et al. (No. 330.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 12, 1922.)

1. Evidence \S 445(1)—Oral changes in contract made subsequent to execution are admissible.

An oral agreement varying a written contract is admissible in evidence if it was made subsequent to the original contract.

2. Municipal corporations \S 354—Company receiving benefit from change in contract is estopped to deny liability therefor.

A contractor having a contract for the construction of city streets, which was modified after originally made by changing the specifications of stone required so as to make the expense of producing the stone greater, who requested a subcontractor to furnish stone in accordance with the changed specifications, and received and used such stone in the performance of its contract, is estopped by receiving the benefit under the change to deny the validity of the change or its liability for the increased cost.

3. Municipal corporations \S 376—Requirement that defendant city pay amount due codefendant to plaintiff to apply on judgment against codefendant held proper.

In an action by a subcontractor against the principal contractor and the city, where judgment for extra expense incurred by reason of change in the contract was rendered against the principal contractor, and the city admitted it still owed money to the principal contractor, a judgment requiring the city to pay the amount it admitted it owed to the subcontractor to be applied on the judgment against the principal contractor was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by J. E. Lane, trading as J. E. Lane & Co., against the Central Engineering Company and the City of Burlington. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

In 1917 the city of Burlington contracted with its codefendant, the engineering company, to build certain streets, and the latter company contracted with the plaintiff to furnish the stone for that purpose, the stone to be furnished according to plans and specifications of the city which were made part of the contract between them. Thereafter the defendant engineering company agreed with the city for certain changes in the contract which necessitated changes in the stone to be furnished by plaintiff, and the plaintiff alleges that such changes were made with the understanding and agreement that the plaintiff was to receive additional compensation for the extra expense of furnishing different sized stone from that specified in the original contract. The plaintiff further alleged that the city of Burlington allowed the defendant engineering company additional compensation because of such changes in the contract, and that the plaintiff notified the city of Burlington of its claim against the engineering company before the city settled with the engineering company, and that because of such changes there was due the plaintiff the sum of $2,965.51. Both the defendants answered, and denied the allegations of the plaintiff in regard to the changes in the contract and in regard to the promise to pay additional therefor, and the engineering company went further and set up a counterclaim in the sum of $300 and interest against the plaintiff because the engineering company had to go into the open market and buy stone, which the plaintiff was to furnish, on an occasion when the plaintiff's plant broke down for which it had to pay an increased price of $300.

The jury found on the issues submitted that the Central Engineering Company was indebted to the plaintiff in the full amount claimed, $2,965.51, for which the court entered judgment, deducting the counterclaim of $300, and, it appearing that the sum in the hands of the city of Burlington still due and unpaid to the engineering company amounted to $2,413.50, on motion of the plaintiff, and with the assent of the city of Burlington, judgment was entered that said sum of $2,413.50 be paid by the city to be credited upon the amount above adjudged due the plaintiff by the defendant engineering company.

Carroll & Carroll, of Burlington, for appellants.

Parker & Long, of Graham, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This cause was ably argued upon both sides, but we think that the matters in controversy were almost entirely for the consideration of the jury, who have found the facts in accordance with the contention of the plaintiff, and that judgment was properly entered against the engineering company for the full amount claimed by plaintiff subject to the counterclaim of $300.

[1] The defendant engineering company claimed that there was not sufficient allegation of a change in the contract, and that the evidence concerning such changes was incompetent because they varied a written contract. We think, however, the allegations are clearly stated, and the decisions are settled that the change varying a written contract was competent as it was made subsequent to the original contract. Freeman v. Bell, 150 N. C. 148, 63 S. E. 682; Mfg. Co. v. McPhail, 181 N. C. 208, 106 S. E. 672.

[2] Bishop, who represented the defendant engineering company in requesting the change of the stone to a smaller size, stated that the plaintiff would be reimbursed for the extra expense incurred. He was superintendent in charge of the work in Burlington on behalf of the company. The company accepted the work and is chargeable for the value of the same even if there was no express promise. It is estopped by receiving benefit under the change in the contract to deny its validity and the company's liability therefor.

[3] The city of Burlington having admitted that it had in hand $2,413.50, balance due the engineering company for the work done, and submitted its readiness to pay this amount in its hands to the person determined by the verdict, judgment was properly rendered that the city pay over that amount to the plaintiff to be credited upon the judgment rendered against the engineering company.

We think the issue submitted was sufficient to present every phase of the questions in controversy which indeed have been practically passed upon in Powell v. Lumber Co., 168 N. C. 632, 84 S. E. 1032, and need not be repeated in this opinion.

No error.

(183 N. C. 758)

STATE v. EVANS. (No. 323.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Intoxicating Liquors \S 238(1)—Evidence of manufacture held sufficient for jury.

In a prosecution for manufacturing liquor, evidence held sufficient for the jury.

2. Witnesses \S 277(3), 337(4)—Cross-examination of defendant as to contents of coat found near still held competent to impeach defendant's character and disprove alibi.

In a prosecution for manufacturing liquor, cross-examination of defendant as to whose picture was in the pocket of his coat, found near the still, and as to whom a letter found therein was from, whether he had deserted his wife, and similar questions, to which he replied that the picture was his wife's, that he had not deserted her, but that they had been divorced, held competent to impeach his character, and to shake his denial of being at the still.

3. Criminal law §729 — Solicitor's remark contradicting defendant's denial of collateral matter designed to impeach character held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for manufacturing liquor, the solicitor's remark, after defendant denied that his wife was taking care of his children, that "it is so," held not prejudicial, where the court interposed and the solicitor withdrew the remark and apologized.

4. Criminal law §1171(3) — Solicitor's remark that he would like to read letter found in defendant's coat held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for manufacturing liquor the solicitor's remark, in answer to a question by defendant's counsel as to whether he thought he had a right to read a letter found in defendant's coat near the still, or examine defendant about it, that he would like to read it, held not prejudicial, where it did not appear that he offered to read it, or made any statements or suggestions as to its contents; the jury's verdict turning on whether the evidence identified defendant as the man seen running from the still.

5. Criminal law §304(2), 1171(1)—Repetition of remarks, ruled out as not based on evidence, held not harmless; judicial notice taken that liquor is carried across state lines for sale.

Though it is a matter of common knowledge that illicit liquor is continually carried across state lines for sale, a solicitor's remark to the jury that "all of us know that men manufacture liquor in one state and carry it 250 miles into another state to sell it," after the court had ruled out similar remarks as to matters not in evidence, was not harmless error, though it may have had no influence on the verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Granville County; Devin, Judge.

Houston M. Evans was convicted of manufacturing liquor, and he appeals. New trial ordered.

The defendant was convicted on an indictment for manufacturing liquor. The testimony for the state was that Officers Hutchins, Hobgood, Walters, Bowling, and Newton, on the afternoon of June 26, 1921, went out on Bearskin creek, in Granville county, and found a still being operated by a white man and a negro. When the officers got within about 20 steps of them, both ran. The white man dropped a coat, which he had in his hand. He was small and slight, and about the same size as the defendant. In the coat which was dropped was found a photograph, which the defendant on the stand admitted was a picture of his wife, and letters from her to him, and a subpoena from a Virginia court to him, and a letter from a Virginia lawyer. This coat was dropped by the white man, who was about the same size as defendant, as he ran away from the still, which he was assisting in operating. The defendant attempted to explain the presence of his coat at this still by testifying that on June 23 he and a man named Chandler rode over from South Boston, Va., to Oxford, and while on the way the coat dropped off the door of the car on which it was lying. The defendant was corroborated on this point by testimony of two men, Chandler and Green, who also testified, in corroboration of defendant's alibi, that they were fishing together at Barnett's pond, in Person county, on that date, June 26.

The state in reply introduced a justice of the peace, a county policeman, and a deputy sheriff, all from South Boston, who testified that the character of the defendant and Chandler and Chrismus was bad. It was admitted by the defendant that he had been convicted in Virginia for having liquor, but he claimed that he had appealed. Verdict of guilty, judgment, and appeal.

D. G. Brummitt, of Oxford, for appellant.

The Attorney General and the Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1,2] The motion for nonsuit was properly denied. The defendant made exceptions to the question by the solicitor as to whose picture it was which was found in the pocket of the coat, which he admitted was his, and he was asked, to impeach the witness, questions as to whom the letter was from, and whether he had not deserted his wife, and similar questions. The witness admitted that the picture was that of his wife, denied that he had deserted her, and said that they had been divorced. These and other questions along that line were competent to impeach the character of the defendant, and to shake his evidence in denial of being at the still, and as to the attempt to prove an alibi.

[3] At one point in the cross-examination, when the solicitor asked the defendant if his wife was not taking care of his children, and he denied it, the solicitor said, "It is so." Counsel for the defendant, in arguing the case before the court, stated that this was said very loudly, while the Assistant Attorney General represented it as having been said in a low tone, as a "side" remark. The record does not show which was right as to this. The jury are presumed to be men of intelligence and can hardly ever be influenced by such byplay. Certainly there was no error committed by the court, for he instructed the jury not to consider it, and the solicitor both withdrew the remark and apologized. State v. Saleeby, 110 S. E. 844, at this term.

It was a collateral matter in a cross-examination to impeach the defendant, who had put his character in evidence by going upon the stand, and the jury must have fully understood that they were to acquit or convict the defendant upon the evidence as to the commission or innocence of the offense with which he was charged. Such colloquies between counsel and witnesses, on cross-examination, whether in civil or criminal actions, are not orderly and should always be avoided. It could hardly have had any effect as the solicitor, in a few minutes, was arguing to the jury that the statement of witness "was not so." Besides, the judge interposed, and the solicitor apologized.

[4] The solicitor further asked the defendant if he received the letter, which was found in his pocket, "from your lawyer in Virginia." The defendant's counsel objected to any reading or examination of these letters, and asked if the solicitor thought he had a right to read that letter to the jury, or examine the witness about it. It does not appear from the record that the solicitor had offered to read the letter, or made any statement or suggestion as to its contents; but on this suggestion from the defendant's counsel the solicitor countered by turning to the jury and smiling said that he would like to read it. We do not see that this remark could have had any bearing with the jury in any way. Their verdict necessarily must have turned upon whether the evidence identified the defendant as the man who was found at the still engaged in manufacturing.

[5] The solicitor further asked if the defendant had not been convicted in a liquor case in Virginia. The defendant admitted that he had been, but denied his guilt, and said that the case had been appealed, and testified that he never made any liquor, and never sold any. The solicitor in his argument to the jury mentioned a case in Roxboro, in which it was shown that a negro from there continually went to South Boston for blockade liquor. Defendant's counsel objected, upon the ground that there was no evidence connecting the defendant with the transaction. The court sustained the objection, saying, "The solicitor must confine himself to the evidence." The solicitor further stated in his speech that men who live in one state go 100 miles into another state to get liquor, and that a still had been established on the border land between the two states by a negro from Apex. The defendant's counsel again objected, and the court held that it "was not proper for the solicitor to argue to the jury matters not in evidence, or state particular facts in other cases," and instructed the jury not to consider the same. But the solicitor, it appears, then said,

"Well, gentlemen of the jury, you all know of that affair, and all of us know that men manufacture liquor in one state and carry it 250 miles into another state to sell it."

The defendant's counsel objected to this remark. Doubtless it is a matter of common knowledge that illicit liquor is continually carried across state lines for sale, but we cannot say that the conduct of the solicitor in repeating this remark, after the court had ruled out such remarks as to matters not in evidence, was harmless error. It may have had no influence upon the verdict of the jury, but certainly the solicitor should not have repeated the remark after the court had ruled, and properly, that such statements should not be made by the solicitor.

There was no exception to the judge's charge, but for the reason just given we think that the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

MINTON v. EARLY et ux. (No. 128.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 22, 1922.)

1. Constitutional law \S 83(3)—Landlord and tenant \S 320 — Statute, making criminal abandonment of land by tenant without paying advances by landlord, held void.

C. S. \S 4480, providing that a tenant who abandons a tenancy or crop without paying advances made by the landlord shall be punished by fine and imprisonment, without requiring allegation or proof of fraud either in the inception or breach of the contract, is void, as contrary to Const. art. 1, \S 16, prohibiting imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraud.

2. Statutes \S 84(2)—Part of statute imposing civil liability on one employing defaulting tenant held void as depending on void part of statute as to criminal liability.

The part of C. S. \S 4480, which provides that one employing a tenant with knowledge of the tenant's abandonment of a crop without paying advances by his landlord shall be liable to the landlord depends on a portion of the statute making the tenant criminally liable for such abandonment, which is unconstitutional, and is thereby rendered void.

3. Constitutional law \S 43(1) — Answering over after demurrer overruled held not to waive objection to constitutionality of statute.

In an action under C. S. \S 4480, for employing a tenant who had abandoned a crop without paying advancements made by plaintiff, the objection to the constitutionality of the statute was not waived because defendant answered over after overruling his demurrer.

4. Justices of the peace \S 43(2)—Action for more than $50 damages for persuading tenant to leave landlord cannot be maintained in justice court.

An action under C. S. \S 4480, for unlawfully persuading a tenant to violate his contract with his landlord without paying advances made by the landlord is one in tort, and may not be brought for more than $50 in a justice's court.

5. Justices of the peace \S 60—Objection that tort action for more than $50 could not be maintained in justice's court is not waived by answering over.

In an action under O. S. \S 4480, for persuading a tenant to leave his landlord without paying advances made by the landlord, the objection that the action, being for more than $50, was not within the jurisdiction of a justice's court, was not waived by answering over, but could be presented by motion to dismiss, demurrer ore tenus, or might be acted on by the court ex mero motu.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Calvert, Judge.

Action by C. M. Minton against John A. Early and wife. On appeal from a justice's court, judgment was rendered dismissing the action, from which plaintiff excepted and appealed. No error.

The action purporting to be under section 4480, Consolidated Statutes, is instituted by plaintiff, a former landlord, against defendants, on averment that one Jack Outlaw, after agreeing to make a crop on certain lands of plaintiff for 1918, and receiving advancements for said purpose as plaintiff's tenant to the amount of $79.82, wrongfully and willfully abandoned said crop without paying plaintiff for said advancements. And that defendants, with full knowledge of said abandonment, and after being forbidden so to do, employed said tenant to work for them and moved him on their lands, contrary to law as contained in section 4480 of the Consolidated Statutes. Defendant, reserving the right to move to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction and for that the statute on which the claim is based is unconstitutional, made answer, denying the acts alleged against defendant, and denying any and all knowledge of any breach of contract by the alleged tenant, and at spring term thereafter moved to dismiss case for that the statute is unconstitutional. Motion overruled. Cause continued.

At the trial term, the jury having been impaneled, the record states that the defendants again demurred because it appears that the action lies only in tort, and that the justice had no jurisdiction of same, the demand being for more than $50, and the justice's judgment being for more than that sum. Upon such demurrer and motion, judgment was rendered, dismissing the action, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellant.

Alex Lassiter, of Aulander, and John W. Davenport, of Windsor, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1] The action is based upon section 4480 of the Consolidated Statutes, and, if this were a valid law, we see no reason why an action ex contractu could not be maintained for the jurisdictional amount of $200, on the same principle we uphold in allowing a recovery for a statutory penalty; debt being maintainable for a "sum certain or easily reducible to certainty from fixed data or per agreement." Katzenstein v. Railroad, 84 N. C. p. 688; 2 Waite's Action and Defenses, p. 109; 1 Chitty's Pleadings, 108, 109; 8 Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.).

But in our opinion the statute referred to, imposing as it does the punishment of fine and imprisonment for abandoning a tenancy or crop, without paying for the advances made by the landlord, and without requiring any allegation or proof of fraud, either in the inception or breach of the contract, is in violation of our constitutional provision, article 1, \S 16, which inhibits "imprisonment for debt * * * except in cases of fraud." This has been virtually held in State v. Williams, 150 N. C. 302, 63 S. E. 949, wherein the court decides, the present Chief Justice delivering the opinion, that without averment of fraud, a bill of indictment under this section, then section 3366, Revisal, should be quashed. And for the same reasons, the clause of the statute making it indictable for a landlord to fail and refuse to furnish advancements as per agreement is an invalid provision; for without either averment or proof of fraud both are ordinary breaches of contract, for which the parties charged may only be held for the civil liability.

A similar decision appears in State v. Griffin, 154 N. C. 611, 70 S. E. 292, where a conviction, under section 4281, Consolidated Statutes (Revisal, \S 3431), for obtaining money, etc., under a promise to begin certain work and willful breach, was set aside for lack of any proof of fraud in the transaction other than the obtaining of the advances under the promise to begin the work and a failure to comply.

And the same general principle is approved and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191, a decision which this court recognized as controlling in the Griffin Case, supra.

[2] The parts of this statute which attempt to fix criminal liability on the tenant or cropper, who has merely broken his contract, being therefore invalid because in contravention of the constitutional guaranties protecting the liberty of the citizen, the clause which imposes, or attempts to impose, civil liability on any one employing such tenant or cropper with knowledge of such breach, connected with and dependent as it is upon the former, both in express terms and substance, must also be avoided. Keith v. Lockhart, 171 N. C. 451-458, 88 S. E. 640, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 916, citing Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U.

S. 463-501, 28 Sup. Ct. 141, 52 L. Ed. 297; Riggsbee v. Durham, 94 N. C. 800; Black on Constitutional Law, p. 63. In Riggsbee's Case, the principle adverted to is stated as follows:

"While some provisions in a statute may be unconstitutional and void, others may remain and be enforced, but the rule does not apply, when the constitutional and unconstitutional parts of the statute are conducive to the same object, and the dislocation of the unconstitutional part would so affect its operation that the act would fail in an essential part."

The position finds support in the fact that there is doubt if the Legislature could impose a liability of this kind upon one employing another, who has merely incurred civil liability by a breach of his contract. This right of a citizen to contract and deal with another is itself among the liberties and vested rights protected by constitutional guaranties, and should always be carefully upheld by the courts. Smith v. Texas, 233 U. S. 630, 34 Sup. Ct. 681, 58 L. Ed. 1129, L. R. A. 1915D, 677, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 420; Allegeyer et al. v. Louisiana, 165 U. S. 578, 17 Sup. Ct. 427, 41 L. Ed. 832; 6 R. C. L. p. 269.

In Smith v. Texas, supra, Associate Justice Lamar, speaking to the question, said:

"Life, liberty, property and the equal protection of the law, grouped together in the Constitution, are so related that the deprivation of any one of those separate and independent rights may lessen or extinguish the value of the other three. In so far as a man is deprived of the right to labor his liberty is restricted, his capacity to earn wages and acquire property is lessened, and he is denied the protection which the law affords those who are permitted to work. Liberty means more than freedom from servitude, and the constitutional guaranty is an assurance that the citizen shall be protected in the right to use his powers of mind and body in any lawful calling."

[3] For the reasons stated, the action cannot, in our opinion, be maintained upon the statute, and the judgment of the lower court dismissing the same must on that ground be upheld, and the position is not waived because the defendant has answered over after demurrer overruled. Garrison v. Williams, 150 N. C. 674, 64 S. E. 783, and authorities cited.

[4] The plaintiff has supplemented his declaration on the statute by the averment that—

"Defendants willfully and unlawfully persuaded, induced, and assisted said Jack Outlaw to violate his contract with plaintiff, and it is contended in the argument before us that by reason of this additional averment, with evidence tending to support it, the plaintiff could sustain a recovery as in a common-law action for wrongfully enticing his tenant from his position and employment, to plaintiff's damage."

The action is said to have originated or to have been originally maintained on the first English statute of laborers, and while it has been recognized as existent since the repeal of that statute, the cause of action, so far as examined, has been restricted to a willful or malicious enticement from the personal service of another. Hale on Torts, pp. 264, 265, and authorities cited.

The decisions of this state would seem to be against the maintenance of such an action in the case of tenant or cropper without a valid statute to that effect. State v. Etheridge, 169 N. C. 263, 84 S. E. 264; Swain v. Johnson, 151 N. C. 93, 65 S. E. 619, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615; State v. Hoover, 107 N. C. 795, 12 S. E. 451, 10 L. R. A. 726; Jones v. Stanly, 76 N. C. 355; Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, 16 Am. Rep. 780. But we are not now required to make direct decision on the question, for all the cases are agreed that such an action is for a tort, and, this being a case on appeal from a justice's court, the jurisdiction may not be extended to claims in excess of $50. Singer Machine Co. v. Burger, 181 N. C. 241, 107 S. E. 14; citing Stacey Cheese Co. v. Pipkin, 155 N. C. 394, 71 S. E. 442, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 606, and other cases.

[6] In this aspect of the matter, the judgment of his honor is clearly correct, and this, like the former position, going to the jurisdiction of the court, is not waived by answer over, but may be presented by motion to dismiss, demurrer ore tenus, or may be acted on by the court ex mero motu. Garrison v. Williams, supra.

We find no reversible error presented, and the judgment dismissing the action is affirmed.

No error.

CLARK, C. J., concurs in result.

STATE v. HAUSER et al. (No. 345.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 12, 1922.)

1. Larceny \S 40(6)—Defendant charged with larceny of diamond could be convicted on proof of theft of brooch in which diamond was set.

Defendant, charged with larceny of a diamond, could be convicted on proof that she stole a brooch with a large diamond set in the center thereof surrounded by pearls and small diamonds.

2. Larceny \S 40(9)—Defendant, who stole wife's diamond, could be convicted under indictment charging diamond to be property of husband.

Where husband and wife lived together, and husband had charge of wife's affairs and of the property in the house in which they lived, a defendant who stole wife's diamond could be convicted under indictment charging the diamond to be the property of the husband, notwithstanding that Constitution recognizes the wife's rights in her individual property.

3. Receiving stolen goods \Rightarrow 4—Defendant who sold stolen diamond knowing it to have been stolen by another guilty of receiving stolen goods whether he received it from such person to sell or stole it from her.

One who sold a diamond knowing it to have been stolen by another could be convicted of receiving stolen property regardless of whether he received it from such other person to sell it for her, or stole it from her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Harding, Judge.

Kate Hauser was convicted of larceny, and Curtis Gentry was convicted of receiving stolen property, and they appeal. No error.

The defendants were charged with stealing one diamond of the value of $700, the property of M. P. Orr, and for receiving the same knowing it to be stolen. The defendant Kate Hauser was found guilty of larceny of the stone, and Curtis Gentry guilty of receiving the same knowing it to be stolen. Judgment. Appeal by both defendants.

Holton & Holton and H. M. Ratcliff, all of Winston-Salem, for appellant Hauser.

C. W. Stevens, of Winston-Salem, for appellant Gentry.

James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The indictment charged the larceny of one diamond of the value of $700, the property of M. P. Orr. The evidence for the state, if believed, is conclusive that Kate Hauser was guilty of larceny of the diamond, which was a large diamond set in the center of a brooch surrounded by pearls and small diamonds. She stole the brooch, and it was later recovered in the same form as stolen. There was no separation of the diamond from the brooch. The defendant's counsel contends, however, that larceny of a diamond being charged in the bill and the proof being that it was set in the brooch was a fatal variance. If the defendant stole the diamond, it makes no difference whether it was attached to the brooch or in a bag or box or lying about loose. State v. Harris, 64 N. C. 128, in which the charge was for larceny of "50 lbs. of flour," and the proof showed theft of a sack of flour. This was approved in State v. Nipper, 95 N. C. 655, and in State v. Kiger, 115 N. C. 750, 20 S. E. 456. In this last case the charge was theft of so many gallons of brandy, and the proof was of so many barrels of brandy, which was held sufficient.

[2] The defendant further takes the objection that the indictment charged that the diamond was the property of M. P. Orr, and that it appeared in the evidence that it was the property of his wife; but the two were living together as husband and wife, and he had charge of her affairs and of the property in the house, and therefore had possession with her of legal effects. He therefore had possession, which was equivalent to a special property therein, notwithstanding that the Constitution recognizes the wife's rights in her individual property. State v. Wincroft, 76 N. C. 38; State v. Matthews, 76 N. C. 41; Bishop, New Criminal Procedure, p. 1687.

[3] The other defendant, Curtis Gentry, besides raising the two questions which are above raised on behalf of Kate Hauser, insisted there was no evidence in the case that he received the diamond knowing it to be stolen; but there was evidence, if believed, from which it appears clearly that Kate Hauser carried the brooch to Curtis Gentry's house. She was a colored nurse, and the testimony is that the brooch was worth about $600. He sold it for $50. The testimony is that she spent the night at his house, and the next morning the brooch was missing. Kate Hauser testified that he stole it from her. The conflict in the evidence on this point is not material, for, whether he received it to sell for her, knowing it to have been stolen, or stole it from Kate Hauser, he evidently knew that she had obtained the brooch unlawfully, and it could be charged either as her property or as the property of the true owner. Wharton, § 1825, and Ward v. People (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 396, both cited in State v. Wincroft, 76 N. C. 40. Being the same article, the larceny or receiving was against the rights of the owner, and could be charged as parts of the same illegal asportation in the same bill.

There are some other exceptions, but we do not think that they present questions that require discussion. We have, however, fully examined them, and, after hearing the learned argument of the counsel, we find no error.

STATE v. STRANGE. (No. 347.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 12, 1922.)

1. Criminal law \Rightarrow 1001—Ordering accused into custody at a subsequent term on judgment pronounced at a prior term not error.

Where defendant had pleaded guilty of unlawfully receiving liquor at a prior term, and judgment thereon had been suspended during good behavior, in default of which defendant was to work on the roads for 12 months, upon a finding at a subsequent term that defendant had not been of good behavior, ordering him into custody under sentence pronounced at the prior term was not error.

2. Criminal law §1144(16)—Where evidence relates to only one of several counts in an indictment, a general verdict is presumed to be returned on that count.

Where there are several counts in an indictment and there is evidence relating only to one, a general verdict will be presumed to have been returned on the count to which the evidence applies.

Appeal from Superior Court, Surry County; Long, Judge.

Seborn Strange was convicted of having liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale, of unlawfully receiving liquor, and of the unlawful transportation of liquor, and he appeals. No error.

Criminal action tried by Long, J., and a jury at the October term, 1921, of Surry. The defendant was prosecuted on an indictment containing four counts charging him (1) with the unlawful sale of liquor, (2) with having liquor in his possession for the purpose of sale, (3) with unlawfully receiving liquor, and (4) with the unlawful transportation. His honor instructed the jury upon the evidence relating to the second, third, and fourth counts. There was a general verdict of guilty.

The defendant at a previous term had pleaded guilty of unlawfully receiving liquor, and judgment had been suspended upon payment of costs; the defendant having given bond to appear at each criminal term for two years and show his good behavior, in default of which a capias was to issue and the defendant was to be worked on the roads for twelve months. This case is No. 40. At the October term, 1922, he was convicted of retailing in No. 46, and in No. 21 there was a verdict of guilty as above stated. In No. 40 his honor found that the defendant had not been of good behavior and ordered him into the custody of the sheriff under the sentence pronounced at the former term to the end that the sentence should be executed. In No. 46 the defendant was sentenced to 12 months on the roads, the service to begin at the expiration of the sentence in No. 40; and in No. 21 the prayer for judgment was continued.

The defendant excepted and appealed.

J. H. Folger, of Mt. Airy, for appellant.
James S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ADAMS, J. [1] The defendant assigns as error "his honor's pronouncing judgment" in the case in which the defendant had pleaded guilty at a previous term. But the record shows that his honor, instead of pronouncing judgment, ordered the defendant into custody under the judgment previously rendered, upon finding that he had not complied with its terms. This procedure is sustained by the decisions of this court. State v. Everitt, 164 N. C. 399, 79 S. E. 274, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 848; State v. Greer, 173 N. C. 759, 92 S. E. 147; State v. Hoggard, 180 N. C. 678, 103 S. E. 891.

[2] The defendant contends, in the second place, that there was no sufficient evidence to support his honor's instruction as to the unlawful transportation of the liquor. If this should be granted, still in support of two other counts there was ample evidence, and the jury returned a general verdict. Where there are several counts in an indictment and there is evidence relating only to one, a general verdict will be presumed to have been returned on the count to which the evidence applies. State v. Long, 52 N. C. 24; State v. Cross, 106 N. C. 650, 10 S. E. 857; State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. 168; State v. Gilchrist, 113 N. C. 673, 18 S. E. 319; State v. May, 132 N. C. 1021, 43 S. E. 819; State v. Gregory, 153 N. C. 646, 69 S. E. 674.

We find no error, and this will be certified.

No error.

(183 N. C. 763)

STATE v. HOOKER. (No. 161.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Habeas corpus §1113(1)—Judgment in proceeding by person committed for contempt reviewable only on certiorari.

In habeas corpus proceeding by petitioner who had been committed for contempt of court, the judgment was not appealable, since the action in such case can be reviewed only on writ of certiorari.

2. Habeas corpus §82(1)—Scope of inquiry on petition by person held under final sentence stated.

On petition for writ of habeas corpus by person held under a final sentence of a court, the only questions open to inquiry are whether on the record the court had jurisdiction of the matter, and whether, on the facts disclosed on the record, and under the law applicable, the court has exceeded its powers in imposing the sentence complained of.

3. Contempt §66(7)—Final sentence committing a person for contempt of court can be reversed only for lack of jurisdiction of court imposing sentence.

Where one has been convicted and sentenced for contempt of court under C. S. §§ 978, 981, 983, the final sentence can be reversed or modified only for lack of power or jurisdiction of the court imposing the sentence.

4. Contempt §35—Constitutional provision restricting punishment to be imposed by justices of the peace held not applicable to contempt proceedings.

Under C. S. §§ 978, 981, 983, authorizing justices of the peace to impose a fine not to exceed $250 for contempt of court, the mayor's court vested with the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace was empowered to impose a fine of $200 for contempt, notwithstanding Const. art. 4, § 27, restricting the punishment to be imposed by the justice of the peace, since such constitutional provision applies only to the ordinary administration of the law in the trial of criminal cases, and not to contempt proceedings.

5. Contempt \S 35—Justices of peace would have inherent power to punish for direct contempt in absence of statute.

If C. S. §§ 978, 981, 983, authorizing justices of the peace to punish persons for direct contempt by both fine and imprisonment, were invalid as violative of Const. art. 4, § 27, restricting the punishment to be imposed by justices of the peace, the court, in the absence of such statute, would have the inherent power to punish for direct contempt.

6. Contempt \S 72 — Judgment inflicting imprisonment enforced though portion imposing fine is invalid.

If judgment of the mayor's court fining a person $200 for direct contempt, and sentencing him to imprisonment for 30 days, was invalid in so far as the fine was concerned because violative of Const. art. 4, § 27, the portion of the judgment providing for imprisonment would be enforced.

7. Habeas corpus \S 111(1)—Prisoner detained under sentence in part valid not liberated until valid portion of sentence has been served.

A prisoner who is detained by virtue of a sentence in part valid and part otherwise need not be liberated on habeas corpus until he shall have served the valid part of his sentence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Lyon, Judge.

Petition by S. T. Hooker against the State for habeas corpus. From an adverse judgment, the petitioner appeals. Modified and affirmed.

On said hearing it was made to appear that D. M. Clark, Esq., mayor of the town of Greenville, and as such clothed by statute with the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, on the 12th day of September, 1921, was engaged in hearing causes in his office in Greenville, N. C., and, having disposed of one case, and taken up another, for a moment stepped just outside of the back door to get his spittoon, when he was approached and abused and assaulted by the petitioner on his action as mayor in having issued a criminal warrant for petitioner's son; that on rule and capias issued said mayor adjudged said petitioner guilty of contempt of court, sentenced him to jail for 30 days, and imposed a fine of $200, and petitioner was committed and held in custody under said judgment, when present proceedings were instituted.

In more direct reference to the occurrence, his honor, confirming the action of the mayor in this respect, finds the facts and conclusions of law as follows:

"That, on the same morning that S. D. Hooker was put in the lockup, to wit, August 12, 1921, the mayor held court in his private office for the disposition of two emergency cases; that he had disposed of one case, and was in the act of taking up and disposing of the second case, when he stepped outside of his back door to get a spittoon; he had turned to go back into his office when he was called by the respondent, S. T. Hooker, who at the time was in the rear of the office of J. C. Lanier; he said in his usual tone of voice, 'Come here a minute, Clark'; the mayor took the respondent to be rational, and approached the respondent at a point within a few feet from his office and in the rear of the office of J. C. Lanier, the two offices adjoining; he was met by the respondent, S. T. Hooker, S. D. Hooker, and J. C. Lanier; the respondent faced the mayor, and commenced to accost him in a very angry, menacing, and threatening manner, asking the mayor, 'What in the hell did you issue a warrant against my son, S. D. Hooker, for?' then and there denouncing the mayor, calling him a liar, a common street loafer, a leech upon the community, and a son of a bitch, shoving him off with a push on the shoulder, at the same time opening a pocket knife, which he held behind him in a position ready to strike; the knife was taken from the respondent by a police officer, Stokes, who had come out of the mayor's office, attracted by the loud, abusive language of the respondent to the mayor.

"The mayor did not attempt to strike or resist the attack or the language of the respondent, using no loud, abusive, or profane words, simply saying, 'I don't care to have any argument. The matter can be settled in court.' The mayor then walked back to his office, the respondent following him, and continuing to abuse, slander, curse, and denounce him.

"The denunciatory and abusive language and the assault of the said S. T. Hooker was contemptuous, and interfered with the mayor, and prevented him from the proper and lawful discharge of his official duties, and was had and done for the purpose of intimidating the mayor in the performance of his duties in the trial of the said S. D. Hooker, and said conduct was committed while the court was actually sitting for the transaction of business."

And upon these and other findings the court entered judgment as follows:

"Upon the foregoing facts it is considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the acts and conduct of the respondent were contemptuous, and brought contumely and insult upon the court, and were committed in the presence of the court, and it is further considered and adjudged that the said S. T. Hooker was in contempt of said court.

"It is further ordered and adjudged that the findings of D. M. Clark, mayor, be and the same are hereby fully sustained, and it is ordered and adjudged that the said S. T. Hooker be and he is hereby adjudged to be on contempt of the court of D. M. Clark, mayor.

"If further appearing that the judgment of the court exceeded the jurisdiction of the mayor, in that he could only fine the said Hooker $50 or imprison him 30 days, it is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged that this cause be remanded to the mayor of the town of Greenville, to the end that judgment be entered herein pursuant to law, by said mayor, D. M. Clark."

From which said judgment the petitioner appealed.

J. C. Lanier and H. W. Whedbee, both of Greenville, for appellant.

J. S. Manning, Atty. Gen., and Frank Nash, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. Our decisions hold that, except in cases concerning the care and custody of children, no appeal lies from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings, but the action of the judge must be reviewed, if at all, by writ of certiorari, which rests in the sound discretion of the appellate court. In re Blanche McCade (N. C.) 111 S. E. 3, at the present term, citing among other authorities, in the Matter of Lee Croom, 175 N. C. 455, 95 S. E. 903; In re Tinner Holley, 154 N. C. 163, 69 S. E. 872.

[1] Under these, and other decisions to like effect, this appeal, therefore, should be dismissed but for the fact that the Attorney General, waiving notice, has consented that the cause be heard and determined as on writ of certiorari if such course meets the approval of the court. The court having so determined, and considering the cause in that aspect, it appears that the defendant has been found guilty of direct contempt of the mayor's court of the city of Greenville, in violent abuse and direct assault on the mayor, while engaged in the administration of public justice and in the exercise of jurisdiction with which he is clothed, and for such conduct is held in custody under a sentence by the mayor, imposing imprisonment for 30 days and a fine of $200, and sues out this writ of habeas corpus to inquire and determine as to the legality of his detention.

It is held with us that the writ of habeas corpus cannot be made to serve the purpose of an appeal or writ of error. And our statute on the subject provides: 'That on a hearing of this character the prisoner shall be remanded when it appears that he is held in custody:

(1) By virtue of a process issued by a court or judge of the United States in a case where such judge or court has exclusive jurisdiction.

(2) By virtue of a final judgment or decree of any competent court of civil or criminal jurisdiction or of any execution issued upon such judgment or decree.

(3) For any contempt, specially and plainly charged in the commitment by some court, officer, or body having authority to commit for the contempt charged.

(4) That the time during which such party may be legally detained has not expired.

[2] And, in the application and construction of these principles, and the statutory provisions cited, it is the accepted position that, where one is held under a final sentence of a court, a commitment of contempt or other, the only questions open to inquiry are whether on the record the court had jurisdiction of the matter, and whether, on the facts disclosed in the record, and under the law applicable to the case in hand, the court has exceeded its powers in imposing the sentence complained of. In re Lee Croom, 175 N. C. 455, 95 S. E. 903; In re Tinner Holley, supra.

Speaking to the question in Holley's Case, supra, the court said:

"And in determining this question of power the court is confined, as heretofore stated, to the record proper and the judgment itself. It is not permitted that the testimony or the rulings thereon should be examined into nor that matters fairly in the discretion of the presiding judge should be reviewed or that judgments erroneous in the ordinary acceptation of the term should be questioned. The hearing is confined to the record, and judgment and relief may be afforded only when on the record itself the judgment is one clearly and manifestly beyond the power of the court, a statement of the doctrine supported in numerous and authoritative decisions here and elsewhere"—citing Ex parte McCown, 139 N. C. 95, 51 S. E. 957, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 603; In re Schenck, 74 N. C. 807; In re Swan, 150 U. S. 637, 14 Sup. Ct. 225, 37 L. Ed. 1207; Ex parte Coy, 127 U. S. 731, 8 Sup. Ct. 1263, 32 L. Ed. 274.

This being the recognized principle that prevails in a hearing and case of this kind, our statute on contempts being chapter 17, § 978, Cons. St., et seq., constitutes the acts and conduct of defendant as established in this case a direct contempt, authorizes punishment by imprisonment not to exceed 30 days or fine not to exceed $250, or both, in the discretion of the court (C. S. § 981), and in express terms confers power to impose it on every justice of the peace, referee, commissioner, clerk of the superior, inferior, or criminal court, or the judges of superior and Supreme Court, board of commissioners, or corporation commissioner, when "sitting for the trial of causes or engaged in official duties" (C. S. § 983).

[3] Defendant having been convicted and sentenced under the provisions of the statute, this is a final sentence from which no appeal lies in the ordinary acceptation of the term, and, where under the authorities cited, and others, of like kind, can only be reversed or modified for a lack of power or jurisdiction of the court imposing the sentence. In re Croom, supra; State v. Little, 175 N. C. 743,

94 S. E. 680; In re Brown, 168 N. C. 417, 84 S. E. 690; Ex parte McCown, 139 N. C. 95, 51 S. E. 957, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 603.

[4] It is urged for petitioner that this sentence is beyond the power of the mayor's court which is only vested with the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, and whose powers, therefore, under article 4, § 27, of the Constitution are restricted to a fine of $50 or imprisonment for 30 days, but the court is of the opinion that the limitations of this article and section apply and were designed to apply to the ordinary administration of the law in the trial of criminal causes, and were not intended to affect the inherent or statutory powers possessed by these courts, and conferred upon them as necessary to enable them to transact business and maintain a proper "respect for their authority." This is undoubtedly the Legislature's construction of the section of the Constitution referred to, for, as we have said, the statute in express terms confers the power to punish and fine to the amount stated on justices of the peace, as well as on courts of record, and there are decisions here and elsewhere which strongly favor this view. In re Griffin, 98 N. C. 225, 3 S. E. 515; State v. Lyon, 98 N. C. 575; People v. Tool, 35 Colo. 225, 86 Pac. 224, 229, 231, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 822, 117 Am. St. Rep. 198; 6 R. C. L., title Contempt, § 43.

In Griffin's Case, supra, speaking of the distinction and some of the differences that exist between proceedings for contempt and the ordinary administration of the criminal law, Chief Justice Smith said:

"The one belongs to the general administration of the [criminal] law, the other is an exercise of judicial authority inherent in the court, and indispensable in the exercise of its functions. If the act which shows the contempt constitutes also a criminal offense, it may be prosecuted and punished as such, notwithstanding the contempt has also been punished."

And in State v. Lyon, in which it was held that a justice of the peace in proper cases had the power to require an adequate bond to keep the peace, and no appeal would lie, though the result might, in its practical operation, work an imprisonment far beyond the 30 days' limitation on a justice's jurisdiction, Merrimon, Judge, said:

"This view is not in conflict with the provision of the Constitution (article 4, § 27), and the statute [on the subject]. These provisions have reference to criminal cases wherein the magistrate gives judgment against a party charged with a criminal offense, and imposes on him a punishment" therefor.

[5] And in no event would the petitioner be entitled to his discharge on the facts of the present record. Even if the statute authorizing justices to both fine and imprison for direct contempt of court were held invalid as violating the constitutional restrictions on their criminal jurisdiction, these courts have with us, and without any statute, the inherent power to punish for direct contempt, when engaged in the administration of the state's justice, and in the exercise of the jurisdiction and powers conferred upon them by the law. In re Deaton, 105 N. C. 59, 11 S. E. 244; Scott v. Fishblate, 117 N. C. 265, 23 S. E. 436, 30 L. R. A. 696; State v. Aiken, 113 N. C. 651, 18 S. E. 690.

[6] And, this being true, though the fine of $200 were invalid, the portion of the judgment inflicting an imprisonment for 30 days would be well within the constitutional provisions, and must be enforced according to its terms.

[7] It is the established principle in cases of this character that, when a prisoner is detained by virtue of a sentence in part valid, and part otherwise, he may not be liberated on habeas corpus till he shall have served the valid portion of his sentence (In re Holley, supra, citing U. S. v. Pridgeon, 153 U. S. 48, 14 Sup. Ct. 746, 38 L. Ed. 631; Ex parte Erdmann, 88 Cal. 579, 26 Pac. 372); a position directly recognized and approved in subsection 4 of our statute on habeas corpus as above quoted, "that the prisoner shall be remanded when it appears that the time during which he may be legally detained has not expired."

This will be certified that the judgment of the mayor's court be enforced as entered.

Modified and affirmed.

(183 N. C. 281)

FRY v. SOUTHERN PUBLIC UTILITIES CO. et al. (No. 441.)

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 5, 1922.)

1. Master and servant §305—Custom of boys to ride on ice wagons admissible to rebut contrary instructions.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's son while riding on an ice wagon colliding with a street car, where defendant claimed it had given instructions to prohibit boys from riding on the steps of its wagons, evidence on behalf of plaintiff that it was the custom of the boys, not objected to by the drivers of the wagons, to ride upon the steps, was admissible to show that, if the order was given, it had been abrogated, or at least waived.

2. Master and servant §305—Waiver of safety rule presumed from customary violation.

Where the customary violation of a safety rule has continued so long that the master either knew of it, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known of it, and he acquiesced in it, he is presumed to have consented to its repeal or to have waived obedience to it.

3. Master and servant §305—Waiver of owner's rule prohibiting children from riding on ice wagons shown.

Evidence that for many years it had been the custom for small children to ride upon defendant's ice wagons, and that defendant's officers knew of such custom, which was permitted, and even encouraged, by those in charge of the wagons, held sufficient to show a waiver of the rule prohibiting children from riding on the wagons.

4. Negligence §22½—Evidence of custom of children to ride in violation of ordinance competent.

The fact that the custom of children to ride upon ice wagons was contrary to a city ordinance does not render evidence of a custom permitting them to ride inadmissible in an action against the owner for the death of a boy while so riding.

5. Negligence §85(7)—Ordinance against riding on vehicle held not violated by child.

Where the evidence showed that boys were permitted to ride upon ice wagons with the consent of those in charge thereof, and were even encouraged to do so, it was not unlawful for a boy to ride upon the steps of a wagon notwithstanding an ordinance prohibiting any one from riding on a vehicle without the consent of the driver.

6. Negligence §136(29)—Contributory negligence of boy 12 years old for jury.

In an action for the death of a boy who was 1 month and 7 days under 12 years of age, an instruction that a boy under 12 years of age could not be guilty of negligence was erroneous, since the negligence of a boy of that age is a question for the jury, and not a question of law.

7. Negligence §85(1)—Age element of contributory negligence.

The youth of an injured person is a circumstance to be considered with other factors in determining contributory negligence, since a very young person is not held to the same degree of care as an adult; but, except in cases of extreme youth, that factor alone is not sufficient to negative contributory negligence.

8. Negligence §136(25)—Contributory negligence, as proximate cause of injury to child riding on vehicle, held for jury.

In an action for the death of a 12 year old boy, the question whether his contributory negligence, if any, in riding on the steps of an ice wagon, was the proximate cause of his injury, was a question for the jury, where there was evidence that the driver of the wagon knew he was there and recklessly drove onto a street car track in front of an approaching street car without any signal or without looking to see if the track was clear.

9. Negligence §83—Last clear chance rule stated.

Where defendant by exercising due care can discover plaintiff's peril resulting from plain-tiff's negligence in time to avoid injuring him, defendant is liable for failure to do so.

10. Appeal and error §930(1)—Verdict must be construed in light of evidence and charge.

The verdict must always be construed in the light of the evidence and the charge of the court, especially resolving all inferences in favor of the successful party.

11. Negligence §100—Contributory negligence no defense to wanton injury.

Where the acts of defendant which caused the death of plaintiff's intestate were willful or wanton, that is, without regard to the consequences of the act and indifferent to the rights of others, contributory negligence is no defense.

12. Negligence §100—Violation of traffic ordinance not of itself willfulness.

The driver's act in crossing a street at a place contrary to the ordinance would not of itself constitute willfulness against which the contributory negligence of a person killed thereby would be no defense, but that fact may be considered as one of the facts in evidence tending to show the act was willful.

13. Master and servant §306—Willful negligence of wagon driver imputable to owner.

Where the driver of defendant's wagon was guilty of culpable negligence, against which contributory negligence would be no defense, the defendant itself may be liable to the plaintiff upon the principle of respondeat superior.

14. Appeal and error §1003—Supreme Court does not weigh the evidence.

The Supreme Court does not undertake to decide a case on the evidence, but leaves its weight and sufficiency to the jury.

Clark, C. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Lane, Judge.

Action by W. A. Fry, as administrator of the estate of Perry Fry, against the Southern Public Utilities Company and the Standard Ice & Fuel Company. Judgment for plaintiff against the Standard Ice & Fuel Company, and that defendant appeals. New trial.

This action was brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by the defendant's (Standard Ice & Fuel Company's) negligence.

On June 28, 1919, plaintiff's son and intestate, Perry Fry, was instantly killed in a collision between an ice wagon of the Standard Ice & Fuel Company and a street car of the Charlotte Street Railway Company, at a point on Tryon street about 50 feet south of the intersection made by Tryon and Ninth streets in the city of Charlotte. On that day Perry Fry was under 12 years of age, his exact age being 11 years, 10 months, and 23 days.

The railway company was repairing its tracks on North Tryon street from Seventh to Ninth streets, and had dug up the concrete from between the rails and placed it in a pile, about 2 feet wide at the bottom and 18 inches to 2 feet in height, at the end of the cross-ties along the east side of the track, which had so narrowed the driveway on the right or east side of the street that there was room for only one vehicle to travel at a time from Seventh to Ninth street. This pile of concrete extended from Seventh street to Ninth street, with the exception of an open space about 30 feet in length just south of and about 50 feet distant from Ninth street. It was in this open space that the collision occurred.

It was Saturday afternoon about 4:30 o'clock, and the ice wagon, having completed its work for the day on Seventh street, came out of Seventh into Tryon and proceeded northward on Tryon on its return to the ice plant, traveling on the east side of the street between the piled up concrete and the curbstone of the sidewalk. C. L. Hill, the white man in charge of the wagon, and whose duty it was to ride on the rear step of the wagon, had abandoned the wagon at Seventh street, intrusting its safe return to the plant to the negro driver, Will Ferguson, and a half-grown negro helper, Robert Kinston. The latter, who was riding in the front seat with the driver, was so engrossed in eating his delayed midday lunch that he had no knowledge of the collision or its attendant circumstances, except that the impact thereof threw him out of the wagon.

Somewhere between Seventh street and the point of collision, a very congested section of the city, Perry Fry, and another small boy of about the same age, got on the rear step of the ice wagon; young Fry riding on that end of the step nearest the car tracks. This step was 14 inches from the ground. Before reaching the open space the driver heard boys' voices behind his wagon, and on looking back saw young Fry riding upon the rear step. When the wagon came to the open space in the pile of cement 50 feet south of Ninth street, the horses without warning were driven upon the street car track in a diagonal course toward West Ninth street, and very near an approaching street car. The front wheels of the ice wagon were upon the car track when the street car, also running north, struck the hub of the left front wheel of the wagon, knocking the front of the wagon away from the tracks and throwing the rear of the wagon in toward the street car. Young Fry was thrown from the rear of the ice wagon under the street car between the trucks, and when the car was stopped within its own length he was lying under the rear trucks of the street car. The left horse was down on the track with its feet in the fender of the car. Young Fry was dead when removed from under the street car.

It had been the custom for many years for little children to ride upon the rear step of defendant's wagons for the pleasure of the ride as well as to get ice. This custom was known to the defendant and had been constantly permitted by the drivers of its wagons. There was danger in children thus riding on the wagons of this defendant which was also known to the defendant.

The city of Charlotte had before the time of this fatality adopted the following ordinance, which was then in force:

"No vehicle shall be turned unless a signal shall previously be given by the whip or hand indicating the direction in which the turn is to be made. The driver of any vehicle, upon a track in front of a street car, shall, upon signal from the driver or motorman of said car, turn to the right of the track. The vehicles moving slowly shall keep as close as possible to the curb on the right of the street, allowing more swiftly moving vehicles free passage to their left. A vehicle overtaking another shall pass on the left side of the overtaken vehicle, and shall not pull over to the right until entirely clear of the vehicle passed. A vehicle, when turning to the left to enter an intersecting street, shall slow down to a speed of five miles per hour, and shall not turn until it shall have passed beyond the center of such intersecting street."

There was testimony that defendant had knowledge of this custom of small children riding on its wagons, and also that it had actual knowledge, through its driver, that the small Fry boy was on its wagon some time before the collision occurred which resulted in his death. Will Ferguson, the driver, testified:

"As I was driving down Tryon street that afternoon, between Eighth and Ninth streets, there was an opening just ahead of the left side where no broken concrete and rock had been piled upon or in the street. I heard a boy's voice behind my wagon say, 'Come on up! Come on up!' and I looked around through the wagon and saw this little white boy who got killed standing on the rear step."

The driver did not stop to put the boy off, nor did he tell him to get off. He drove his wagon through the open space 50 feet from the street intersection and upon the car track and close to the approaching street car.

W. J. Dellinger testified that, when the wagon looked like it was going to cross, "the street car was not far south of that open space; they were right close together." R. F. Rankin testified, "The street car and the ice wagon were very close together when I noticed the ice wagon," before the collision. Willie Wilson, who was on the street car, testified that the "car was somewhere about the middle of the block" when the horses started upon the tracks. R. A. Galloway testified that the horses' heads were about 6 feet from the open space when the car was about the middle of the block. Neal Elliott, the motorman, testified, that the car was only 15 feet away when the horses started upon the track. M. T. Kelley, Fred Stewart, and W. P. Chambers testified that the street car was 20 feet away when the horses started to cross the track. Not only was the wagon driven upon the car tracks in close proximity to the approaching car, but in turning to cross the tracks the driver did not hold out his hand or give any signal of his intention to cross. Neal Elliott, the motorman, testified, "The driver did not throw out his hand or warn me." Fred Stewart, who was standing at the corner of Ninth street in front of the wagon and in a position to see the actions of the driver, testified:

"Saw the ice wagon and the driver when the horses started across the track. The driver just started across there, and the street car hit the front wheel. Did not see the driver throw out his arm; he did not throw out anything. He did not look."

This witness further testified:

"The driver of the ice wagon was not paying any attention to anybody or anything. He did not look to the side of him, nor behind him, nor do anything except to drive the horses across there at a slow trot; he moved across diagonally."

The driver of the wagon testified that, just as he reached this open space, an automobile passed on his right next to the curb, and that as a result his horses shied and thus got upon the car tracks. Nowhere do we find in the record any evidence which supports the testimony of the driver in this regard. The eyewitnesses introduced by both the plaintiff and the defendant, except the driver, said the horses were driven upon the tracks and that no automobile passed the ice wagon at or near the time of the collision. C. G. Terrell, the only eyewitness introduced by the defendant, except the driver, testified:

"The horses were responsive to the driver. They moved as if they were being moved by the driver."

And again the defendant's same witness testified:

"When I saw the horses start to turn across the track, the street car was between the center of the block and Ninth street. The street car was not ringing any bell, and from that time on the horses proceeded diagonally across the track in the open space and the street car came right after them."

Nor was there sufficient room between the concrete piled up along the rails and the curb for an automobile to pass the ice wagon. W. J. Dellinger testified:

"There was plenty of room to go along for one, but I don't hardly believe there was room for two."

R. F. Rankin testified:

"There was only one passway. This obstruction on the side of the street would not permit but one car to go through there. An automobile could not pass the ice wagon as it was going down there."

J. D. Johnson, a police officer, testified:

"Two automobiles could not have passed in there from Seventh street down to Ninth street with the material piled up there to the right of the rail."

The evidence in the record appears to contradict the driver, and shows that no automobile did pass the ice wagon. W. J. Dellinger, who was driving in an automobile in the same direction with the wagon and about a block and a half behind the ice wagon, testified:

"Saw no automobile behind the ice wagon. Could not see the front of ice wagon. There was not any vehicle to the side or behind it from the time I first saw it and the collision occurred. There was not any automobile passed the ice wagon after I saw it. I did not see an automobile come and go by this ice wagon and cause the horses to shy across the track; none passed the ice wagon. No automobile between me and the ice wagon; nothing but the ice wagon and the street car in front of me."

R. F. Rankin, who was in the automobile with Dellinger, testified:

"There was no car or other vehicle between me and the ice wagon when I saw it. No car passed the ice wagon about the time of the collision or before. I was going down the street behind the street car and the ice wagon. If there had been an automobile between me and the ice wagon, I certainly would have seen it."

Even the negro helper, Robert Kinston, riding in the front seat with the driver, saw no automobile pass the ice wagon.

A perusal of the record will tend to show, as the jury evidently found, that Hill, the man in charge of the wagon, had abandoned it at Seventh street; that the driver drove across the street 50 feet south of the intersection in violation of an ordinance of the city of Charlotte; that in doing so he failed to give any signal or warning of his intention to cross in violation of the ordinance; and that without looking or listening, and knowing that young Fry was in a position of danger on the back of his wagon, as the evidence tends to show and the jury found, he drove across the street in dangerous proximity to an approaching street car. There was at all events sufficient evidence to carry this question of fact to the jury.

Other material facts will be noticed in the opinion of the court.

The judge charged the jury, as to the fifth issue, as follows:

"If you find, by the greater weight of the evidence, that the street car in question was being operated at a lawful rate of speed, and that the motorman had given all necessary and proper signals of the approach of the car to the ice wagon in question, and also of his approach to the Ninth street crossing, notwithstanding which facts the driver of the ice wagon, after he saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the approach of the street car, negligently and recklessly without signal or warning of any kind, and without looking or listening, drove his wagon upon, or dangerously near, the said street car track in such close proximity to the approaching street car as to render it impossible for the motorman in charge of said car to avoid a collision with the wagon, either by slackening the speed of his car, or stopping the same, after he saw a collision was imminent, and that the driver knew the perilous situation of the ice wagon, then the court charges you that the driver of the ice wagon would be guilty of willful negligence, and, if you find such negligence was the proximate cause of the intestate's death, then you will answer the third issue, 'Yes.'"

And the judge further charged the jury, on the fourth issue, as follows:

"If the jury find by the greater weight of the evidence that, with knowledge of the fact that the boy was riding on the rear step of the ice wagon, said driver willfully and wantonly drove his wagon across the said car track, without either looking or listening for the approach of a car or giving any signal or warning of his intention to drive the wagon on or across the track, and shall further find by the greater weight of the evidence that the motorman in charge of said street car saw, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, this boy on the rear steps of the ice wagon, if you find he was there, notwithstanding which he willfully operated said car at a speed between 20 and 30 miles an hour between Eighth and Ninth streets, in violation of the ordinance of the city of Charlotte, and that the aforesaid willful and negligent acts of the motorman and driver of the car and wagon were the sole and only concurring proximate causes of the plaintiff's intestate's death, then you will answer the fourth issue, 'No,' independently of whether the plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser upon the ice wagon at the time of the collision or not."

The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(2) If not, was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant Southern Public Utilities Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: No.

"(3) If not, was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant Standard Ice & Fuel Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Did the plaintiff's intestate by his own negligence contribute to his death? Answer: No.

"(5) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $5,000."

Judgment on the verdict and defendant (Standard Ice & Fuel Co.) appealed.

Jas. A. Bell and Edgar W. Pharr, both of Montgomery, for appellant.

E. T. Cansler and D. B. Smith, both of Charlotte, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1-3] If the first assignment of error is sufficiently stated under our rules, we are of the opinion that it is without any substantial merit. It was competent to prove the custom of small boys to jump upon the rear step of the wagon to ride and get bits of ice for several reasons, and, among them, to answer the contention of defendant that instructions had been given to the drivers not to permit riding on the wagon by small boys. If such order was given, the plaintiff surely was entitled to show that it had been constantly violated, for a long time, with the knowledge of the drivers and those in charge of the wagon, from which the jury could well infer that the owner of the wagon had notice of its nonobservance and that it was an order of the company more honored in the breach than in the observance, and, in legal contemplation, it had been abrogated or, at least, waived. Biles v. R. R. Co., 139 N. C. 528, 52 S. E. 129; Haynes v. R. R., 143 N. C. 154, 55 S. E. 516, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 972; Smith v. R. R. Co., 147 N. C. 603, 61 S. E. 575; Bordeaux v. R. R. Co., 150 N. C. 528, 64 S. E. 439; Railway Co. v. Mobley, 6 Ga. App. 33, 64 S. E. 300; P. L. Co. v. Whetzel, 118 Va. 161, 86 S. E. 898; Robinson v. R. R., 71 W. Va. 423, 76 S. E. 851; Railroad Co. v. Reagan, 96 Tenn. 128, 33 S. W. 1050. It has been held generally that if a rule is made for the safety of the servant or others, but its customary violation has continued so long that the master either knew of it, or could by the exercise of ordinary care have found it out, and acquiesced in it, he is presumed to have consented to its repeal, or to have waived obedience to it. Smith v. R. R. Co., supra; Biles v. R. R. Co., 143 N. C. 78, 55 S. E. 512. But so far as the rule or order to the drivers in this case is concerned, it does not appear to have been observed at all, and boys were allowed to ride on the rear step of the wagon at their pleasure, even when the manager of it, who had left on this occasion, was there. All this evidence, and more, is sufficient to show, at least, the tacit consent of the driver and manager to such a course of conduct by them, and the jury have doubtless so found. If this be so, and it can hardly be disputed, the act of this young boy was not within the prohibition of the city ordinance forbidding it only when it is without the consent of the driver, or person controlling its movements and management.

As this is a question of capital importance in the decision of the case, we will refer to some of the evidence bearing upon it: For many years it had been the habit, and custom, for small children to get upon and ride upon the rear of defendant's ice wagons, both for the pleasure of riding and for the purpose of getting small pieces of broken ice. In doing so they rode from door to door and frequently for considerable distances out of the neighborhood in which they lived. So general had been this practice, and so long continued, that one witness in referring to it said, "It has always been." This custom was known to the officers and agents of the defendant company, or by the exercise of ordinary care they should have known it, and in legal contemplation the defendant did know of this custom. But aside from this legal presumption, actual knowledge of this custom, it seems, was brought home to the defendant, its officers and agents. C. L. Hill, the man in charge of this particular wagon, testified: "Little fellows 6 years old up to 11 and 12 had this habit of getting on the wagon." J. A. Eagle, assistant manager of the defendant company, in testifying with regard to this custom, said he had observed it "ever since he had been in the ice business." C. R. Moore, manager of the defendant company, said he knew of the existence of the custom "in a limited way." More than that, the defendant's driver knew of the custom, permitted it to grow up, and even encouraged it, offering the inducement of cool rides and bits of cracked ice.

[4] But the defendant contends that the admission of the evidence as to this custom was error, upon the general ground that it was an illegal custom and that it grew up in violation of an ordinance of the city of Charlotte, which declares:

"That no one shall ride or jump on to any vehicle without the consent of the driver thereof; and no person, when riding shall allow any part of his body to protrude beyond the limits of the vehicle, nor shall any person hang on to any vehicle whatsoever."

If that position were sound, then any defendant could escape the consequences of his wrongful act by the mere device of alleging and proving that his conduct had been unlawful.

[5] But even if the position of the defendant be a correct one, then it is equally true, as the record clearly shows, that this custom had grown up with the consent of the drivers of the defendant's wagons; and, therefore, it was not forbidden by the ordinance. In Ferrell v. Cotton Mills, 157 N. C. 528, 73 S. E. 142, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 64, and many other cases to like effect, evidence was admitted to show the custom or habit of small children to play upon premises where they were technical trespassers. If in those cases evidence was competent which proved a custom, in violation of the laws against trespass, then certainly in this case evidence of a custom in violation of an ordinance of the city of Charlotte was competent. Having permitted this custom to grow up, this defendant cannot take shelter behind his own wrong. "A habit of doing a thing is naturally of probative value as indicating that on a particular occasion a thing was done as usual; and, if clearly shown as a definite course of action, is constantly admitted in evidence." 1 Greenleaf's Ev. (16th Ed.) § 14 J.

[6] Leaving this subject, we come to the next material question in the case. Having concluded there was evidence that young Fry did not violate the ordinance, or that there was evidence that he did not and the jury so found, was he guilty of contributory negligence? We take this matter up now before considering the issue as to defendant's negligence, as it is more nearly related to, and connected with, the one just before discussed. The jury found that he was not guilty of any negligence himself which contributed to his injury and death; but the defendant contends that this answer of the jury was induced by an error of the judge in his charge to them, which, they say, is that, "as young Fry was under 12 years of age, he could not be guilty of negligence." He was one month and seven days under twelve. This, we think, was error. The error consisted in charging the jury that, as the boy was under 12 years of age, he was incapable of committing the alleged negligent act which it is claimed contributed to his injury. The responsibility of an infant for contributory negligence is not necessarily a question of law, and some expressions in our reports apparently to the contrary are misleading and contrary to the accepted and approved principle which governs in such cases. The question was so fully discussed, with a copious citation of the well-considered cases, in Alexander v. City of Statesville, 165 N. C. 527, 81 S. E. 763, that much further comment would seem to be useless. It was there held, as stated in the seventh headnote, that, while a child of tender years is not held to the same degree of care as one of mature years in avoiding an injury arising from the negligent act of another, it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury to determine, in his action to recover damages therefor, whether under the circumstances, and considering his age and capacity, he should have avoided the injury complained of by the exercise of ordinary care; and in that case, it appearing that the plaintiff was a bright boy of about 7 years of age, it was held that the court properly left the issue of contributory negligence to the jury.

We cannot approve all that was said, with respect to this question, in Baker v. Railroad Co., 150 N. C. 562, 64 S. E. 506, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 846, 17 Ann. Cas. 351; and Foard v. Power Co., 170 N. C. 48, 86 S. E. 804, though expressions will be found therein which seem to agree with the view herein stated. In Alexander v. Statesville, supra, we followed the rule as adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 401, 21 L. Ed. 114, and Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 657, 21 L. Ed. 745. Gladmon's Case has been followed by this court in Manly v. R. R., 74 N. C. 655; Murray v. R. R., 93 N. C. 92; Bottoms v. R. R., 114 N. C. 699, 19 S. E. 730, 25 L. R. A. 784, 41 Am. St. Rep. 799. In Bottoms' Case, the court refers to Gladmon's Case and Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 213, 54 Am. Dec. 67, as stating the correct rule, and takes this passage from the Robinson Case, "All," says Judge Redfield, in delivering the opinion, "that is required of an infant plaintiff in such a case [where a child was injured in a highway] being that he exercise care and prudence equal to his capacity." The passage which we have taken from Gladmon's Case was quoted by Chief Justice Smith, with full approval, in Murray v. R. R., supra, as containing a correct statement of the rule applicable in such cases. Numerous other cases are cited in Alexander v. Statesville, supra, at page 536 of 165 N. C., at page 766 of 81 S. E. It was held in Westerfield v. Lewis, 43 La. Ann. 63, 9 South. 52 (cited in the Alexander Case), that the rule which exempts a child of tender years from responsibility, while, it may not operate justly in every possible case, on the whole promotes the ends of justice, and the court followed the authorities which held that a child of the age of appellant is prima facie exempt from responsibility, but also held that testimony is admissible to show the contrary, citing many authorities. We said in the Alexander Case that, upon the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence, the judge properly confined his charge to the second issue, which separately and independently involved an inquiry into that matter, as to the plaintiff's age and his incapacity arising out of his tender years, and it may be said that the question of contributory negligence, on his part, is not to be determined alone by the fact of his youth, except in extreme cases; but other considerations enter into the question, as, for instance, his degree of capacity or intelligence. Some boys are brighter, smarter, more precocious, and more capable than others who are much older, and better able to take care of themselves.

[7] The youth of the person must be considered, of course; but, with the qualifications already made, it is not the only test, and the presumption of incapacity to protect himself is not always a conclusive one. In Rolin v. Tobacco Co., 141 N. C. 300, 53 S. E. 891, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 335, 8 Ann. Cas. 638, this court said:

"It is hardly necessary to add that contributory negligence on the part of the minor is to be measured by his age and his ability to discern and appreciate the circumstances of danger. He is not chargeable with the same degree of care as an experienced adult, but is only required to exercise such prudence as one of his years may be expected to possess. 'As the standard of care thus varies with the age, capacity and experience of the child, it is usually, if not always, when the child is not wholly irresponsible, a question of fact for the jury whether a child exercised the ordinary care and prudence of a child similarly situated; and if such care was exercised, a recovery can be had for an injury negligently inflicted, no matter how far the care used by the child falls short of the standard which the law exacts for determining what is ordinary care in a person of full age and capacity'"—citing Am. C. & F. Co. v. Armentraut, 214 Ill. 509, 73 N. E. 766; Plumley v. Birge, 124 Mass. 57, 26 Am. Rep. 645; 7 A. & E. Enc. 409.

Labatt on Master and Servant (Ed. 1904) § 348, says that the essential and controlling conception by which a minor's right of action is determined with reference to the existence or absence of contributory fault is that his capacity is the measure of his responsibility. If he has not the ability to foresee and avoid the danger to which he may be exposed, negligence will not be imputed to him if he unwittingly exposes himself to that danger. For the exercise of such measure of capacity and discretion as he possesses, he is responsible. And quoting from Gladmon's Case, supra, this court further says:

"The rule of law in regard to the negligence of an adult, and the rule in regard to that of an infant of tender years, is quite different. By the adult there must be given that care and attention for his own protection that is ordinarily exercised by persons of intelligence and discretion. If he fails to give it, his injury is the result of his own folly, and cannot be visited upon another. Of an infant of tender years less discretion is required, and the degree depends upon his age and knowledge. Of a child of 8 years of age less caution would be required than one of 7, and of a child of 7 less than one of 12 or 15. The caution required is according to the maturity and capacity of the child, and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case."

[8, 9] But if it be admitted that the boy was guilty of contributory negligence, the question whether it was the proximate cause of his death remains to be determined by the jury, under proper instructions from the court. Where defendant, by exercising due care, can avoid the consequences of plaintiff's negligence, or he can discover plaintiff's peril in time to avoid injuring him, he is liable on his failure so to do. Cullifer v. A. C. L. R. Co., 168 N. C. 309, 84 S. E. 400. The doctrine of the last clear chance applies where the defendant, after he discovers plaintiff's peril or, in the exercise of ordinary care, should have discovered it, negligently fails to avoid the accident. N. S. R. Co. v. White's Adm'r, 117 Va. 342, 84 S. E. 646.

The jury have found, with evidence to warrant the finding, that the driver knew the boy was on the rear step of the wagon, and had given him permission to ride there, and that, notwithstanding this knowledge, he drove onto the track, in front of the fast approaching street car, and his wagon was struck by the same, and this caused the intestate's injury and death. The driver of the defendant testified that some one drove an automobile between him and the curb of the sidewalk, which frightened his horses and caused them to turn, and drag his wagon onto the track; but there was evidence to the contrary, and especially by a witness who was riding in his automobile and a little behind the ice wagon, and who stated that he was in full view and that no such thing occurred, and the jury, under the evidence and the instructions of the court, not only found that the driver's testimony was not true, but that, on the contrary, he drove both "negligently," and "recklessly" upon the track. This appears from the instruction of the court on the third issue, as set forth in our statement of the case and the verdict. He also drove on the track "willfully and wantonly," as appears from the instruction of the court upon the fourth issue. There was evidence that the wagon was driven upon the track, in violation of a city ordinance which provided that the driver, in order to cross over to the other side of the street, should make his turn at the intersection of Tyron and Ninth street, or, if he intended to go as far north as Tenth street, then at the intersection of Tyron with Tenth street, and that, by the ordinance, he should have turned in on the north side of Ninth, or of Tenth, street, depending upon where he expected to make the crossing. The plaintiff contends, therefore, that he was acting, not only negligently, recklessly, willfully, and wantonly, but criminally, as he was violating the ordinance.

[10] We must construe the verdict always in the light of the evidence and the charge of the court, and especially as resolving all inferences in favor of the successful party. Aldrich v. Railway Co., 95 S. C. 427, 79 S. E. 316. We have held repeatedly that the verdict must be interpreted, "and allowed significance," by reference to the pleadings, testimony, and the charge of the court. Owens v. N. S. L. Ins. Co., 173 N. C. 373, 92 S. E. 168; Taylor v. Stewart, 175 N. C. 199, 95 S. E. 167; Fidelity Bank v. Wyson, 177 N. C. 284, 98 S. E. 769.

[11] If we follow these decisions and interpret this verdict by proper reference to the pleadings, evidence, and charge, there can be no doubt as to what was the conclusion of the jury, which is that the driver of the wagon, regardless of any contributory negligence of the boy, acted not only negligently, when he had the chance to save him, but willfully, recklessly, and wantonly, and against such conduct as this finding implies the contributory negligence of the boy is no protection, or bar to the plaintiff's recovery. If the party injured is himself ever so negligent, the one who caused that injury is liable to him for the ensuing damages, if he was aware of the dangerous situation and caused the damage willfully, wantonly, or even recklessly, that is, if he did so without regard to the consequences of his act and being indifferent to the rights of others. It is said in a standard treatise:

"The doctrine that contributory negligence will defeat recovery has no application where the injury is the result of the willful, wanton and reckless conduct of defendant. * * * In order that one may be held guilty of willful or wanton conduct, it must be shown that he was conscious of the surroundings, and was aware, from his knowledge of existing conditions, that injury would probably result from his conduct, under the circumstances, and with reckless indifference to consequences, he consciously and intentionally did some wrongful act or omitted some known duty which produced the injurious result." 29 Cyc. 509, 510.

And in Brendle v. Spencer, Receiver, 125 N. C. 474, 34 S. E. 634, this court held:

"It is settled that contributory negligence, even if admitted, is no defense to willful or wanton injury. The finding of such injury by the jury eliminates all question of negligence on both sides. The defendant company is responsible for the willful and wanton injury occasioned by its employee, while on duty, in its service."

[12] We do not mean to say that the driver's act in crossing at the wrong place contrary to the ordinance, if he did so, would, of itself, constitute willfulness; but it may be considered as one of the facts, or circumstances in evidence, tending to show that his act was willful, as being entirely regardless of the law and the safety of others. We have held that where a statute, or an ordinance, is violated, it is such a distinct legal wrong that, if it be the proximate cause of the injury to another, it will then constitute an actionable wrong, or tort; but the jury must find the facts essential to the application of this principle. Stone v. Texas Co., 180 N. C. 546, 105 S. E. 425, 12 A. L. R. 1297, where the matter is fully discussed.

[13] We finally conclude that there was some evidence from which the jury could find that the driver of the wagon was guilty of culpable negligence, or a distinct legal wrong as hereinbefore defined by us, and the defendant itself may therefore be liable to the plaintiff upon the principle of respondeat superior; the driver being its servant, and his illegal acts being imputable to the defendant. If knowing that the boy was on the wagon, and he was there by the driver's consent, or permission, the defendant would have to answer for his negligence if he exposed the boy to impending danger in crossing the track too near to the approaching street car, and especially so if the act of crossing the track under the circumstances was forbidden by the ordinance, and was the proximate cause of the injury to the boy which caused his death.

[14] This court will not undertake to decide the case upon the evidence, but will leave its weight and sufficiency to the jury. It may be that the defendant's construction of the evidence is the correct one, and that the plaintiff's is not. The court must not be understood as intimating any opinion at all upon the weight of the evidence, or any of it, but as leaving its sufficiency to establish the contention of the plaintiff, or that of the defendant, entirely to the jury, with proper directions from the court.

The error of the judge, as to the contributory negligence of the boy, is of sufficient importance to have been prejudicial to the defendant, and because of it a new trial must be had, in order that the case may be submitted again to the jury under proper instructions.

New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (concurring in part). In this case the plaintiff's intestate, a boy 11 years, 10 months, and 23 days old, jumped up behind an ice wagon passing through the streets of Charlotte and was killed in a collision between the ice wagon and the car of the Charlotte Street Railway Company. There was an ordinance of the city of Charlotte which made his conduct a misdemeanor, and there was a standing order by the Standard Ice & Fuel Company, the owners of the wagon, against such conduct, and the boy had no permission by the company, or permission of the driver, to ride on the wagon on that occasion. At the trial of the case there were two patent errors which require a new trial:

(1) The judge charged the jury that the plaintiff's intestate "could not be guilty of contributory negligence because under 12 years of age."

(2) The case should have been nonsuited on the further ground that the defendant owed no duty to the boy, who was illegally riding on the rear of the wagon in violation of the city ordinance and standing orders of the defendant company, except that it should not injure him wantonly or willfully, which is not even suggested.

As to the first proposition: The boy jumped upon the defendant's wagon, with full legal notice that he was forbidden to do so by an ordinance of the city, and the owners had constantly forbidden them to do so. Furthermore, the court in this case charged the jury:

"If you shall find by the greater weight of the evidence in the case that the plaintiff's intestate at the time he was killed was under 12 years of age, then there was a presumption of law that the boy was incapable of so understanding and appreciating danger from the alleged negligent acts or conditions produced by others as to make him guilty of contributory negligence."

A presumption of law is irrebuttable, and therefore this charge was in effect that if the boy was under 12 years of age he could not be guilty of contributory negligence. The decisions of the courts, without exception, are all to the contrary of this. Whether a boy of that age could be guilty of contributory negligence or not depends upon the findings of fact by the jury under proper instructions as to the capacity of the boy and the duty which the defendant owed to the boy under those circumstances. See Jacobs v. Koehler, 208 N. Y. 416, 102 N. E. 519, L. R. A. 1917F, 7, and annotations thereto, pages 10 to 164, on "Contributory Negligence of Children"—very exhaustive.

It is impossible to reconcile the charge in this case with the ruling by which the plaintiff, a younger boy, was nonsuited in Butner v. Brown, 182 N. C. 692, 110 S. E. 64 (last term), because he was held conclusively guilty of contributory negligence. In this case a boy a year older was held by the trial judge incapable of contributory negligence. In both cases, a jury trial of this issue is denied, but for absolutely opposite reasons. By no process of reasoning can the two decisions be reconciled. There are probably in this state more than 50,000 milk wagons, grocery and other store wagons, express wagons, and other vehicles employed in the discharge of similar duties. All their owners can do to prevent such accidents as this is to prohibit boys engaging in the sport from riding behind their wagons, as was done on this occasion. This prohibition was supplemented, in this instance, by the public ordinance of the city of Charlotte, of which the public are presumed to have notice. The company assumed no duty towards the boy, for it was not a common carrier. It did not injure him by any intentional act on the part of any of its employees.

If, under these circumstances, the owners of these thousands of vehicles engaged in the necessary traffic of our streets are to be made insurers of the safety of all boys who are injured while riding on the rear of their wagons—for it is insurance if there is a legal presumption that a boy of that age cannot be guilty of contributory negligence—then this decision will have added immensely to the liability of all persons or companies engaged in that, or any similar, business.

It is not too strong to say that there can be found no statute nor any decision which will justify the charge, which the court gave, that a boy of that age, "as a presumption of law," could not be guilty of contributory negligence. Aside from the fact that the contrary was held in the Butner Case at the last term and in numerous other cases, in Baker v. R. R., 150 N. C. 562, 64 S. E. 506, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 846, 17 Ann. Cas. 351, this subject was fully discussed and it was determined by a unanimous court as to the inquiry, "At what age must the responsibility of an infant for contributory negligence commence?" that upon all the authorities, "an infant, so far as he is personally concerned, is held to such care and prudence as is usual among children of the same age; and if his own act directly brings the injury upon him, while the negligence of the defendant is only such as exposes the infant to the possibility of an injury, the latter cannot recover." The Supreme Court of the United States has subsequently held the same to be sound law.

In Wilson v. R. R., 66 Kan. 183, 71 Pac. 262, the court held that where a boy 12 years of age was swinging or jumping from one freight car to another, and fell and was injured, he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

In Jollimore v. Connecticut Co., 86 Conn. 314, 85 Atl. 373, it was held that a bright boy 11 years of age, who was playing in the streets and was killed by a street car, was guilty of negligence as a matter of law.

In Moran v. Smith, 114 Me. 55, 95 Atl. 272 it was held that a child 8 years old, who attempted to run across the street in the face of an approaching automobile and who was struck and injured, was guilty of contributory negligence.

In Baker v. R. R., 150 N. C. 565, 64 S. E. 508, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 846, 17 Ann. Cas. 351, above cited, this court, in discussing the question of contributory negligence and whether it was a question for the court or the jury, says:

"The responsibilities of infants are clearly defined by text-writers and courts. At common law, 14 was the age of discretion in males and twelve in females. At 14 an infant could choose a guardian and contract a valid marriage. After 7 an infant may commit a felony, although there is a presumption in his favor, which may, however, be rebutted. But after fourteen an infant is held to the same responsibility for crime as an adult."

And then this opinion adds almost in the same words of the late case of Foard v. Power Co., 170 N. C. 48, 86 S. E. 804, as follows:

"We find in the books many cases where children of various ages, from seven years upwards, have been denied a recovery because of their own negligence."

In Alexander v. Statesville, 165 N. C. 528, 81 S. E. 763, it was held by Mr. Justice Walker that the question whether a child is guilty of contributory negligence is a question for the jury upon the evidence as to his age and capacity, and in that instance held that there, where the plaintiff was a boy 7 years old, the court properly left the question of contributory negligence to the jury. To the same effect, Raines v. R. R., 169 N. C. 189, 85 S. E. 294, L. R. A. 1918C, 1052. But in this case the judge relieved the jury of deciding that question by telling them that as a matter of law "a child under 12 years of age could not be guilty of contributory negligence." He lacked a month and 7 days of being 12 years old.

Secondly. Irrespective of the erroneous charge in regard to the boy under 12 being incapable of contributory negligence, this case presents the question of the responsibility of the owner of a wagon, or other ordinary vehicle in common use upon the streets for lawful purposes to a trespasser, or bare licensee upon such vehicle.

The settled principles applicable are:

(1) The plaintiff's intestate at the time of his injury, upon this evidence, was a trespasser on the defendant's wagon and, as such, exposed himself to any risk incident to his position. The defendant did not willfully or wantonly injure him, nor was he purposely injured by the acts of its employees. As to negligence in the collision between the defendant's wagon and the street car, that was a matter between those companies and in no wise affected the duty of the defendant to the intestate.

(2) Even if the intestate had been on the wagon with the implied consent of the defendant company, he was there solely for his own pleasure and purposes and was at most a bare licensee. He was not injured by any defect in the construction or use of the ice wagon, and there was no breach of duty towards him by the defendant company. No phase of the evidence presents any aspect of willful or wanton conduct to the plaintiff's intestate.

Thirdly. In this case, whether the defendant or the street car company was negligent in causing the collision is a matter which does not affect the liability of the defendant towards the boy.

He was forbidden to ride on the wagon by the authorities of the company and by an ordinance of the city and did so at his own peril. No employee of the defendant company injured him, and there is an entire absence of allegation or evidence that he was willfully or wantonly injured by the defendant or any of its employees.

The plaintiff's intestate was "intelligent for his age"; was prepared to enter the fifth grade in school, showing he had advanced in the city schools, year by year. The evidence is that there was no obstruction between the wagon and the on-coming car. The intestate knew necessarily the danger of a collision between the street car and the wagon. It cannot be said that a 12 year old boy of normal intelligence did not realize the danger he assumed in jumping upon the wagon. There was no difficulty about his getting off the wagon as easily as he got on, and the only reasonable explanation of his remaining on is that he was negligent of the danger he was assuming.

Neither is this case like Pierce v. R. R., 124 N. C. 83, 32 S. E. 390, 44 L. R. A. 316, where the boy jumped on the rear of a shifting engine and was knocked off by the fireman throwing a piece of coal at him. The deceased in this case was not injured by any act of any employee of the defendant company. Nor is it the case where the boy was attracted by a novelty as in the "attractive nuisance" cases, nor yet is it an instance where the boy was permitted to ride on the wagon by the custom or consent of the management of the defendant company. On the contrary, it is in evidence that the defendant had given the strictest orders that boys should not be so permitted to ride on their wagons and the city of Charlotte had passed an ordinance forbidding them to do so and making it a misdemeanor. The defendant had done everything in its power to prevent the deceased committing this trespass and to prevent boys from exposing themselves to the danger of so doing.

Thompson on Negligence, §§ 946 and 949, discussing the question as to who are trespassers or bare licensees, say:

"One entering the premises of another with his consent, but without his invitation, and not in the discharge of any public or private duty, is a bare licensee within the rules governing this branch of the law of negligence."

The fact that the plaintiff's intestate was a boy 12 years of age is not an exception to this rule. Judge Thompson says in the same work (section 1025):

"The generally accepted rule does not impose upon the owner or occupier of premises the duty to exercise a greater degree of care in anticipation of their invasion by trespassing children. No distinction is made between trespassers as to their age. Both children and adults take the premises as they find them."

In Peterson v. R. R., 143 N. C. 265, 55 S. E. 618, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1240, 118 Am. St. Rep. 799, where the plaintiff went upon a railroad train at a stop for the purpose of buying fruit from the fruit vendor on the train, and was hurt by the negligent movement of the train, Connor, J., declared the relation and obligation of the parties to be as follows:

"Where the plaintiff went into the train at the station for the sole purpose of purchasing fruit without invitation or inducement, but simply by the silent acquiescence of defendant's agents, he was a mere permissive licensee, and took the risk incident to the movement of the train, and, in the absence of any wanton injury, the motion for nonsuit should have been allowed."

In this instance, it is clear that the intestate was simply a trespasser, but, if he were a licensee, Judge Connor, in Peterson v. R. R., 143 N. C. 265, 55 S. E. 620, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1240, 118 Am. St. Rep. 799, thus lays down the well-established rule:

"A licensee who enters upon premises by permission only, without any enticement, allurement or inducement being held out to him by the owner or occupant, cannot recover damages for injuries caused by obstruction or pitfalls. He goes at his own risk and enjoys the license subject to its concomitant perils."

This case is much stronger for the defendant. If it were a fact that the intestate had seen other boys riding on the steps of the ice wagon, it was not an implied permission to him to so ride. Certainly it was not an invitation or inducement. The boy was not on the step by any invitation or offer to give him ice or to take a ride. The riding on the wagon was positively against the rules of the defendant company, and the driver testified without contradiction, "My instructions without exception were to keep all persons off the wagon." Indeed, every driver who went upon the stand testified that he did the best he could to keep boys off. In Briscoe v. Power Co., 148 N. C. 407, 62 S. E. 600, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1116, where the intestate was a boy 13 years of age and fell into a well of hot water not properly covered over, the court held him to be a trespasser or at most a bare licensee, and uses this expression:

"If the exception is to be extended to this case, then the rule of nonliability as to trespassers must be abrogated as to children, and every owner of property must at his peril make his premises child-proof."

There is absolutely no evidence in this case to justify the submission of the issue of wanton or willful negligence or reckless negligence, and the court erred in refusing the request to charge the jury that there was no evidence of willful or wanton negligence on the part of the defendant.

There is no evidence, in this case, that the intestate had ever before ridden on the wagon, and the evidence is that all its drivers tried to keep the children off the wagons and that the instructions from the company to do this were emphatic and repeated. Besides, as already stated, the ordinance of the city of Charlotte made it a misdemeanor for any one to "ride or jump onto any vehicle without the consent of the driver thereof," or for any person to "hang onto any vehicle whatsoever." Viewing the evidence in its strongest light against the plaintiff, the motion for nonsuit should have been allowed. There was no evidence of breach of duty towards the plaintiff's intestate, nor was there any such negligence as would entitle the plaintiff to judgment.

In Butner v. Brown, 182 N. C. 692, 110 S. E. 64, at last term, this court sustained a nonsuit where a boy 11 years of age was injured by the operation of an unguarded cog-wheel in the defendant's mill, though the uncontradicted evidence was that the boy, and others of like age, had been permitted without objection for years to enter the mill at will, and that there was no notice or warning given that they should not do so, and the boy lost his arm because the defendant had not guarded the dangerous machinery which, by the consent of the defendant's operator and its own custom, he and other boys had been permitted, without objection, to approach by visiting the mill at all times. Yet there a nonsuit was sustained, but in this case there was no defect in the machinery or car and the intestate was not hurt thereby.

This case is one of wide and far-reaching importance. The court erred in allowing admission of testimony about a custom which had been declared (if it existed) by the city ordinance to be unlawful and in refusing to the defendant's prayers for instructions and in the charge as given, and especially in refusing to allow the defendant's motion for nonsuit upon the ground that upon the evidence the intestate because under 12 years of age "could not be guilty of contributory negligence."

On a careful perusal of the record, it is a reasonable inference that the question really tried by the jury was solely whether the defendant ice company or the street car company was proximately liable for the collision, leaving out the real issue whether the ice company, in either event, was liable to the plaintiff's intestate, who was a trespasser and, besides, was guilty upon the plaintiff's own showing of contributory negligence in violating the town ordinance and the prohibitions of the defendant company.

2. Game §3—Right to hunt, belonging to individual distinct from other lands, has character of an estate in land.

Reservation of a right to hunt over lands granted to another, if owned distinct from an ownership in other lands, has the character of an estate in the land, and the right may be assigned or inherited.

3. Game §3—Right of hunting or fowling passes by grant or lease.

The right of hunting or fowling on another's lands or water may be acquired by grant or lease from the owner, either with or without the soil, and the right passes by grant or lease of the land, unless expressly reserved.

4. Perpetuities §4(3)—Rule against perpetuities held not to apply to right to hunt over lands granted to another.

The right to hunt over lands granted to another, reserved to the grantor in the grant, is not subject to the rule against perpetuities, since the interest is a present interest.

5. Injunction §34—Injunction is proper remedy to protect hunting privileges.

Injunction, as well as an action for damages, is the proper remedy to protect an exclusive hunting privilege and the common right to hunt on public waters.

6. Evidence §461(5)—Admission of hunting rights reserved by plaintiff held to have no effect, except as a recognition of the intent of the reservation.

In a suit against a lessee of lands to enjoin interference with the rights of plaintiffs to hunt and protect game thereon, reserved by plaintiffs when they granted the lands, a letter, written to one of plaintiffs by the lessor, one of the mesne grantees of the premises, stating that he had always recognised plaintiffs' rights to hunt and protect game on the land, has no legal effect, except as a recognition of the meaning and intent of the reservation if it had been ambiguous.

7. Game §3—Reservation of hunting rights in grant of land construed.

A reservation by grantors for themselves, their heirs and assigns, of the right to hunt on land granted, and power to protect game thereon against all persons except the grantees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, was a reservation of the right to hunt in fee simple, with power given the grantors to protect the game thereon against being hunted by persons except the grantee, etc., and a lease by one deriving title from the grantee, giving the lessee the right of hunting and protecting game, was invalid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bladen County; Connor, Judge.

Suit by J. P. Council and another for a restraining order against W. T. Sanderlin and others, and suit by defendants against plaintiffs. Causes consolidated, and from a decree dissolving the restraining order against plaintiffs and making the restraining order against defendants permanent, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

The plaintiffs conveyed to the Southern Chemical Company, July 10, 1902, a tract of 1,819 acres on Lake Waccamaw in Bladen county, in fee simple, with the following reservation:

"But the said J. P. Council and J. A. Council reserve for themselves, their heirs and assigns, the right to hunt on any of the above-described lands as may remain uncleared and uncultivated, and the power to protect the game on said land against the trespass of all persons except the Southern Chemical Company, their executors, administrators and assigns."

It is found as a fact by the court that the plaintiffs have never abandoned their rights under the reservation, or exception, above mentioned, but have continuously exercised said rights since the execution of said deed, and that the lands in question are chiefly what is known as Savannah lands, and, under present conditions, of little value for anything other than hunting purposes.

On December 22, 1902, the Southern Chemical Company conveyed to the Southern Products Company the above tract of land, with the above clause that the conveyance is subject to the existing rights of J. P. Council and J. A. Council to hunt over the above-described lands that may remain uncleared and uncultivated, and with the power to protect game in said land against trespass, as particularly specified in the above deed from Council and Council to said Chemical Company. On January 1, 1903, J. A. Pickett, acting under power of attorney from the Southern Products Company, conveyed the said land to the Worth Company by a mortgage to secure a loan. The lands were sold under mortgage to Matt J. Heyer on May 3, 1905, and soon thereafter said Matt J. Heyer conveyed the land to J. A. Pickett (the present owner thereof), and on November 11, 1921, Pickett and wife conveyed to the defendant W. T. Sanderlin and H. M. McAllister, by way of lease for five years, the "right of hunting and protecting the game and all wild life on said lands and the right to exclude all persons from entering upon said lands with firearms or dogs or other devices used in the capture of wild life."

The above deeds were all duly probated and recorded. This is a proceeding or restraining order, which was made permanent, to prohibit Sanderlin and McAllister from interfering with the plaintiffs' hunting rights on said land. Said defendants allege that the reservation, in the Council deed above, of the hunting privilege, is void, and that the plaintiffs are trespassing on the rights of Sanderlin et al., and sought a restraining order against plaintiffs from hunting, or trespassing, upon said lands. The causes were consolidated, and upon the facts found the restraining order against Council and others was dissolved, and it was made permanent against the defendants, who appealed.

E. F. McCulloch, of Elizabethtown, Lyon & Johnson, and Johnson & Johnson, of Lumberton, for appellants.

Sinclair, Dye & Clark, of Fayetteville, and R. S. White, of Elizabethtown, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiffs conveyed the land in fee simple in 1902, reserving the hunting privileges thereon, and the court finds in this proceeding, as a fact that the plaintiffs have never abandoned their rights under said reservation, but have continuously exercised same since the execution of the deed of July 10, 1902, and the court held as a matter of law that the plaintiffs "have the exclusive right to enter upon the uncleared and uncultivated portions of the lands in question, in person, and with invited guests and have the power to protect the game thereon, except such injury thereto as may be caused by the owner in the use of said land for purposes other than hunting," and made permanent the restraining order in behalf of said Council et al.
